Of course, the record of Congress on compliance certainly is not unblemished. In 1983, we repealed the provisions which imposed withholding on interest and dividends and thereby lost over $8 billion over 3 years due to noncompliance. This year we will repeal the contemporaneous records requirements for use of property which can be used either for business or personal reasons, thereby losing over $400 million to noncompliance.

One thing I think should be obvious. We have done pretty much all we can do in the compliance area with the exception of raising the interest rates and penalties on tax deficiencies still higher and increasing the number of IRS agents. If we are to continue basing our tax system on voluntary compliance, we have to balance theoretical gains from legislative changes with the emotional reaction of our citizens. A new requirement may look good on paper, but it won't increase revenues if it is ignored.

We already have raised the interest rate on deficiencies to equal the prime rate. It is questionable whether we can raise it further without raising the rates on refunds, although a differential in rates would be justified.

On the other hand, the audit rate on income, estate, and gift returns has declined substantially in recent years and was approximately 1.5 percent in 1983, the most recent year for which the IRS has data. Although the IRS has become somewhat better at targeting its audit resources, this is a fairly low level.

The IRS could probably absorb a maximum of 2,500 additional agents per year for the next 3 years. This would cost approximately $600 million in additional spending, but it is likely to net approximately $2 billion over that period.

There certainly is some revenue to be derived from increasing the number of agents. However, that is likely to be the only compliance option for which that claim can be made. The issue is whether the Senate wants to increase the number of individuals who will be audited.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] to encourage voluntary tax compliance and stepped-up enforcement by the IRS against those individuals and corporations intentionally evading their tax responsibilities.

This amendment is not a tax increase.

I repeat, it is not a tax increase.

No individual, no business, today paying taxes in compliance with the law will see their taxes increased as a result of this amendment.

As for the insistence of the President and some Senators that we do nothing to find revenues to reduce the deficit because they want to use the deficit as a club to force more cuts in spending than is wise or right for our economy and our people, I say to them, it is inexcusable to allow law breaking to continue simply because some Members want to keep the budget reconciliation process free of any resort to increased revenues.

We have an obligation, in fairness, to those taxpayers who do pay in accordance with the law, to catch those who do not pay.

If we can do that as part of the budget resolution, then we should.

And if an amnesty plus enforcement produces increased revenues we should consider these as a dividend in deficit reductiion and pass the benefit along to taxpayers in terms of savings on interest on the debt.

I urge Senators to vote common sense and fairness by supporting the amendment of Senator KERRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). Who yields time?

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE] be added as a cosponsor to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, at this point, I yield my time back and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield back our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ANDREWS] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] is absent because of illness in the family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 93, nays 2—as follows:

So the amendment (No. 61) was agreed to.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 62

(Purpose: To limit social security benefits paid to illegal and non-resident aliens.)

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY] proposes an amendment numbered 62.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment reads as follows:

At the end of the pending amendment, add the following:

It is the sense of the Congress that functional totals should be reduced to reflect a limitation on the amount of social security benefits paid to illegal and non-resident aliens. It is assumed that the Finance Committee will report legislation to accomplish the required changes in law. Such legislation may limit benefits to the amount of the wage-earner's contribution plus interest, unless the wage-earner is a citizen of a country with which the United States has a treaty or totalization agreement and that this provision would apply to individuals becoming eligible on or after January 1, 1986.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the amendment which I offer is straightforward. It expresses the sense of the Senate that the Social Security benefits payable to nonresident and illegal aliens should be limited to the amount of the wage earner's contribution plus interest, unless the nonresident is a citizen of a country with which the United States has a treaty or totalization agreement. This provision would apply to nonresident and illegal aliens becoming eligible for benefits on or after January 1, 1986.

This is not a new issue for the Senate. The limitation on nonresident alien Social Security benefits was a part of the Senate Finance Committee reported version of the Social Security Amendments of 1983, which was approved by this body in March of that year. Also approved by the Senate was an amendment which would have prohibited the payment of Social Security benefits to illegal aliens. Unfortunately, despite the Senate's good sense, these provisions did not become a part of the law. We did, as a result of Public Law 98-21, place some limitations on the benefits the dependents of nonresident aliens can receive. But, because the Senate-passed provisions were altered or eliminated in conference, we made no change in the law where the nonresident aliens themselves are concerned. I believe the Senate should again exercise the same wisdom it demonstrated when it approved the nonresident alien provision as part of the Social Security reform package. A sense of fairness to the American taxpayer dictates that. And so does the need for deficit reduction.

Could there be a more reasonable place to begin deficit reduction than here? I do not think so. For the benefit of my colleagues, let me explain again, briefly and simply, what this bill would do. Under this amendment, aliens residing abroad and illegal aliens would receive Social Security benefits in an amount equal to the contribution they made, through payroll taxes on their employment, plus interest. This is fair. It gives back what has been contributed. But it does not allow the burden placed upon the Social Security system and the American workers whose taxes support it, to continue. It does not ask hard-working, law-abiding citizens to keep working, and paying increasing Social Security taxes, so that their money can be sent overseas or paid to those who have violated this Nation's laws. That is not a fair thing to ask of our citizens. It is not logical. And I am convinced it is not what the American people want.

I believe the intention of the original Social Security Act was the protection of our citizens—not aliens who have entered and worked in the country illegally or aliens who reside abroad. But, Mr. President, in my view, the strongest arguments in favor of this amendment are that it would save money, that it is consistent with the Senate's action in the past, and that it is fair, reasonable, logical. I believe this is the kind of change in the law the American people favor. I urge my colleagues' support of this amendment.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I support the pending amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY]. This is an important issue and the amendment before us now will rectify a gross inconsistency in our laws as well as save billions of dollars in the Social Security Program. As my colleagues know, it is currently unlawful for aliens to enter or work in the United States without the express permission of the U.S. Government. Unfortunately, present law with regard to Social Security does not reinforce this prohibition against illegal aliens working in this country.

Under current Social Security eligibility criteria, an alien who is living or working in this country illegally can earn and receive Social Security benefits. In fact, payments continue to be paid if the person returns to their own country, including the cost-of-living adjustment based on American economic conditions.

Social Security recipients of our country are rightfully outraged to learn that this law exists. Especially in light of the fact that their own benefits are so often bandied about in Washington—with the threat of reductions, in order to save money.

The amendment before us today is a fair and logical solution to this illogical law. By returning all payments to illegal aliens and nonresident aliens. with interest, they will not lose a penny of their hard earned money, and the Social Security system will no longer be obligated to make payments to them.

Mr. President, I have become increasingly concerned by the fact that the young people in this country, who are now paying into the Social Security system, are skeptical of the program's ability to meet payment demands once they retire. I believe that the amendment I sponsored, with Senator D'AMATO, which was adopted by this body last week, goes a long way toward restoring confidence in the minds of the American public in the Social Security system. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this amendment so that we can go even further in restoring that confidence and make the system fair to current and future legal recipients.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY].

Our policy should be to encourage compliance with FICA laws and withholding of Federal and State income taxes.

The proposal of Senator MATTINGLY would only give more reason for an undocumented worker to cooperate in his or her exploitation by unscrupulous employers.

Congress should promote compliance with our Social Security payroll tax laws and withholding of Federal and State income taxes.

Finally, I note that to be eligible for Social Security, a worker must have paid in for 40 quarters—that's 10 years. For a seasonal laborer, 40 quarters may be the equivalent of a lifetime of work. In my judgment, workers in such situations have paid their way by their contributions to our economy.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEINZ addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask that I be yielded 3 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would not object to this amendment if I felt the numbers in it were reasonable. This is based on, frankly, a set of very poor assumptions by the Congressional Budget Office that we would indeed save $2.3 billion.

Let me comment just for a moment on why I think the numbers are wrong.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. HEINZ. I do not have any time. My understanding, though, is that this is a $2.3 billion amendment.

Mr. MATTINGLY. No; that is not the case.

Mr. HEINZ. How much is it?

Mr. MATTINGLY. We believe it will be approximately a $100 million savings. This amendment is prospective, applying only to new eligibles as of January 1, 1986. It is not retroactive. If it had been, with an effective date of December 31, 1985, it would have included individuals currently receiving benefits. Then, according to the Congressional Budget Office, the savings would amount to $2.3 billion. But this amendment, like similar provisions previously passed by the Senate, is prospective.

Mr. HEINZ. I thank the Senator for that clarification. The Senator had a different amendment that he told me about yesterday. I gather he has changed it. Is that right?

Mr. MATTINGLY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HEINZ. I thank the Senator. I yield back the balance of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? If no time is yielded, time will be assessed against both sides equally.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of our time on this side.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of our time.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 1 P.M.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my hope that following this rollcall we might stand in recess until 1 o'clock. There are a number of luncheons and ceremonies taking place between the hour of 12 and 1 o'clock.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following this vote we stand in recess until 1 p.m., and that the time not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

All the time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] is absent because of illness in the family.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MELCHER] would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 84, nays 12, as follows:

So the amendment (No. 62) was agreed to.

RECESS UNTIL 1 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate stands in recess until the hour of 1 p.m.

Thereupon, at 12:14 p.m., the Senate recessed until 1 p.m., whereupon, it reconvened when called to order by the presiding officer [Mr. COCHRAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 1 p.m. having arrived, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES] is recognized to offer an amendment on behalf of himself and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS], on which there shall be 90 minutes of debate, with 60 minutes for the proponents and 30 minutes for the opponents.

Who yields time?

AMENDMENT NO. 63

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following names be added as cosponsors: Senator HOLLINGS, Senator DODD, Senator BENTSEN, Senator LEVIN, Senator

BOREN, Senator EXON, Senator NUNN, Senator BAUCUS, Senator DECONCINI, Senator BUMPERS, Senator SIMON, Senator BINGAMAN, Senator JOHNSTON, and Senator STENNIS. They join with me today in offering a budget package to cut the deficit and provide for economic growth and a productive future for our Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES], for himself and Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. DODD, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. EXON, Mr. NUNN, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. JOHNSTON, and Mr. STENNIS, proposes an amendment numbered 63.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In the language of Amendment 43 strike all after the word "That" and insert the following: the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986 is established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal year 1987 and 1988 are set forth.

A BUDGET FOR ECONOMIC GROWTH

It is the sense of Congress that in addition to reducing the deficit, which is a major barrier to economic growth, the Federal budget should invest in future economic growth by providing increased funds for:

1. Promoting U.S. exports of goods and services
2. Science and Technology
3. Labor and Force Development (skills and adaptability)
4. Resource & Infrastructure Development
5. Availability of Credit for growth sectors or industries faced with structural change.

These investments will determine whether the U.S. economy (U.S. industry) will develop and apply the technological advances necessary to compete in the changing world economy in the next decade and the next century; freezing or starving these programs is a false economy.

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, October 1, 1986, and October 1, 1987:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $736,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $807,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $892,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $990,500,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $0.
Fiscal year 1986: $15,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $28,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $38,000,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for hospital insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $44,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $50,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $56,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $61,200,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for old-age, survivors, and disability insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $186,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $200,400,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $216,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $248,000,000,000.

(2) The appropriate levels of total new budget authority are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $1,057,600,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $1,083,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,141,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $1,218,800,000,000.

(3) The appropriate levels of total budget outlays are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $951,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $977,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,026,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $1,077,600,000,000.

(4) The amounts of the deficits in the budget which are appropriate in the light of economic conditions and all other relevant factors are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $214,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $169,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $134,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $87,100,000,000.

(5) The appropriate levels of the public debt are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $1,851,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $2,082,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $2,290,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $2,473,900,000,000.

and the amounts by which the statutory limits on such debt should be accordingly increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $27,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $231,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $207,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $183,600,000,000.

(6) The appropriate levels of total Federal Credit activity for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, October 1, 1986, and October 1, 1987, are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $53,500,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $69,300,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

Fiscal year 1986:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $36,200,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $75,400,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

Fiscal year 1987:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $36,500,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $75,600,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

Fiscal year 1988:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $35,601,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $80,300,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

(b) The Congress hereby determines and declares the appropriate levels of budget authority and budget outlays, and the appropriate levels of new direct loan obligations, new primary loan guarantee commitments, and new secondary loan guarantee commitments for fiscal years 1985 through 1988 for each major functional category are as specified below:

PROMOTING U.S. EXPORTS

It is the sense of Congress that federal economic policy must recognize the international basis of future prosperity, and in addition to reducing deficits, interest rates and the overvalued dollar, provide appropriate forms of assistance for U.S. firms seeking to compete in world markets, including:

A. Prompt enactment of legislation to reduce foreign barriers to U.S. goods and services, including a requirement for U.S. retaliation against foreign imports if foreign barriers are not lowered and the trade deficit substantially reduced;

B. Creation of a $1 billion "war chest" in the Export-Import Bank to be used by the special trade representative and the bank as a resource to counter predatory financing arrangements by foreign countries and meet the unique requirements of certain U.S. exporters.

C. Increasing funds for U.S. agencies providing technical assistance to U.S. exporters;

D. Increased funds for training in foreign languages and cultures to assist U.S. exporters in dealing abroad.

International Affairs (150):

Fiscal year 1985:
(A) New budget authority, $26,900,000,000.
(B) Outlays, $19,600,000,000.
(C) New direct loan obligations, $11,500,000,000.
(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $10,300,000,000.
(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

Fiscal year 1986:
(A) New budget authority, $21,500,000,000.
(B) Outlays, $17,500,000,000.
(C) New direct loan obligations, $9,400,000,000.
(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $12,300,000,000.
(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

Fiscal year 1987:
(A) New budget authority, $19,200,000,000.
(B) Outlays, $16,500,000,000.
(C) New direct loan obligations, $9,000,000,000.
(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $12,300,000,000.
(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

Fiscal year 1988:
(A) New budget authority, $19,100,000,000.
(B) Outlays, $15,800,000,000.
(C) New direct loan obligations, $9,200,000,000.
(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $12,300,000,000.
(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

It is the sense of Congress that enhanced federal support of scientific, technological and industrial innovation:

A. Strengthens the ability of U.S. industries to compete in domestic and international markets;

B. Stimulates productivity growth in U.S. manufacturing industries through the development of improved manufacturing technologies;

C. Addresses important unsolved problems of our society such as supplying safe and low-cost energy, controlling pollution, providing adequate housing, improving the quality of life, preventing disease and creating jobs;

D. Helps control inflation and contributes to economic growth through the adoption of more productive technologies; and

E. Enhances the standard of living for all Americans; That while the private sector should maintain responsibility for the commercial application of technological advances, scientific research and technological innovation that benefits the nation more than it benefits any individual or corporate entity, the public interest warrants direct and indirect federal encouragement of research and development; That the key areas of direct federal encouragement of scientific and technological applications include: basic mathematical, physical and biological research funded through the National Science Foundation and the Department of Energy; space and terrestrial sciences and applications developed through pursuit of a manned space station and manned and unmanned space and planetary exploration; energy supply and conservation, biomedical and biotechnical research to produce marketable products while maintaining our commitment to basic research into causes, prevention and cure of disease; and funding for state-of-the-art laboratory equipment for schools and universities; That joint business-university-governmental arrangements for applied research should be encouraged to ensure rapid dissemination and adoption of technological advances, and to assure that technological development is consistent with the needs of potential users.

General Science, Technology, and Space (250):
Fiscal year 1985:
(A) New budget authority, $9,100,000,000.
(B) Outlays, $8,700,000,000.
(C) New direct loan obligations, $0.
(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $0.
(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.
Fiscal year 1986:
(A) New budget authority, $9,700,000,000.
(B) Outlays, $9,300,000,000.
(C) New direct loan obligations, $0.
(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $0.
(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

LABOR FORCE DEVELOPMENT

It is the sense of Congress that continued economic growth requires a labor force with the education and job skills appropriate to rapidly changing technology in both industrial production and service occupations;

That meeting these needs requires adequate funding of such key programs as math and science education, compensatory education, and job training programs for youth and dislocated workers, re-training and employment opportunities for senior citizens; training of applied scientists and engineers;

That continual change in technology will require structures to recognize and facilitate changes in labor force requirements and labor-manangement relations; That such structures should include a joint labor-management-government commission on labor-force development and a national job bank;

That funding should be restored to the Bureau of Labor Statistics to allow adequate monitoring and analysis of changing employment needs.

RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT/ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

It is the sense of Congress that further economic growth will require a continued investment in programs to protect and develop our nation's physical resources—land, energy, water, timber, minerals;

It is the further sense of Congress that continued growth and development requires an increased investment in programs to protect the environment from any dangerous byproducts of industrial production, such as the superfund hazardous waste cleanup program, EPA enforcement programs, water supply and desalinization projects, hazardous waste and drinking water research and soil and water conservation programs. Because the benefits of research in these areas are primarily a public good, there is little incentive for private sector investment. Lack of prudent management of natural resources as has occurred over the past four years of budget reductions, will in the next century, represent the major limits to growth.

Natural Resources and Environment (300):

COMPETITION AND CREDIT

It is the sense of Congress that robust economic growth requires the innovation and competition spawned by the creation and growth of small firms;

That such competition requires the vigorous enforcement of anti-trust laws;

That the revised enforcement guidelines of recent years have virtually eliminated anti-trust protection;

That this lax enforcement and changes in the corporate tax code have fostered an epidemic of merger and acquisitions exceeding $347 billion in the last four years which threatens the health of financial markets;

That this epidemic has diverted both capital and entrepreneurial energy away from the innovative development, efficient manufacture, and aggressive marketing of products and toward paper transactions which enhance short-run financial gains at the expense of long-term profitability of American enterprise;

That the Department of Justice should therefore modify its anti-trust guidelines to provide adequate protection for competition against horizontal mergers, and should return to vigorous enforcement of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act;

That the Federal Reserve Board should ensure that banks maintain prudent lending practices, and assure that adequate credit is avilable for real economic expansion rather than being tied up in unproductive takeovers; That the Securities and Exchange Commission should require full financial disclosure as a condition for issuing debt instruments which are below investment grade; should prohibit takeover practices which discriminate against classes of shareholders; That the Congressional Budget Office and Congressional Research Service shall undertake an analysis to determine which tax provisions create windfalls of cash which make takeovers and liquidation more profitable than reinvestment of capital for long-term growth, and report their findings no later than June 15, 1985.

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than June 15, 1985, the committees named in subsections (b) through (r) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the Committees on the Budget of their respective Houses. After receiving those recommendations, the Committees on the Budget shall report to the House and Senate a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

SENATE COMMITTEES

(b) The Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $134,000,000 in budget authority and $134,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $2,363,000,000 in budget authority and $2,363,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $4,151,000,000 in budget authority and $4,151,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(c) The Senate Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to achieve savings of $0 in budget authority and $387,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $588,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $627,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(d) It is the sense of Congress that in order to provide an innovative mechanism to promote the export of U.S. goods and services, and provide an effective deterrent to predatory financing practices by foreign competitors, direct loan subsidies for exports should be replaced by less costly interest reduction programs and a "war chest" allowing the use of up to $1 billion in support of these objectives.

(e) The Senate Committee on Finance shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $5,934,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $11,943,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $14,550,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(f) The Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $1,893,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $3,303,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $4,708,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(g) The Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $152,000,000 in budget authority and $142,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $209,000,000 in budget authority and $204,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $279,000,000 in budget authority and $269,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(h) The Senate Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $129,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $421,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $459,000,000 in budget authority and $457,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(i) The Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $157,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $228,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $223,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

HOUSE COMMITTEES

(j) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $134,000,000 in budget authority and $134,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $2,363,000,000 in budget authority and $2,363,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $4,151,000,000 in budget authority and $4,151,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(k) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to achieve savings of $0 in budget authority and $387,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $588,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $627,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(l) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $152,000,000 in budget authority and $142,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $209,000,000 in budget authority and $204,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $279,000,000 in budget authority and $269,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(m) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $2,680,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $4,067,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $5,403,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(n) The House Committee on Government Operations shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $0 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $4,785,000,000 in budget authority and $3,550,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $5,013,000,000 in budget authority and $4,956,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(o) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $1,893,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $3,303,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $4,708,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(p) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $129,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $421,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $459,000,000 in budget authority and $457,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(q) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays as follows: $0 in budget authority and $157,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $228,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $223,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(r) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays as follows: $0 in budget authority and $5,934,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $8,393,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $9,594,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

REVENUE RECONCILIATION

SEC. 3. (a) The Senate Committee on Finance shall report no later than July 1, 1985, a Reconciliation Resolution making changes in the Reconciliation Bill considered pursuant to Section 2 above, prior to the enrollment of that bill by the Secretary of the Senate.

Such changes will increase revenues by:

$12 billion in FY86,

$25 billion in FY87,

$35 billion in FY88;

(b) It is the sense of Congress that:

(1) These revenue changes shall not produce any increase in tax rates for individuals;

(2) These revenue changes shall reduce the rate of growth in tax expenditures in Fiscal Years 1986 through 1988;

(3) These revenue provisions shall not be considered in either House of Congress until the spending reduction provisions in Section 2 have been passed by that House;

(4) The Reconciliation bill providing spending reductions pursuant to Section 2 shall not be enrolled until the Reconciliation bill containing tax measures has been passed.

SEC. 4(a) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report no later than July 1, 1985, a Reconciliation Resolution making changes in the Reconciliation Bill considered pursuant to Section 2 above, prior to the enrollment of that bill by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Such changes will increase revenues by:

$12 billion in FY 86,

$25 billion in FY 87,

$30 billion in FY 88;

(b) It is the sense of Congress that:

(1) These revenue changes shall not produce any increase in tax rates for individuals;

(2) These revenue changes shall reduce the rate of growth in tax expenditures in Fiscal Years 1986 through 1988;

(3) These revenue provisions shall not be considered in either House of Congress until the spending reduction provisions in Section 2 have been passed by that House;

(4) The Reconciliation bill providing spending reductions pursuant to Section 2 shall not be enrolled until the Reconciliation bill containing tax measures has been passed.

SEC. 5. It is the sense of Congress that total Budget Authority available for appropriations for Budget Function 050 (National Defense) and for non-defense discretionary programs shall not exceed $455.7 billion for FY 1986; of which $303.2 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $152.5 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs; that for FY 1987, the Total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $473.8 billion, of which $324.1 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $149.6 billion for non-defense discretionary programs; and that for FY 1988, the total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $499.8 billion, of which $347.6 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $152.2 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 6. If the Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1985, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for fiscal year 1986, then, for purposes of section 311 of such Act, this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310 of such Act.

SEC. 7. It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives or the Senate during fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to consider any bill, resolution, or amendment, except proposed legislation reported in response to reconciliation instructions contained in this resolution, authorizing new direct loans obligations or new loan guarantee commitments unless that bill, resolution, or amendment also provides that the authority to make or guarantee such loans shall be effectively only to such extent and in such amounts as are contained in appropriation acts.

SEC. 8. It is the sense of the Congress that the previous distinction between "unified budget" and "off-budget" spending be ended, and that budget authority and outlays for the so-called "off-budget" agencies be included in the budget totals.

SEC. 9. (a) The Senate finds that—

(1) the existing tax structure of the United States distorts economic activity, leading to an inefficient use of national resources and a weakening of our domestic economic vitality and competitive posture in international markets;

(2) the relative tax burdens among various taxpayer categories are manifestly unfair insofar as they arise from differences in the capabilities of taxpayers to take advantage of complicated tax laws;

(3) the ability of the Federal Government to plan and conduct rational fiscal policy is frustrated by elaborate schemes to avoid taxation and the unintended effects of tax incentives and penalties;

(4) progressive erosion of voluntary compliance threatens the fiscal integrity of our public finances and the confidence of our citizens in the Federal Government's capacity to govern; and

(5) a number of plans, each designed to simplify and reform the Tax Code, have been before the Congress for a time sufficient to allow for extensive analysis and evaluation.

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Senate that tax reform should be adopted as soon as possible, and that it should incorporate the following principles and objectives:

(1) efficiency and responsiveness to market conditions in the economic activities of American businesses and consumers;

(2) simplicity of structure and lower marginal tax rates;

(3) a fair and equitable distribution of the tax burden among all taxpayers, with relief for those below the poverty level, and incentives to bring them into the work force;

(4) a broader tax base, with deductions essential to avoid genuine hardship or to protect the economic security of the American people; and

(5) increased incentives for work, saving, and investment.

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Senate that because the Senate requires timely reporting of legislative action on spending bills, and because the Senate requires continual control over the budget, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall issue a weekly report during periods when the Senate is in session detailing and tabulating the progress of congressional action on bills and resolutions providing new budget authority and changing revenues and the public debt for a fiscal year, including, but not limited to the requirements set forth in Public Law 93-344, section 308(b).

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, this proposal would require all Americans to help restore our economic foundations and get ready to build on those foundations. There are no scapegoats, and no free riders.

This budget proposal is not offered because we want to blame anyone for anything. We simply want to get the job done, and do it right.

Centuries ago, a famous leader gave some notable advice. He said, "If the city should be harmed, don't rage at the culprit; find out at what point his vision failed him."

This alternative budget package can keep us from ever holding a postmor-tem like that. It is based on vision, a clear look at what practical steps are needed to cut the deficit now, and what plans we must make for the future.

The plan we offer today reduces deficits $272 billion over 3 years. It requires $191 billion in spending cuts, including $91 billion in domestic reductions and $72 billion less in military spending over the next 3 years.

The plan includes revenues—$72 billion in revenues over 3 years. It requires everyone to pay a fair share by cutting back the growth in tax expenditures. Those expenditures are now $400 billion a year in special allowances that have worked their way into the Tax Code. They help a limited number of wealthy individuals and corporations more than they help the Nation. The country needs help, so those expenditures must be reduced, just like all domestic spending.

This plan will cut spending $2.50 for every $1 of revenues raised.

This plan includes restraints on military spending. It involves making the Pentagon practice efficiency and sensible planning. The Pentagon has to live like the rest of us. You simply cannot have everything you want. But the Pentagon will still have $300 billion next year, and more the year after that, enough to meet projected needs. Moreover, the plan achieves $6 billion in savings by following through on the Pentagon's own progress payment recommendations to withhold funds until products are proven and delivered.

This plan includes delay of 6 months on all of the cost-of-living provisions with an offset to protect the indigent.

But if a budget package does not also contain revenues from the big corporations, the wealthy, and some restraint on defense spending, then I cannot support it. It would not be fair to ask senior citizens to sacrifice if the most well-heeled in society are not required to sacrifice at the same time. This deficit reduction package includes safeguards for the elderly.

There is no increase in out-of-pocket costs to Medicare beneficiaries, a sharp contrast with the nearly $5 billion increase over 3 years included in the Republican plan.

The plan would avoid the 6-percent Social Security COLA reduction proposed by the Republican plan. It would allow full COLA increases in fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988 after a 6-month delay in fiscal year 1986.

There will be no cuts in Medicaid, and no cuts in low-income housing programs for the elderly, handicapped, and disabled.

The Administration on Aging is fully funded and the Food Stamp Program is protected.

Republican cuts and structural changes in civil service retirement are rejected, and it stops the elimination of 17,000 staff positions in the Social Security Administration.

The point is this, Mr. President: Let us get some revenues from those who have not been paying anything. Let us get some savings from the Pentagon, which has been immunized in the past from budget restraint. If we get both those things, plus substantial restraint on domestic spending, then we think the elderly will be ready to help, too.

If the rest of the Nation sets an example of fairness, senior citizens will join them. But let us not ask the elderly to lead the way. Let us just ask them to follow the same road.

Mr. President, I think it is essential that we include in this budget a well-designed economic growth initiative which covers our major needs for export promotion, science and technology, developing workers skills for a new industrial era, and promoting competitiveness and innovation. If I were the only one who felt that way, I would still make it a part of any budget I proposed.

But, Mr. President, I can tell you there are many who feel we need to do that.

Listen to George A. Keyworth, President Reagan's science adviser. In January, he asked this question:

> Basic research is funded primarily by the government for a very good reason—because who else is going to do it?

He went on to tell the Christian Science Monitor we had to "sustain the Government's role in basic research and, more importantly, strengthen it." The President's science adviser says it, but his budget does not do it.

And I agree with Samuel Ting of MIT. Dr. Ting won the 1976 Nobel Prize in physics. He is obviously one of the best. And here is what he has to say about competition in technology. He said, "I have to go where the best science can be done."

Let us just hope we have sense enough and vision enough to make sure the best science stays in the United States.

And listen to one more scientist. His name is Leon Lederman and he is the head of Illinois' Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory. He says this:

> The consensus has been that we are in danger of falling behind . . . What kind of signal will be sending to students if the great science is done elsewhere?

That is a good question. And we had better be able to tell our students the great science will be done here.

Mr. President, getting ready for the future is a keystone of our alternative budget plan. And here are some of the highlights.

First—and this is the major premise—it ties serious deficit reduction with a positive program for economic growth. It will give us something to reach for, not just something to run from.

Second, consistent with that aim, it will provide a war chest for the Exim Bank to tackle predatory credit practices used on the United States by foreign competitors.

I am among those who have offered legislation to encourage the Japanese to reduce trade barriers to American goods. What puzzles me is why some in Congress want to cut back on Exim Bank funding without making it a more effective tool to help American producers enter foreign markets.

The country must grow. It's got to reach out for markets. It's a continuing effort, and our economic future depends on our ability to produce here and sell overseas. Why try to pull down the shades over the future by pulling the plug on Exim now?

Third, we will invest funds in research for computer development, for math and physics, biotechnology and biomedical research, and in space and energy. And the aim in all that is to put the weight of the Federal Government behind an effort to do the basic kind of work that private industry and business can use to create new and marketable products.

Mr. President, it seems to me the Federal Government has always played a constructive part in getting the Nation ready for its future. Whether it was the Northwest Ordinance which encouraged the building of schools, or the Morrill Act of 1862, or the Space Program, the Government made commitments that helped the Nation improve itself.

Who are we to turn our backs on a tradition that is not only proud but proven?

Fourth, we will invest adequate funds to develop and safeguard our natural resources as a necessary companion to industrial growth.

And fifth, we will invest nearly $1 billion to help educate and train a work force that must have the skills to find and master the new high-tech jobs.

What better investment can the Nation make in its own security than helping to equip people for the world in which that 25 percent of our adult population is functionally illiterate, not able to deal with the everyday demands of present society. Do we not have some obligation to the people of this Nation—not to hand them a ticket, but at least give them a chance to read it?

We must be ready to put some money in today, to get some results back tomorrow. That is an American tradition. And it has helped to make America strong. We must make sure it gets stronger.

Mr. President, I shall not describe in detail all the features of this plan, but let me summarize some of the ways in which domestic programs are treated.

In Medicare, it will save $12 billion over 3 years, but will not involve increased costs to beneficiaries.

Farm programs will contribute seven billion dollars worth of savings over the next 3 years, rather than the $18 billion proposed by the White House. This plan reduces rural programs by 15 percent over 3 years, but that is quite a contrast to the 40-percent cuts in the leadership package.

The strategic petroleum reserve will stay in business at a fill rate of 40,000 barrels per day, but will still be reduced in cost by $4.1 billion over 3 years.

Guaranteed student loans will be restrained by $200 million in fiscal 1986, but benefits to students will not be cut.

Important Government programs will be cut, but not decimated. The aim of this budget plan is to get a firm grip on spending, make actual reductions, make people get the most out of dollars spent. The program is disciplined, but not arbitrary.

And one more thing to remember. This package rejects the either/or argument about deficit reduction. The administration argues the deficit can be reduced solely by cutting spending. And the administration also argues that some people think the only way to cut the deficit is to increase taxes.

Neither one will work by itself. This country needs to make an all-out effort to cut the deficit with a judicious and effective use of all the tools at our disposal.

I hope my colleagues will examine the plan carefully, match it against the other alternatives and not overlook these essential facts. In fiscal year 1986 the deficit will be reduced by $46 billion. Using CBO forecasts, it will balance the budget in 5 years.

Imagine that, Mr. President: A plan that balances the budget in 5 years. We have not had anything like that run through here in a while, and we will not find that in the leadership package.

I ask my colleagues to examine the plan we have offered. We simply have to do the best we can, and this plan gives us that chance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD tables and other material detailing this budget package.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN VERSUS REPUBLICAN LEADERSHIP PLAN

Growth initiative: Plan offers a positive vision for economic growth and competitiveness. Provides room for investments in export promotion, science and technology, labor force development, resource protection, competition and credit. Republicans cut or freeze programs in all these areas, and endorse administration policies of not enforcing antitrust laws and of encouraging nonproductive mergers and acquisitions.

Deficit reductions: Chiles-Hollings plan produces a balanced budget in 5 years.

Deficit reduced $46 billion in fiscal year 1986 ($59 billion using OMB accounting).

Deficit reduced $270 billion in 3 years ($320 billion using OMB accounting).

Deficit of $86 billion in fiscal year 1988 ($132 with CBO economics: $13 billion lower deficit than Republican Leadership Plan in fiscal year 1988.

Revenues: Spending reduced $2.50 for every $1 raised. $12 billion in revenues in fiscal year 1986; $72 billion over 3 years.

Chiles-Hollings plan saves $72 billion by reducing growth in tax expenditures; requires everyone to pay a fair share, but not raise individual tax rates.

Protection for poor and elderly: Republicans cut many key programs—child nutrition, Medicaid, Veterans health care, education of the disadvantaged, housing for the elderly and handicapped—increase beneficiary out-of-pocket costs for medicare, Chiles-Hollings plan protects all these programs.

Defense: Republicans take no real sacrifice in Defense, adding $10 billion of real growth on top of a $10 billion inflation adjustment in fiscal year 1986—exert no pressure to reduce excessive spending by contractors. Chiles-Hollings plan eliminates real growth and requires savings from reform of progress payments to contractors.

Farm programs: Republicans force drastic cuts of $18 billion, including $4 billion in first year, which requires immediate cuts in credit programs. Overall, Republicans cut 41 percent of spending for rural programs over 3 years. Chiles-Hollings plan makes substantial but fair savings of $7 billion.

Other domestic programs: Republicans totally eliminate key programs like rural housing, Amtrak, Small Business Administration, UDAG, Strategic Petroleum Reserve, Rural Electrification, postal subsidy.

THE CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

DOMESTIC SPENDING RESTRAINT BEYOND FREEZE

COLA's: Half-year freeze, full COLA's in fiscal year 1987–88. Reject structural change of COLA formula, protect principle of full and fair COLA. Exempt means tested programs for low income (SSI, Food Stamps, Veterans pension and compensation). 15 percent offset to protect low-income—no means—test required for Social Security.

Medicare: Provider freeze, no increased costs to beneficiaries. Save $12 billion or 5 percent over 3 years.

Farm programs: About one half Republican cuts or $8 billion over 3 years. Cuts 12 percent from baseline, versus Republican 35 percent cut.

General revenue sharing: Phaseout after 1986. Saves $8.5 billion.

Small Business Administration: Savings from Weicker-Bumpers compromise of $2.5 billion over 3 years.

Farmers Home Administration rural housing: 25 percent cut, versus Republican elimination.

Rural electrification: 25 percent reduction in loan programs in fiscal year 1985 and fiscal year 1986; further restraint in fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988.

Transportation: Senate-passed highway bill; 10 percent cut in Transit and Amtrak.

Community development block grants: 15 percent cut, protect UDAG and targetted programs.

Public housing construction: Return to tax-exempt financing, in place of costly direct loans.

Veterans: Reduced rate of new hospital construction; inflation adjustments are provided to maintain current services in operating medical facilities. Increase VA housing loan fees to 2 percent in fiscal year 1986.

Civilian pay: One-year freeze in fiscal year 1986; 3 percent pay raises in fiscal year 1987–99. Delay within grade increases one year; 1 percent workforce attrition.

Foreign aid: Reduce foreign information and exchange to 1983 levels, a 24 percent cut, as opposed to Republicans 12 percent increase. Freeze or reduce aid to countries other than Israel and Egypt for 5 percent savings, against Republican adds. Full request for Israel and Egypt funded. Saves $13 billion over 3 years, $2 billion deeper cut than Republicans.

Export-Import Bank: Saves $7.4 billion in BA, $3 billion in outlays over three years by replacing direct loans with interest rate subsidy and more effectively targetted "War Chest."

Strategic petroleum reserve: Save $4.1 billion over three years by limiting oil purchase to 40,000 barrels per day, as opposed to Republican 3-year moratorium.

Guaranteed student loans: Similar dollar savings as Republican ($.2 billion or 5 percent in fiscal year 1986) but no cuts in student benefits, only hit lenders.

Agency administrative accounts: 15 percent cut in overhead costs, against 10 percent in Republican plan.

Medicaid: Savings of $1.0 billion over five years are assumed from requiring states to collect payments from private health insurance policies held by Medicaid recipients.

Community service block grant: Reduce funding for the Community Service Block Grant by 20 percent; require states to share in the costs of program which has been 100 percent federally-funded.

Soil conservation: 10 percent cuts in soil conservation, against 25 percent in Republican leadership plan.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Provides an inflation adjustment of $10 billion in FY86 over the FY 1985 appropriated level. Allows 3% real growth in FY87 and FY88.

A. Investment: The Chiles-Hollings Plan would increase the investment accounts (procurement, research and development and military construction) by $5 billion over the FY 1985 levels. After inflation, these accounts have nearly doubled since 1980 growing in real terms by over 92%. As a result in FY 1985 these accounts comprised 47% of the total DoD budget. This is a post World War II high.

1. Procurement: Permits a $3.8 billion increase over the FY 1985 enacted level. After inflation, this funding level represents a 100% real increase over FY 1980. In real terms, it is $27 billion higher than the peak year of the Vietnam War and $32 billion higher than the peak year of the Kennedy buildup.

2. Research and Development: Permits a $1.3 billion increase over FY 1985 which permits robust growth in the SDI account and other high priority research programs. After inflation this funding level represents an 80% increase over FY 1980. In real terms, it is $9 billion higher than the peak year of the Vietnam War and $8 billion higher than the peak year of the Kennedy build-up.

3. Milcon/Family Housing: Permits a $800 million increase over the FY 1985 level. After inflation, these accounts will grow by 68% over the FY 1980 levels.

B. Readiness:

1. Military Personnel: Permits increases to fund high priority quality of life programs, annualization of the FY 1984 pay raise and first year implementation of the G.I. Bill. It would deny the requested advanced July FY85 pay raise. Freezes pay in FY86 and permits 3% January pay raises in FY87 and FY88. Holds military personnel strengths at FY 1985 levels.

2. Operations and Maintenance: Permits increase in operations and maintenance purchases to allow forces to operate at FY85 levels and absorb additions to the force structure programmed for FY 1986. It would deny the 5% FY 1986 civilian pay cut and freeze civilian pay in FY 1986 and permit 3% January pay raises in FY 1987 and FY 1988. It would hold civilian personnel strengths at FY85 levels. In FY 1985, after accounting for inflation, these accounts are $9 billion higher than the peak year of the Vietnam War.

C. Progress Payments:

The Chiles-Hollings Plan includes $5.9 billion in outlay savings from the recently instituted DoD policy to return to return cash payments for work in progress on DoD contracts to the rates in place prior to 1981. The Grace Commission claimed $9 billion in three year savings from this policy reform. CBO estimated the three year savings to be $6.2 billion. The savings in the Chiles-Hollings plan are based on more conservative estimates in the recently completed DoD Inspector-General's report on progress payments.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

The Chiles-Hollings proposal assumes the FY 1986 program level for the discretionary appropriated accounts in this function is set at the FY 1985 level. For FY 1987–1988, these accounts increase based on projected inflation. All reductions suggested by the President below a freeze are accepted. Additional adjustments are listed below.

Export-Import Bank loan programs are set at the $1.25 billion level in budget authority in FY 1986. These funds would be used to replace the direct loan program with an alternative more capable of countering specific export problems. This proposal would allow for a larger and more flexible interest rate subsidy program than that contained in the Republican Leadership Plan. It would also establish a specially appropriated "war chest" for exceptional circumstances when U.S. exporters face predatory financing by other export credit agencies or mixed credit packages of guarantees and foreign aid grants.

Accept the President's military aid increases for Egypt and Israel. The function totals are increased by $525 million FY 1986 budget authority in order to accommodate the military aid requested by the President for Israel and Egypt. All other security assistance is frozen in 1987–1988.

Includes the President's proposed increases for augmenting embassy security in 1986–1988.

Consolidate less effective foreign assistance. Within the overall foreign assistance effort, a number of narrowly focused programs have been established at the behest of American interest groups. Some of these programs have outlived their usefulness, or are more appropriately funded through private contributions. This proposal would reduce or merge funding of several smaller programs, as proposed by the President. Non-Israel and Egypt foreign aid and State Department operations are approximately $300 million below the Republican Leadership Plan in FY 1986.

Cut foreign information and exchange activities to FY 1983 levels. Appropriations for the United States Information Agency and like programs increased 73 percent between FY 1980 and FY 1985. (An additional 22 percent increase is requested by the President for FY 1986). Much of the growth is related to a $1.5 billion multiyear expansion of radio broadcast facilities and a doubling of international exchange visits. This proposal would defer the expansion of facilities until the $160 million already appropriated for that purpose has been used, and return funding for exchange activities to the 1983 level. This proposal is some $200 million below the Republican Leadership Plan.

Includes the enacted supplemental for African famine relief and the President's supplemental requests for embassy security and payments to certain multilateral development banks.

A $1.5 billion supplemental to deal with Israel's current economic crisis is included.

Major differences from Republican leadership plan

The Republican Leadership Plan replaces the Export-Import Bank direct loan program with the interest rate subsidy program originally proposed by the White House.

The Republican Leadership Plan increases foreign aid and State Department programs some $700 million above a freeze in 1986.

Foreign information and exchange activities are reduced $300 million below the Republican Leadership Plan which is at baseline levels. The Chiles-Hollings plan allows a $500 million outlay savings below a freeze in 1986–1988.

The Republican Leadership Plan does not provide for the FY 1985 supplemental for Israel.

The Republican Leadership Plan allows for growth above inflation in 1987 and 1988 for level-of-effort foreign aid programs. The Chiles-Hollings proposal freezes security assistance in 1986–1988, saving over $700 million in outlays from the Republican Leadership plan in 1987–1988.

Programs in growth initiative

The Chiles-Hollings plan includes a $1 billion "war chest" for export promotion and to counter predatory financing by other export credit agencies or mixed credit packages of guarantees and foreign aid grants.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

The Chiles-Hollings proposal provides a real increase in funding for a Science and Technology initiative, including:

Development of a new, unmanned orbital maneuvering vehicle (OMV) and increased funding for space shuttle operations (+$443 million in BA above a freeze in 1986; +$473 million in outlays above a freeze in 1986–1988). Increases are partially offset by decreasing space shuttle acquisition costs.

Three percent real growth in general science and basic research to bolster science programs needed to maintain America's relative advantage in the sciences and support a competitive economy in an increasingly technical world marketplace. These funds will also be used to help supply state-of-the-art laboratory equipment to universities. (+$168 million in BA above a freeze in 1986; $1093 million in outlays above a freeze in 1986–1988).

Major differences from Republican leadership plan

The Republican Leadership Plan calls for an across-the-board freeze in function 250. The Chiles-Hollings mark protects against inflation and increasing costs associated with space flight activities. The Chiles-Hollings mark also provides sustained real growth in general science and basic research and pursues new space station development whereas the Republican Leadership plan indefinitely defers space station deployment.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Freezes most energy programs at 1985 levels with 3% growth in 1987 and 1988.

Reduces uranium enrichment technology program due to duplicative funding of two competing technologies.

Limits Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil purchases to 40,000 barrels per day in 1986–1988. Saves $4.4 billion in budget authority from 1986–1988.

Defers by three years construction of the Big Hill facility in Texas (needed to complete the 750 million barrel reserve).

Includes $215 million science and technology initiative. Accelerates magnetic fusion and solar research and fully funds uranium mill tailings remedial action program. Increases acid rain and alternative fuels research.

Reduces Rural Electrification Administration direct loan and loan guarantee programs by 25% in 1985 and maintains that level for 1986. Loan levels are adjusted for inflation in 1987 and 1988.

Major differences from Republican leadership package

Fossil energy program frozen rather than reduced 10%.

Energy supply program (includes research on fusion, fission, solar and renewable energy) increased rather than reduced 6%.

Uranium program reductions of similar magnitude.

Strategic Petroleum Reserve continued at reduced rate rather than eliminated.

No Federal Energy Regulatory Commission fees as recommended by Domenici.

Growth initiative

Provides an additional $235 million over 1985 levels to accelerate research seeking to develop permanent, environmentally safe energy sources such as nuclear fusion and solar research and cleanup of abandoned sites contaminated by uranium mill tailings (+$73 million). Increases acid rain research by 50% and significantly increases alternative fuels (e.g. methanol) research. Shortsighted budget reductions lulled by temporarily low oil prices will have serious ramifications for energy research. The nuclear fusion program, for example, is within 2 years of a major scientific breakthrough (e.g. energy break-even), after 20 years of research; this milestone would be postponed indefinitely under the Administration's proposed budget reduction. The Chiles proposal would fully support this critical research.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Provides a 45% increase in the Superfund program over 1985 levels to support a vigorous cleanup program. Most major projects in the "pipeline" would be funded and design studies would be accelerated. Includes an additional $118 million over 85 levels for hazardous waste and water supply and treatment research and development and EPA enforcement. Other programs in the function are frozen.

Major differences from Republican leadership plan

Freezes soil and water conservation programs instead of reducing them 25%.

Freezes public land acquisition programs rather than reducing them $140 million in 1986.

Freeze of Bureau of Reclamation programs rather than $80 million reduction.

No reductions in National Park Service.

Freeze of Corps of Engineer programs rather than $150 million reduction in 1986.

Provides additional funding for state grants to support sport fishery.

Growth initiative

Doubles research funds for hazardous waste and water supply. Potential projects include: research examining the transport and fate of hazardous chemicals, groundwater contamination, new hazardous waste technologies, safe levels of chemicals found in drinking water supplies, new drinking water treatment systems, desalinization of water supplies, and water supply management techniques and protection of wetlands.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Freezes most agricultural research and extension programs at 1985 levels with 3 percent growth in 1987 and 1988.

Saves $6.6 billion in farm price supports over three years. Moderate savings could be achieved in a variety of ways, including:

20 million acre conservation reserve.

Reductions in dairy price support levels.

Tiered deficiency payments (e.g. full price protection for the family farmer). Reduced nonrecourse loan rates.

$25 million biotechnology initiative as recommended by the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges.

$15 million water quality initiative to research means of controlling nonpoint sources.

Minor reductions in agriculture credit programs ($400 million over 3 years) which could be achieved by lowering the loan limitation or imposing a moratorium on farm ownership loans for new homeowners.

Major Differences from Republican Leadership Plan:

No major credit reductions and crop insurance phase out as recommended by the Republican leadership.

Less severe reductions in farm price supports than under the Republican package.

Growth initiatives

Biotechnology agriculture research initiative (+$27 million over 1985). Additional funding is needed to accelerate research intended to increase agricultural productivity through the use of biologically engineered organisms.

Nonpoint source research (+$15 million over 1985). Nonpoint sources constitute a major water quality problem. This initiative would provide additional funds to examine means of controlling agricultural runoff through careful conservation practices.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Freezes Section 202 housing program at last year's 12,000 unit level. Achieves savings in Small Business Administration programs pursuant to Small Business Committee reported S. 408. Further reductions in SBA program levels are assumed in accordance with the Weicker-Bumpers compromise package. Taken together, changes in the SBA accounts would (1) eliminate all direct lending with exception of modest programs for the handicapped, veterans and minority small business investment companies; (2) freeze Small Business Investment Company and reduce section 503 development loan company programs (3) require private financing participation in loan guarantees programs and (4) would achieve further savings in salaries and expenses and in the surety guarantee program.

Major differences from Domenici

Republican Leadership package terminates the Small Business Administration and sells agency's loan assets, terminates all housing programs under Farmers Home Administration and eliminates all appropriations for revenue foregone postal subsidy except subsidies for free mail to the blind.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Requires a 10 percent reduction from the baseline in all programs, with the exception of the Coast Guard, Highways and the Panama Canal.

Mass Transit: The 10 percent reduction in transit assumes the continuation of operating assistance and Section 3 New Starts.

FAA: The reduction for aviation programs may require a stretch out of the National Aerospace System plan.

Amtrak: Assumes a 10 percent reduction in Amtrak subsidy. Funding cut will require some limited service reduction or the reprogramming of capital funds intended for system improvements.

Coast Guard: Adds $50 million to baseline for increased drug interdiction efforts. Funds to be used for additional necessary patrol boat operations and for capital funds to buy C-130s.

Panama Canal: Held at baseline level of $456 million in 1986. Reduction would result in profit payments to Panama.

Highway Trust Fund: Reduced by $500 million from baseline of $15.3 billion. Reflects Senate action on S. 391.

Conrail: $1.2 billion reflected in Function 400 for the sale of Conrail. A legislative provision will be required in the Conrail sale to insure that receipts are not offset by new tax advantages to Norfolk Southern.

Construction-Differential Subsidy: Assumes the payback of construction-differential subsidy loans in return for removal of restrictions on certain tanker vessels to engage in domestic trade. Savings equal $200 million in outlays in 1986.

Major differences from Domenici

Republican Leadership terminates Amtrak funding. Also under proposal mass transit operating subsidies are phased out over 5 years and capital grants are cut to $1.7 billion by 1988. Interstate transfer grants to be funded from Highway Trust Fund with remaining Programs trimmed 25 percent.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Plan assumes 15 percent reduction in CDBG program and termination of Section 312 rehabilitation loans and the CDBG loan guarantee program. Savings are achieved in SBA disaster loans pursuant to S.408 plus the Weicker-Bumpers compromise package. All other community development initiatives including UDAG, EDA Appalachian development programs, housing development grants and Farmers Home rural water and sewer development programs are frozen.

Major differences from Domenici

Republican plan cuts Community Development Block Grant 10 percent below current policy baseline in 1986 through 1988; terminates Urban Development Action Grants along with community development block grant loan guarantee program and section 312 rehabilitation loans; terminates rental development grants; imposes 2-year moratorium on rental rehabilitation grants; terminates Economic.

Development Administration and Appalachian Regional Commission, but continues funding for Appalachian highway programs out of highway trust fund; reduces funding for TVA and Bureau of Indian Affairs; and terminates Small Business Administration disaster assistance programs and transfers SBA disaster loan portfolio to the Treasury for liquidation.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Overall Function Level

The mark assumes savings of $4.4 billion in budget authority and $2.8 billion in outlays over three years. This mark is an investment in the future. Programs targeted to low-income children and youths, the handicapped, and the elderly receive protection against inflation. This will prevent cutbacks in services and caseloads. Increased funding is also provided for programs which facilitate labor force adjustments to structural change in the economy. Most other discretionary programs are assumed frozen at the FY85 level, with some savings in the Community Service Block Grant. Entitlement savings are assumed in the Guaranteed Student Loan Program.

Discretionary Programs

Head Start: Reject the President's proposal to freeze funding at FY85 level; instead assume a full inflation adjustment in FY86 to prevent cutbacks of services or participation levels by about 20,000 pre-schoolers. (FY86: BA +$51 million; Outlays +$23 million).

Compensatory education for disadvantaged children: Reject the President's proposals to freeze grants to local education agencies and for cutbacks in migrant education programs. Assume full inflation adjustment in FY1986 to prevent cutbacks of services or participation levels by over 200,000 children. (FY86: BA +$185 million; Outlays +$13 million).

Math/Science/Foreign Language Education: Reject the President's proposal to freeze funding for this new program. Double the current funding level to ensure that tomorrow's workforce can face technological challenges with a solid grounding in math and science skills and foreign languages. (FY86: BA +$100 million; Outlays +$7 million).

Handicapped Education: Reject the President's proposal to freeze grants to local education agencies and for cutbacks in research and personnel training. Assume full inflation adjustment in FY1986 to maintain current services, required by PL 94-142, to 4 million children. (FY86: BA +$66 million; Outlays +$3 million).

Student Financial Assistance: Reject the President's proposals to implement a cap at $4000 for subsidized grants and loans, to reduce funding for Pell Grants, to stop funding of state student incentive grants and the National Direct Student Loan program, and to combine and reduce funding of supplemental opportunity grants and the college work/study program.

Instead, the mark assumes a full inflation adjustment for Pell Grants in FY86. The mark also assumes a $276 million supplemental in FY1985 to cover the shortfalls in the program. (FY86: BA +$167 million; Outlays +$33 million).

Rehabilitation Services: Reject the President's proposal to freeze funding for the Vocational Rehabilitation State Grant program. Assume full inflation adjustment in FY1986 to ensure that 930,000 physically and mentally handicapped individuals receive the services which will enable them to become gainfully employed. (FY86: BA +$52 million; Outlays +$44 million).

Job Training Partnership Act: Reject the President's claim that carryovers in Summer Youth Employment and dislocated workers' programs justify large cutbacks beginning in FY85; rejects the President's proposal to eliminate the Job Corps program and to freeze funding for state grants for the training of disadvantaged youths and adults (Title IIa programs); assume partial inflation adjustment in FY86 to maintain training programs for disadvantaged youths and adults and workers dislocated by structural changes in the economy. (FY86: BA +$55 million; Outlays +$17 million).

Currently, JTPA contains a 3% set-aside for the retraining of older workers, particularly those threatened with the obsolescence of their skills. States have been slow in establishing such programs. Appropriations language is urged to strengthen technical assistance from the Department of Labor to states establishing older worker programs.

Community Service Employment for Older Americans; Reject the President's proposal to freeze funding for employment of older Americans. Provide full inflation adjustment in FY1986 to enable the continued employment of 91,000 older Americans. (FY86. BA +$14 million; Outlay +$2 million)

Bureau of Labor Statistics: Increase funding to BLS to strengthen data collection—both in those areas weakend by prior cuts and to facilitate the development of National Job Bank. (FY86: BA +$10 million; Outlays +$10 million)

Commission on Labor-Force Development: This commission would consist of representatives of labor, business, and government. The commission would identify changes in labor force skill requirements and methods to upgrade skill requirements. Such a commission would foster the cooperative environment necessary to facilitate workers' adjustment to technological change. (FY86: BA +$2 million; Outlays +$2 million)

Administration on Aging: Rejects the President's proposal to freeze at FY1985 level; instead, assumes a full inflation adjustment in FY86 to prevent cutbacks in supportive services or elderly nutrition programs. Providers of food programs might have to reduce the number of meals by 10.1 million without this increase. (FY86: BA +$33 million; Outlays +$23 million)

Community Service Block Grant: Assumes a 20 percent reduction. Requires states to share in the costs of the program which has been 100 percent federally-funded. (FY86: BA −$73 million; Outlays −$51 million)

Entitlement Savings

Guaranteed Student Loan Program: Rejects the President's proposals to increase the cost of loans to students and to restrict eligibility. Accept, with some modifications, proposals for administrative cost-savings. (FY86: BA −$150 million; Outlays −$140 million).

Major difference from leadership

The leadership's package requires savings of $12.4 billion in budget authority and $6.9 billion in outlays over three years. The additional savings are achieved by freezing program funding at FY85 levels or by cut-backs and terminations of selected programs.

Elementary and secondary education: On the Senate floor, the leadership plan was modified to include additional funds ($221 million or inflation plus) for handicapped education, vocational rehabilitation, and development disabilities. The leadership plan still does not provide an inflation adjustment for programs targeted to low-income children—such as compensatory education. Instead, it freezes funding for these programs. The leadership mark also freezes funding for Math-Science Education, halting the growth of this new, vital program. Finally, the leadership package proposes the termination of impact aid, part B.

Higher Education: The leadership package would cut student aid by $1.1 billion in FY86. Most of the cuts ($917 million in FY86) are concentrated in the means-tested student financial aid programs. The leadership mark achieves similar savings as the Chiles mark in the guaranteed student loan program. However, the leadership mark hits student eligibility, whereas the Chiles' mark assumes only administrative cost-savings.

Job Training and Employment: The leadership mark contains no inflation adjustment for training programs targetted to disadvantaged youths and adults. Instead, it retains all of the President's original proposed cuts in job training programs (−$1.1 billion cut in FY86 divided chiefly among Job Corps, Summer Youth Employment, and Dislocated Workers programs). The leadership mark also assumes the termination of the Work Incentive Program. The leadership mark goes further than the President's original budget, by assuming a one-third reduction in funding of the Employment Service. The leadership package would cut funding for both Community Service Employment for Older Americans and the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Social Services: The leadership mark contains no inflation adjustment for Head Start and the elderly nutrition programs. Instead, it maintains current funding levels for these programs, likely causing reductions in caseload and service levels. The leadership mark also assumes the termination of the Community Service Block Grant, which supports the community agencies which operate the Head Start and low-income energy programs, among other services.

Cultural Activities: The leadership mark assumes a $100 million reduction in cultural activities, including the termination of the Institute of Museum Services and cut-backs in the National Endowments of the Arts and Humanities.

List programs in research and technology initiatives

The Chiles/Hollings mark opposes cutbacks in education and training programs proposed by the President. The Chiles/Hollings mark furthers our commitments to investments in education and job training, by insuring that programs targetted to those "most at risk" do not suffer declines in participation or services.

The mark also facilitates workers' adjustment to technological change by increasing funding for the training of dislocated workers. Data collection on labor markets and the dissemination of this information is improved by restoring funds to BLS and by the establishment of a National Commission on Labor-Force Developments.

Head Start (FY86: BA +$51 million; Outlays +$23 million).

Compensatory Education (FY86: BA +$185 million; Outlays +$13 million).

Handicapped Education (FY86: BA +$66 million; Outlays +$3 million).

Math/Science/Foreign Language Education (FY86: BA +$100 million; Outays +$7 million).

Rehabilitation Services (FY86: BA +$52 million; Outlays +$44 million).

Pell Grants (FY86: BA +$167 million; Outlays +$33 million).

Job Training Partnership Act (FY86: BA +$55 million; Outlays +$17 million).

Bureau of Labor Statistics (FY86: BA +$10 million; Outlays +$10 million).

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

Medicaid savings of $0.5 billion over three years are assumed through requiring state collections from health insurance policies held by Medicaid recipients.

With the listed exceptions, most discretionary health programs are frozen for one year with three percent growth in 1987 and 1988.

NIH biomedical research and training is funded above baseline at 3 percent real growth (+$0.2 billion in BA in Fiscal Year 1986).

Some reductions are assumed for health professions education and training (−$0.1 billion in BA in Fiscal Year 1986), but training of health care personnel in priority research, technology development and advanced careers would be protected. Support for high level careers, such as advance nurse training and graduate traineeships in public health and preventive medicine would continue to supply those who will teach.

Major differences from Repubican leadership plan

The leadership plan would:

Adopt the President's proposal to impose a permanent growth cap on the biomedicaid program equal to the medical care CPI (−$0.3 billion in Fiscal Year 1986; −$2.0 billion over three years).

Cut beyond a freeze in the following programs:

NIH would be cut by $0.3 billion in Fiscal Year 1986, $1.2 billion over three years.

Indian health services would be cut by $0.1 billion in Fiscal Year 1986, $0.4 billion over three years.

All health professions training programs would be eliminated immediately, as requested by the President (−$0.2 billion in Fiscal Year 1986, −$0.8 billion over three years).

Cut the federal employees and civil service retiree health benefits program by $0.1 billion in Fiscal Year 1986, $0.4 billion over three years, by requiring insurance carriers to freeze physician fees for one year and institute a hospital payment schedule similar to the medicare prospective payment system.

Advances in biomedical research today determine how far into the frontier we will be tomorrow. How many scientists we train today determines our research capability tomorrow. Further, rapid changes in medical technology and care patterns require continual reshaping of our health education curricula. Cutbacks in these areas cannot be considered temporary—they affect all our future advances in medicine and health and biotechnology.

The plan funds basic and applied NIH biomedical research at a three percent real growth level. Full support for basic research could continue and a new commitment to applied research in areas with high marketplace potential could be made. Upgrading of research facilities and training of research scientists, engineers, and second level technicians would also be enhanced.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

This is the Chiles mark which was adopted unanimously by SBC on the first round, and applauded by Republican members as responsible spending restraint.

No increases in beneficiary paid premiums or deductibles. No home health co-payment. No eligibility delay.

Hospitals, physicians and other providers would have medicare reimbursement rates frozen for one year. (Only those physicians who do not agree to accept medicare as payment in full would be frozen.)

The indirect teaching adjustment for hospitals would be reduced by one-half over a phased-in period of three years (−$0.2 billion in FY 1986).

Current law provisions making medicare a secondary payor for beneficiaries and spouses covered by an employer health plan would be extended from the age 69 upper limit to all ages.

Major differences from Republican leadership plan

In addition to the provisions in the Chiles plan, the Republican Leadership plan:

Gradually increases medicare beneficiary monthly premium charges until they reach 35 percent of Part B program costs by 1990. An increase in beneficiary contributions of $3.4 billion over three years. Annual charge now is $186, under the plan annual charge would raise to $416 by 1990.

Institutes a new beneficiary co-payment for all home health visits in excess of 20 visits a year. An increase in beneficiary contributions of $0.3 billion over three years. The highest charges (up to $630 per year) would fall on those who have the most need for home health care.

Delays initial medicare eligibility by one month (−$0.8 billion over three years).

Increases the part B deductible paid by beneficiaries from the current $75 to $78 in 1986, reaching $92 by 1990 (−$0.2 billion over three years).

Reduces the indirect teaching adjustment for hospitals by one-half immediately (−$0.6 billion in FY 86). This cut is in addition to a freeze, and would mean direct payment reductions from current levels, primarily for those hospitals which take care of a disproportionate share of medicare beneficiaries and indigent patients.

The Republican Leadership plan would reconcile total medicare cuts of $3.8 billion in FY 1986, $5.9 billion in FY 1987, and $8.4 billion in FY 1988 for three-year savings of $18.1 billion. $4.7 billion of this total, 26 percent, would directly affect beneficiaries. Out-of-pocket costs for beneficiaries would increase at the same time social security COLAs would be reduced. The Chiles plan would reconcile total medicare cuts of $2.6 billion in FY 1986, $3.9 billion in FY 1987, and $5.2 billion in FY 1988 for a three-year total of $11.7 billion through provider restraint only.

CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

Major assumptions

COLAs would be granted for Veterans pension and compension programs, protecting both the low-income and the disabled.

The rate of growth in hospital construction projects would be slowed (−$0.2 billion in BA FY1986).

Direct medical services are kept at baseline levels, protecting the current level of services to veterans now utilizing the VA health care system.

Fees for veterans housing loans would be increased to 2% in FY1986 and would reach 3% in FY1988 (−$0.6 billion over three years).

No changes are assumed in education programs.

Additional unspecified savings of $0.3 billion in outlays over three years are assumed.

Major differences from Republican leadership plan

Chiles plan rejects following cuts required by Republican Leadership Plan:

Limits COLAs for both veterans disability compensation program and low-income pensions to two percent for the next three years. If actual inflation exceeds expected inflation in 1987 and 1988, the COLA could be higher than two percent, but it would still be below current law levels. (−$0.2 billion in FY1986, −$1.6 billion over three years)

Reduces medical services from current levels by $0.2 billion in FY1986, −$0.7 billion over three years, in addition to the hospital construction cutbacks. The plan specifically assumes enactment of legislation to apply a means test for medical care for non-service disabled veterans with annual incomes above $11,000 (for a single veteran; $15,000 for a couple). Between 200,000 and 250,000 projected VA hospital admissions per year would be eliminated. Less than 25 percent of these veterans, 50,000, would be eligible for medicare.

Assumes large savings from collections from private health insurance policies held by veterans (−$0.2 billion in FY1986, −$1.0 billion over three years). These reductions are over twice the amount CBO estimates could be achieved, however, if such legislation was enacted in conjunction with a medical care means test.

FUNCTION 050: DEFENSE

Since 1976, we have funded the largest and most sustained defense build-up in post WW II history.

In constant dollar terms the FY85 funding level was $81 billion over the peak year of the Kennedy build-up and $35 billion over the peak year of the Vietnam war.

Since 1978, when we reached a common understanding with our NATO allies to increase defense expenditures or outlays at a rate of 3 percent annually, we have exceeded that commitment every year. That surplus now stands at nearly $118 billion. In fact, had we held to that 3 percent spending commitment, defense outlays would have been approximately $40 billion lower in FY 1985.

In the past five years, we have doubled that portion of the defense budget going to investment (procurement and research and development).

Much of that increase has gone to an increase in the unit costs of major weapon systems and spare parts. During the first two years of the Reagan build-up FY81–83, unit costs for a number of major weapon systems rose dramatically. After inflation, the following weapons have increased:

45 percent for M–1 tanks,

64 percent for Bradley fighting vehicles,

58 percent for F/A–18 fighters,

36 percent for attack helicopters.

These increased unit costs have gone to increased profits for the defense industry. Aerospace industries of America report that their after tax profits in 1984 rose to $3.6 billion, an all time high.

New orders for defense goods in 1984 totaled $89.8 billion, up 10 percent from 1983. Shipments of defense goods in 1984 had an aggregate value of $72.4 billion of the excess of orders over shipments, the backlog of unfilled orders increased from.

As a result of the excess of orders over shipment, the defense industry's backlog of unfilled orders which are a real indication of future profits, rose from $113.8 billion in 1983 to $131.1 billion in 1984.

In defense industries, the ratio of unfilled orders to monthly shipments is 19 months. By contrast this same ratio for non-defense goods was four months.

In December 1984, capacity utilization in the electrical machinery industry was 91.6 percent, well above its average of 80 percent and high enough to lead to spot shortages and increased delivery times.

In 1984, DOD's balance of funds obligated but not expended from the procurement accounts totalled 105 billion which is greater than the FY1985 enacted procurement appropriation. In other words, DOD's procurement backlog is greater than its request for new orders.

Despite these historical highs in spending, profits, backlogs and budget deficits, the administration requested a $30 billion increase this year. Now they have agreed to accept a $20 billion increase but they are portraying it as a significant "cut" by using an out of date baseline (Rose Garden).

If they used CBO's baseline, the FY86 outlay "reduction" would be $6 billion not $18 billion and the three year reduction would be $46 billion not $97 billion.

FUNCTION 150: OVERALL FUNCTION TOTALS

Since 1980, this function has been one of the fastest growing areas of the Federal budget—foreign aid alone has grown 70 percent since Ronald Reagan took office.

Since 1980:

Military assistance grants have grown 632 percent;

Foreign military assistance sales credits and grants increased 153 percent;

The economic support fund grew by 78 percent;

The U.S. Information Agency budget increased by 87 percent; and State Department salaries and operational expenses increased by 99 percent.

In 1986, the President again asked for substantial growth in 1986, specifically:

An 18 percent increase in the military assistance program;

A 14 percent increase in foreign military sales credits; and 22 percent more for USIA.

The Republican leadership plan continues this pattern of growth. Their plan is $800 million above my proposal in foreign aid, State Department programs, and foreign information and exchange activities.

Furthermore, their plan includes over $100 million more foreign aid than included in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's foreign aid authorization bill.

FUNCTION 150: FOREIGN INFORMATION AND EXCHANGE ACTIVITIES

Appropriations for foreign information and exchange activities increased 73 percent between 1980 and 1985. Much of the growth is related to a $1.5 billion radio broadcast facilities upgrade program and a doubling of international exchange visits.

While cutting all sorts of major domestic programs, the Republican leadership plan calls for maintaining these programs above a freeze level.

The Chiles-Hollings proposal would defer expansion of radio and television facilities until the $160 million already appropriated for that purpose has been used and return funding for international visits to the 1983 level.

Our plan is $250 million below the Republican leadership plan in this area.

FUNCTION 150: ISRAEL-EGYPT

The President's 1986 request includes $400 million increase in military sales for Israel and $125 million more for Egypt. Our proposal protects this proposed increase. Furthermore, our proposal includes $1.2 billion in economic support funds which were not requested by the President. This is the same level provided by Congress in 1985.

The Plan includes a $1.5 billion supplemental that the administration is expected to send up to deal with Israel's present economic crisis.

The Republican leadership plan does not contain provisions for the 1985 supplemental.

FUNCTION 150: EMBASSY SECURITY

The Chiles-Hollings plan includes:

A $247 million supplemental for embassy security enhancements; and

The $150 million, three-year Embassy Security Augmentation Program included in the President's budget request is contained in the Chiles-Hollings mark.

FUNCTION 150: SUPPLEMENTALS

The Chiles-Hollings plan includes supplementals for:

Israel (+$1.5 billion);

African famine relief (+$784 million);

Embassy security (+$247 million);

Payments to multilateral development banks (+$207 million).

The Republican leadership plan does not include provisions for the FY 1985 supplemental for Israel.

Export-Import Bank Direct Loan Program

One of the greatest economic problems facing this Nation is the growing trade deficit. One of the greatest challenges facing this Congress is implementing policies and programs which will deal with the trade deficit.

So, I listen with interest to the concerns raised by the proponents of the Exim Direct Loan Program, and I sympathize with their concerns and their goals. But, lets cut through the myths that surround the Export-Import Bank Loan Program:

1. Nearly one-half of all Exim loan funds go to 5 highly profitable major corporations.

2. Over the past five years, Exim loans accounted for less than 2% of U.S. exports.

3. In the last two years, Exim has financed less than 1% of U.S. exports.

4. Between 1981 and 1984, the present value subsidy for Exim direct loans was $2.3 billion. Contrary to what has been claimed, the Exim Loan Program is not self-sustaining. It costs money. The bank projects losses from 1986 through 1990 will reach $2 billion.

5. Demand for Exim financing is significantly below authorized levels. In 1983, Exim only used 19% of their authorized lending ceiling. If you can't cut programs you're not even using, what can you cut? Commitments for loans for the first six months of 1985 have been only $276 million, in comparison to $347 million for the first six months of 1984, when total demand was just $1.5 billion.

6. The subsidy value of Exim direct loans could be covered by some 2% of the annual profits of the users of Exim loans. I don't think it's too much to ask a corporation like General Electric, which makes a $1½ billion profit, pays no taxes, and receives a $36 million tax rebate, to give up a little profit to finance the cost of its own export sales.

Since 1980, when the effective corporate tax rate for major corporation was supposed to be 16%, the five major corporate users of the Exim direct loan program had an average effective tax rate of less than 1%. These companies have an enormous economic advantage without Exim lending. This is worse than corporate welfare, this is corporate greed.

Here we are, debating major cuts in key programs, asking everyone to tighten their belts, to share the burden. And yet, what's proposed here is that with all this "belt tightening", we are asked to maintain a subsidized credit "boutique" for a handful of multi-billion dollar U.S. companies.

We do need better ways to address the U.S. trade balance. The best way to do this is to control our budget deficit and contain the relative strength of the dollar.

We believe we can address the trade deficit by arriving at a fair and balanced deficit reduction package and creating some new programs to address real trade problems.

We think these programs would include an Enchanced Interest Rate Subsidy program to provide a level of subsidy for financing where required, while eliminating the need for massive Treasury borrowing.

Additionally, we would create a specially appropriated "war chest" of $1 billion which could be used for those exceptional circumstances when U.S. exporters face predatory financing arrangements or unique long term financing needs.

A "War Chest" would be much more flexible than direct loans—which has not been serving the export community very well. For example, in 1984, Exim was approached to help counter "mixed credit" predatory competition in 21 cases covering $628 million in export value. Exim only offered help in seven of these cases, covering $166 million in export value.

Unlike the current Direct Loan Program, this "war chest" could be focused to help counter real trade problems. Worldwide mixed credit offers, for example, have grown 725 percent since 1980. France alone offered $1.6 billion in mixed credits in 1984. The "war chest" would give us resources to deal with this problem—the Direct Loan Program just gives a little bit to a few big corporations. A "war chest" would give us a resource pool to deal with these kinds of issues, and others, such as Japanese nontariff trade barriers.

Many of the friends of the Direct Loan Program say we shouldn't give up "A program that works" for untried alternatives. Well, I've got news for them * * * it doesn't work. The Direct Loan Program—which only supports 1.4% of U.S. exports—is utterly inadequate to deal with the trade deficit. It is time for something new.

Overall

The Chiles-Hollings proposal essentially holds the science, technology, and space function harmless against inflation and adds $514 million above inflation to provide funds for important general science and basic research programs, space flight and the new, manned space station.

Our plan provides 3 percent real growth (+$67 million above inflation) in general science and basic research programs. These programs are necessary if this country is going to retain the lead in the sciences that is necessary to be competitive in an increasingly technical world marketplace. These programs include:

The National Science Foundation;

Department of Energy general science and basic research efforts;

The U.S. Antarctic Program; and

Science and engineering education activities—including the acquisition of up to date laboratory equipment for schools and universities.

We also allow space flight operations to be funded at the level requested by the President. This is largely a fact-of-life change. After investing billions in the space shuttle we are going to use it.

Lastly, we propose to pursue development of the new, manned space station at the levels originally requested by the President. This adds $80 million in 1986 but will allow for launch in the early 1990's.

The Republican leadership plan does none of these things. After years of congressional support for enhancing general science and basic research programs, they propose a freeze. They also propose to indefinitely defer operational development of the manned space station which the President committed this Nation to only last year.

FUNCTION 250: GENERAL SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY AND SPACE

General science and basic research

In 1983, for example, the Federal Government provided $6 billion or 67 percent of the total national investment in basic research.

Key Civilian Basic Science and Research Programs are in the National Science Foundation and the Department of Energy's General Science and Basic Research Program.

National Science Foundation

The NSF maintains U.S. leadership in the sciences by funding research in all fields of science, supporting major user facilities in physics and materials research, maintaining the academic oceanography research fleet, five national astronomy centers, a National Atmospheric Research Center, as well as conducting the U.S. Antarctic Program.

In 1983, the NSF provided 24 percent of the total Federal support for basic research to academic institutions.

NSF provides 90 percent of the support for mathematics and anthropology research in universities.

NSF provides 75 percent of the support for Earth and Ocean Sciences in universities.

In other fields, such as chemistry and electrical engineering, NSF provides over 30 percent of the support for basic research in universities.

NSF also provides support for small science-based and technology-based firms to perform research in high-risk scientific and technical areas.

Republican plan

The Republican leadership plan proposes to freeze these key programs, ending years of congressionally supported growth.

Space station

The Chiles-Hollings plan provides sufficient funds to pursue development of the new, manned space station with an initial operating capability in the early 1990s.

Our mark includes $230 million for space station development in 1986 and a $1.2 billion increase in outlays over a freeze in the 1986–1988 period.

The Republican leadership plan freezes space station development at $150 million per year. This level is inadequate to allow serious development to proceed. The Republican plan will indefinitely put-off the launch of the space station which only a year ago, the President set as a national priority.

The Republican leadership plan calls for funding increases in defense, foreign aid and foreign information and exchange activities largely justified as being needed to retain America's "leadership" in the world. But their plan freezes the one real program needed to retain leadership in space.

We should remember the words of President John F. Kennedy over twenty years ago: "The exploration of space will go ahead whether we join it or not. It is one of the great adventures of our time and no nation that expects to be the leader of other nations can stay behind in the race for space."

FUNCTION 250: ECONOMIC BENEFITS OF SPACE INVESTMENT

For an $18 billion Federal investment in the Space Shuttle (of which 80 percent of national expenditures were recouped in the form of Federal, State and local tax receipts paid by individuals and companies working on the shuttle program) the economic "multiplier" effects have resulted in a direct return on investment which include: plus 1.3 million jobs; plus $37.6 billion in personal income; plus $28.8 billion in consumer spending; plus $45 billion in gross national product; plus $9 billion in Federal tax receipts; plus $6.3 billion in State and local taxes; and incalculable benefits in terms of long-term productivity, job creation, new goods and services, as well as other economic benefits.

Chase Econometrics estimates that NASA research and development funding has a social rate of return of 38 percent. This means that every $1 we spend on NASA R&D yields a $14 dollar return in economic benefits.

Chase Econometrics estimates that national employment also receives a significant boost by NASA research and development. For example, for $1 billion a year in NASA R&D, in the first four years 100,000 jobs are created. But, programs like the Space Station provide entirely new industries, new methods of production in manufacturing and new jobs. Chase claims that the productivity gains from an annual $1 billion investment in NASA R&D for the first four years of a ten year period, will create 800,000 new jobs by the tenth year.

The economic benefits of secondary applications of NASA technology are also impressive. One study lists as "spinoff" benefits from NASA R&D:

Improved gas turbines used in peak electric power production;

Integrated circuits for television sets, automobiles, and hundreds of household and industrial products;

Multi-layer superinsulators used on tankers to transport cryogens such as liquid hydrogen, helium and nitrogen;

Computer-assisted structural analysis techniques employed in the design of automobiles, aircraft, bridges, skyscrapers and a host of other structures; and Countless other "spinoff" benefits.

One of my Republican colleagues in the Senate summed it up very well when he said: "For those who are all for the social programs in terms of saying let's take one billion from technology science and put it into a social program, well, there is a great deal of evidence that the best way to improve America's social programs and America's welfare is to continue its course of scientific excellence. And if there is a program that creates that from top to bottom and generates more jobs and puts more people into physics courses in colleges and educates them, it is NASA and the Space Program."

FUNCTION 250: CHILES-HOLLINGS PLAN

DESCRIPTION

The Chiles-Hollings proposal provides a real increase in funding in science, technology and space programs as part of an overall growth initiative, including:

Development of a new, unmanned orbital maneuvering vehicle (OMV) and increased funding for Space Shuttle operations (plus 443 million in BA above a freeze in 1986; plus $473 million in outlays above a freeze in 1986-88). Increases are partially offset by decreasing Space Shuttle acquisition costs.

Three percent real growth in general science and basic research to bolster science programs needed to maintain America's relative advantage in the sciences and support a competitive economy in an increasingly technical world marketplace. These funds will also be used to help supply state-of-the-art laboratory equipment to universities. (Plus $168 million in BA above a freeze in 1986; plus $1.1 billion in outlays above a freeze in 1986-88).

FUNCTION 270: ENERGY

I. Chiles plan description

A. Overall function:

Saves $6.3 billion in RA and $5.3 billion in outlays over 3 years (FY86-88). 70 percent of the savings result from reductions in the strategic petroleum reserve oil purchases. Remaining reductions are in REA and uranium enrichment. Includes $200 million energy science and technology inititative.

Freezes most other programs at 1985 levels with 3 percent growth in 1987 and 1988.

REA assumptions same as Republican leadership plan.

B. Major programs frozen:

Energy conservation. Chiles plan does not assume use of oil overcharge funds to offset energy program levels.

Fossil energy research and development.

Power marketing administration.

I. Critique of Republican leadership plan (RLP)

A. Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Republican plan terminates the Strategic Petroleum Reserve oil purchases and indefinitely delays new construction, holding the oil fill level to 489 million barrels. Proposal is flawed in three ways:

Will be difficult to restart SPR once terminated even if resumption is merited by a deterioration in energy conditions. Current level of 500 million barrels provides 50 days less protection against oil disruptions than under current policy.

The level of insurance afforded by a 500 million barrel reserve diminishes over time as domestic demand increases (e.g. while 500 million barrels provides 100 days of supply now, it translates to 50 days of supply by the year 2000.

Sends the wrong signal to oil producing nations.

B. Energy Conservation. Republican plan reduces energy conservation activities by 14 percent and offsets new appropriations with use of oil overcharge funds.

Weatherizes 20,000 fewer dwelling units than in 1985; provides 120 fewer grants to schools and hospitals.

RLP estimates of oil price refunds are optimistic (RLP assumes $3 billion in revenues over three years, CBO estimates $600 million).

If RLP estimates are accurate, then California, Florida, Illinois, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Texas, each stand to lose $100-$300 million over 3 years if the Republican plan is adopted.

III. Chiles-Hollings plan

A. Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Saves $4.6 billion in BA over 3 years (oil purchases and construction) yet provides a credible oil purchase level and maintains steady progress towards the 750 million barrel goal. Provides 15 additional days of protection against oil supply disruptions by 1990 over the RLP plan. Reductions in SPR are proposed because of recent studies indicating that interest rates (e.g. Treasury's cost of borrowing to purchase oil) are rising at a higher rate than oil prices; it is therefore cheaper to minimize oil purchases now, than to continue current policy.

B. Energy Research and Development and Conservation. Chiles plan makes no reductions in these areas. Temporarily abundant oil supply cannot substitute for independent, permanent and environmentally safe domestic energy sources; 4 years of budget reductions have set back this goal and level or increased funding is needed to rebuild the programs.

FUNCTION 300: NATURAL RESOURCES AND ENVIRONMENT

I. Description of the Chiles-Hollings plan

A. Overall Function. Freezes most programs at 1985 levels with 3 percent growth in 1986 and 1987. Provides 45 percent increase in the superfund program (+$0.3 billion) in 1986. Superfund funding levels are equivalent to the President's budget. However, revenues under Chiles-Hollings are set equal to revenues needed to support S. 51 ($7.5 billion in BA over 5 years). Revenues are higher than spending because superfund cannot effectively spend the major budget authority increases proposed in S. 51 in the near-term, due to pipeline constraints. However, over the long-term sufficient revenues should be provided to support the levels proposed by S. 51. Soil conservation programs reduced 10 percent; $100 million in growth initiative.

B. Major programs frozen: EPA Wastewater Treatment Program; National Parks Service; Corps of Engineers; Bureau of Reclamation; Soil and Water Conservation; no recreation user fees; and public land acquisition.

II. Critique of Republican leadership plan

Superfund program levels 45 percent below administration's request and less than half the $1.5 billion level reported by the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee on a virtually unanimous vote. Of 2,000 sites currently on or projected to be on the national priorities list; action has only been completed on 11 sites.

Reduces public land acquisition following four years of severe budget cutbacks. Budget outlays for national park land acquisition have dropped 77 percent since 1978 and the number of acres purchased has decreased by 90 percent.

Will double or triple user fees at national parks (e.g. Yosemite entrance fees could rise from $3 to $9.) High entrance fees are regressive and inequitable.

III. Chiles plan

Superfund Chiles plan provides maximum increase the program can effectively absorb in 1986 given the current "pipeline" of projects awaiting construction. Chiles plan is $500 million above the Republican leadership package and $250 million above the President's budget.

Growth initiative provides additional funding to accelerate research on hazardous waste cleanup technologies, drinking water treatment methods, and EPA enforcement.

FUNCTION 350: AGRICULTURE

I. Chiles/Hollings plan description:

A. Overall function. Saves $7.6 billion (BA) over 3 years (86-88); $7.6 billion in outlays. 87% of the savings occur in the farm price support area. No reductions in farm credit. Other programs frozen with 3% growth in 1987 and 1988.

B. Major programs frozen:

Agricultural credit programs. FmHA ownership, operating and disaster loans.

Agricultural research and extension.

II. Critique of the Republican Leadership Plan [RLP]:

Equity. Agriculture programs comprise less than 2% of baseline outlays but are slated for nearly 8% of the cuts under the Republican leadership plan in the first year (6% over 3 years). By contrast, under the Chiles/Hollings plan agriculture programs receive less than 1% of the total deficit reductions in the first year and 3% over 3 years.

Agriculture credit: Republican leadership plan shifts from direct to guaranteed lending during a period of extreme financial distress to farmers. Studies of the family-size commercial farm indicate that: 43,000 farms owing nearly 10% of the debt are technically insolvent. Few could survive another year without assistance; an additional 50,000 farms, owing 11 percent of the debt, are moving quickly towards insolvency; as many as 136,000 farms, owing 26% of the debt, will have serious financial problems; the shift from direct (insured) to guaranteed loans could have a significant impact on the availability of credit. USDA statistics indicate that the shift in funding mechanism will result in a 40% decline in the number of loans. In addition, the guaranteed loan market is significantly different from the direct loan borrower. Guaranteed loan users generally have a higher net worth, lower off-farm income and are older than insured borrowers. Thus, while the total level of loans remains stable under the Republican leadership plan who gets those loans could be very different.

Crop Insurance: Republican leadership plan proposal to phase-out the Federal Crop Insurance Program will have a severe dampening effect on participation and may lead to the demise of all-risk crop insurance. Before Federal involvement, crop insurance existed for only a few limited purposes (e.g, hail). Without the Federal subsidy, its availability may be very limited. Average premiums could rise from $6.55 per acre to $20.07 per acre; an increase of 325%.

III. Chiles/Hollings plan:

Equity agriculture will share equally in deficit reduction.

Targetting of Benefits: One method of achieving the savings enumerated in the Chiles/Hollings plan is better targetting of direct benefits to the family-sized producer. Currently most benefits flow to larger producers:

Less than 2% of corn producers receive 9% of direct benefits;

Less than 3% of cotton producers receive 15.6% of direct payments;

One percent of wheat producers receive 12% of wheat deficiency payments.

Savings could be achieved under the Chiles/Hollings plan through two-tiered direct payment mechanisms (e.g., full price protection for the family farmer and a lower rate for the larger producer). This would reduce the marginal incentive to produce and target benefits to those who need it. The two-tiered system would provide full price protection for 72% of farmers, yet allow movement towards a market oriented approach for the larger producer.

Promotes environmental objectives savings under the Chiles/Hollings plan could also be achieved through the establishment of a 20-30 million acre conservation reserve. Under this proposal, fragile agricultural lands would be placed into long-term retirement in exchange for federal payments; 600 million tons of soil could be saved, while the federal government would recoup $800 million over 3 years.

FUNCTION 370: COMMERCE AND HOUSING CREDIT

By spreading the burden of spending reductions across all programs, this mark continues all existing commerce and housing assistance in function 370 at fair and realistic levels. All programs are frozen in 1986 except the following:

SBA—accepts spending recommendations proposed by the Committee on Small Business to reform and streamline SBA direct lending programs. S. 408 eliminates the bulk of SBA direct lending and freezes salaries and expenses. In addition, this mark reduces SBA's Federal financing bank financial programs and requires that small business investment companies sell their federally guaranteed debentures directly to private credit markets rather than to the FFB.

This mark recognizes that SBA fulfills a vital role in providing financial and technical assistance to the small business sector of our economy, and it provides funding that insures that the agency can continue to carryout its mission.

The Chiles mark, in addition to rejecting termination of SBA, rejects the proposed sale of the agency's loan portfolio. Estimates indicate that such a sale could result in a significant loss to the Treasury, based on OMB estimates of the market value of SBA assets, compared to SBA's historic collection data.

The Chiles mark rejects the proposed termination of rural housing programs administered by the Farmers Home Administration. Farmers home plays a vital role in getting needed housing assistance to rural Americans in search of decent, affordable shelter.

This proposal rejects shifting the responsibility for rural housing programs to the Department of Housing and Urban Development which has neither the programs, nor the administrative capacity to accept such a responsibility.

The Chiles mark rejects the logic that because HUD housing programs have been targeted for a disproportionate burden of deficit reductions measures over the past 4 years, equity demands that FmHA rural housing programs should now be treated "equally" unfairly.

The Chiles plan proposes funding the postal service revenue foregone subsidy at a freeze level in 1986. Despite claims to the contrary, the bulk of the revenue foregone assistance goes to religious, charitable, educational and other nonprofit institutions and organizations.

FUNCTION 400: TRANSPORTATION

The Chiles mark achieves savings of $5 billion over three years while funding all existing transportation programs at levels adequate to assure their continued effectiveness. With the exception of Coast Guard, highway and Panama Canal funding, all programs are cut 10 percent from the baseline.

Mass transit the reduction in mass transit funding assumes continuation of operating assistance in addition to section 3 new starts. This mark rejects the Republican leadership proposal to phase-out mass transit assistance over 5 years.

FAA the reduction in assistance for aviation programs may require a stretch out of the national aerospace system plan.

Amtrak assumes a 10 percent reduction in Amtrak subsidies. Funding cut will require some limited service reductions or the reprogramming of capital funds intended for system improvements. This mark rejects the Republican proposal to do away with all Federal aid to Amtrak.

Coast Guard in an effort to increase drug enforcement operations, this mark adds $50 million to the baseline for increased drug interdiction efforts and for capital funds to buy C-130's.

Highway-trust fund funding for highways reflects Senate action on S. 391, the Interstate Highway Funding Act of 1985.

That bill holds highway obligations at the fiscal 1985 level in 1987 and 1988. For 1986, the highway obligation ceiling is reduced from its 1985 level of $13.25 billion to $12.75, a savings of $1.7 billion in obligations below the baseline.

Conrail assumes sell of Conrail at cost of $1.2 billion. Assumes that a legislative provision will accompany the sale to ensure that receipts to the Treasury from the sale are not offset by new tax advantages to Norfolk-Southern.

Construction-differential subsidy assumes the repayment to the Treasury of outstanding principal and interest on ship construction differential subsidy loans in return for permanent right for certain tanker vessels to engage in domestic trade.

FUNCTION 450: COMMUNITY AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

This function is comprised mainly of relatively small programs serving a variety of vital urban and regional development needs. Many of these programs are targeted at some of the Nation's most depressed, poverty stricken areas. Few programs have been proposed for a funding reduction:

CDBG. Given a funding level of $3.5 billion in 1985, a 15 percent cut in CDBG, while lowering the program level, will not significantly disrupt activities funded with block grant dollars.

UDAG. Frozen at 1985 level.

FMHA water and sewer facilities program funded at last year's appropriated levels.

Appalachian regional commission programs and economic development assistance funded at 1985 level.

HODAG and rental rehabilitation programs are continued at a freeze level.

CDBG loan guarantee and section 312 programs are discontinued.

SBA nonphysical disaster loans. Accepts Small Business Committee recommendation to terminate nonphysical disaster assistance. Elimination of this program has been suggested by both the SBA administrator, James C. Sanders and John Sloan, president and chief executive officer of the National Federation of Independent Businesses. Nonphysical disaster assistance of SBA is poorly defined and targeted and is duplicative of other support prgrams. In addition, effective October 1, 1985, farmers would be required to seek disaster assistance from the Farmers Home Administration.

FUNCTION 500

Impact of a freeze

The Republican leadership package would freeze funding for key education, employment, training, and social service programs.

Without protection against inflation, there will be reductions in caseloads and services in key programs, particularly those targeted to the poor, handicapped, and the elderly.

As a consequence of a funding freeze, participation could drop by as many as 20,000 children in Head Start, 200,000 children in compensatory education progams for the disadvantaged, 52,000 disadvantaged adults and teenagers in training programs, 3,900 older Americans in community service employment programs.

As a consequence of a funding freeze, program operators of elderly nutrition programs could reduce the number of meals provided by 10.1 million—or reduce the nutritional value of these meals.

My amendment will provide enough funding to maintain current service and participation levels.

FUNCTION 500

Termination of the community service block grant

This grant funds the 1070 local agencies which operate many of the Federal programs targeted to low-income households. (E.g., Head Start, low-income energy assistance).

CSBG moneys are used primarily for administrative costs and the provision of services not provided by the existing Federal programs.

The Republican leadership argues that services provided by this program could be funded instead by the social service block grant.

Allocation of SSBG funds does not have to be based on any income measure. As a consequence, there is no assurance that the community service agencies will continue to be funded.

Under 1981 reconciliation, funding levels for SSBG were capped—starting in FY1984—at $2.7 billion. Terminating CSBG will place further pressure on these funds.

A recent GAO study found that States did not offset the cutbacks in CSBG funding which occurred in the early eighties. This, according to GAO, was not surprising given the States' limited historical involvement in administering similar service programs. As a consequence, many community service agencies had to cutback on the provision of services.

It is very possible that if the program is now completely eliminated, States will not make up the difference. Under our plan, funding would be cut by 20 percent, but States would now be required to offset the loss.

FUNCTION 500

Guaranteed Student Loan Program savings

The Republican leadership package contains about $700 million in savings over three years from the guaranteed student loan program. My amendment contains the same dollar savings.

The Republican leadership package assumes that some of those savings are achieved by cutting student eligibility for loans. The GSL Program can be cut without further restricting student eligibility or increasing the costs of loans to students. We did enough of those changes in 1981.

It's time to recognize that there are other beneficiaries of the GSL Program besides students. Both lenders and State guarantee agencies have received excessive subsidies under the program.

Since 1976, lenders have been guaranteed a yield on student loans at a rate 3.5 percentage points over the current three month T-bill rate.

This rate seems high when the Federal Government stands 100 percent behind these loans.

High yields are not justified by the costs of administering the program. With increased automation, the costs of operating the program should have markedly declined since 1976.

Lenders are finding this a very profitable program. Lenders engage in advertising, direct mailings, and even give-aways to attract student borrowers.

We can reduce the special allowance by half a percentage point and still retain enough lenders in the program. We can also require lenders to disburse loans in two checks and save the Government money by only charging interest on the disbursed amount.

State guarantee agencies have also done well under the program. The agencies have reserves of over $700 million. These reserves are greatly in excess of the risks that the agencies bear. The Federal Government pays off most of the defaulted loans. The Federal Government bears the risk.

Yet the Federal Government exempts most agencies from sharing default costs. I urge restoration of the 80 percent mandatory reinsurance rate so that agencies also share in the risks of defaults. Collections by the State agencies should improve as a consequence.

The Federal Government also subsidizes the administrative costs of State agencies. This subsidy can be reduced by half, and the agencies can be required to return advances forwarded by the Federal Goverment.

Cuts in job training—overview (detail on job corps, dislocated workers follows):

The Republican leadership cuts total funding for job training partnership activities by 29 percent. The plan terminates Job Corp; cuts training programs for dislocated workers by 55 percent; cuts summer youth employment program by 29 percent; freezes, for second consecutive year, grant for the training of disadvantaged adults and teenagers (title IIA).

The Republican leadership plan terminates WIN (provides training for 30,000 AFDC mothers, as well as $41 million in child-care and supportive services for working mothers).

The Republican leadership plan cuts funding for employment service by one-third.

The Republican leadership plan claims that WIN and Job Corps participants can be served by the State grant program (title IIA) for the training of disadvantaged teenagers and adults. However, they do not increase the funding resources of this program.

Under the Republican leadership plan, title IIA would be frozen for the second consecutive year. As a consequence of a two-year funding freeze, participation could drop by as many as 100,000 from 1984.

The recovery has not diminished the need for this program. Throughout the recovery, the unemployment of black teenagers has never fallen below 40 percent. (Current rate: 42 percent) at 15.2 percent, the unemployment rate of black adults is over double that of white men.

Yet, a survey of localities finds that they can serve less than five percent of the eligible disadvantaged population with the existing funding levels for training programs.

Early reports point to the success of JTPA title IIA programs. Placement rates are on average much higher than anticipated or as set forth in Federal standards: 70 percent versus a 58 percent standard for adults and 68 percent for teenagers versus a Federal standard of 41 percent.

The high placement rates have nurtured the enthusiasm of the private sector. A national association of business study shows that the local private industry councils have become actively involved in the selection of types of training and service providers. Because the jobs for which participants are trained are ultimately to be found in the local business community, the active participation of the PIC's is requisite for the countinued success of the program.

Will this enthusiasm continue if we continue to strain the limited resources of the PIC's by terminating other job training programs?

FUNCTION 500

Cuts in student financial assistance

The Republican leadership plan cuts $3.8 billion over three years in all student aid programs (including the Guaranteed Student Loan Program); of this amount, $3.1 billion would come from cuts in the means-tested student assistance programs such as Pell grants.

Cuts in discretionary student assistance programs are derived by the imposition of three policy changes:

(1) To prove independent status, a student would have to meet eligibility criteria for two years prior to school year (−$192 million);

(2) In the calculation of needs analysis, allowable educational expenses would be capped at $8000 (−$377 million); and

(3) Reductions in the Pell grant error rate (−$117 million).

The numbers in parentheses are the portions of the cuts in FY 1986 attributed to each of the policy changes. These are OMB estimates, and there is no available documentation explaining their derivation.

The Republican leadership plan is based on these OMB estimates.

CBO has released an analysis of proposed changes in student aid. They find savings in the Discretionary Student Aid Program only equal $200 million if the leadership plan is enacted.

Over 400,000 students will lose aid as a consequence of proposals according to CBO. Most of these will come from families with income over $50,000. This implies OMB over-states the impact of the $8,000 CAP.

CBO is projecting a shortfall of $667 million in funding in the Pell Grant Program for school years 1983-84, 1984-85, and 1985-86. The Republican leadership plan does nothing about these shortfalls. Benefits will have to be reduced to make up the difference.

FUNCTION 500

Cuts in job training: dislocated workers

The Republican leadership plan cuts training funds for dislocated workers by 55 percent.

The Republican leadership claims that funding can be reduced because of the recovery:

The problems of dislocation are "structural," not "cyclical:" They remain despite the recovery. The manufacturing sector has recovered only about 70 percent of the jobs lost during the 1981-82 recession.

The problems of dislocation extend far beyond the manufacturing sector—from the rust bowl to the dust bowl. Several Midwestern States, including Iowa, Minnesota, and Kansas, have extended the criteria for title III participation to include farmers who, because of bankruptcy or an inability to obtain credit, are being forced off the land. Of course, the Republican plan will drive more farmers off the land by their drastic 41% cut in farm programs.

In the first quarter of 1985, GNP grew at a rate of only 1.39 percent. The sluggish growth reflects the growing tide of imports which threaten American jobs.

OMB claims that funding can be reduced because of large unanticipated carryovers of funds from prior fiscal years.

But a new study, conducted by the Westat Corporation for the Department of Labor, finds that these carryovers are overstated.

According to the Westat study, the carryovers are artificial, caused by the way States are contracting for the provision of services to dislocated workers. In many cases, States use performance-based contracts, with payment to providers following only the placement of trainees in jobs. In other cases, expenditures from some projects are reported only after the completion of the project. This insures we get what we pay for in the program, but the Republicans would penalize the States for efficient management.

Both OMB and the Republican leadership claim that funding can be reduced because trainees have required less expensive services than anticipated.

Many program operators provide only job counseling and lessons on job search techniques to dislocated workers rather than actual training. We do not yet know of the long-term effects of this decision. It is quite likely that workers would benefit more in the long-term with a greater emphasis on retraining.

Last month, Federal supplemental compensation expired. We must offer a viable training alternative to the long-term unemployed.

FUNCTION 500

Cuts in job training: Termination of Job Corps

Job Corps provides comprehensive training and services to poor, unemployed, out-of-school youths aged sixteen to twenty-one. Currently, there are about 107 residential training centers where enrollees receive remedial basic education, vocational skill training, extensive supportive services, and job search skills.

The Republican leadership claims that the program should be terminated because it is too expensive.

The OMB claims that each one of the 40,500 Job Corps slots costs the taxpayer over $15,000 a year and compares this figure unfavorably to the cost of sending a student to Harvard.

However, more than one person fills a Job Corps slot in a given year. Nearly 100,000 teenagers benefit from Job Corps a year at an average cost of $6,170.

Benefits from the program exceed costs by at least 39 percent—a very good return on our investment.

The most recent evaluation by the Mathematica Research Corporation shows that participation in Job Corps is associated with:

An increase in employment by more than four weeks a year;

An increase in earnings by at least 15 percent;

A 25 percent increase in the probability of earning a high school diploma;

And reduction of more than four weeks per year in recipiency of public assistance and unemployment insurance benefits.

Moreover, these benefits persist over time.

The Republican leadership claims that Job Corps participants can be served better under the Job Training Partnership Act state grants for disadvantaged teenagers and adults.

While both title IIA grants and Job Corps serve disadvantaged teenagers, Job Corps is targeted to a much more difficult a portion of this population. Job Corps participants need the comprehensive services offered by the program.

The Republican leadership plan does not contain increased funding for title IIA grants to handle displaced Job Corps participants.

Some have suggested that instead of terminating Job Corps, funding for the program could be reduced by closing some centers which have fallen into disrepair.

The five year projection of costs for needed repairs in Job Corps centers equals $158 million. Of this amount, only $19 million is required for essential repairs (i.e., those which correct life-threatening situations or code violations).

FUNCTION 550

Chiles plan description

Provides for $36.1 billion in budget authority and $35.8 billion in outlays for health.

For the whole function, this is a reduction in baseline budget authority of $0.2 billion in 1986.

Small savings in Medicaid from collections from private health insurance held by Medicaid recipients (−$0.5 billion over 3 years.)

In general, all discretionary health programs would be frozen at 1985 levels for one year with three percent inflation allowed in 1987 and 1988.

Exceptions:

Biomedical research and training are funded at a three percent real growth level. Total NIH funding would be $5.5 billion (+$0.2 billion above baseline in 1986) to allow room for a new growth initiative in applied research in areas with high marketplace potential.

A 50 percent reduction is assumed for health professions training and education (−$0.1 billion in BA in 1986), half the reduction proposed by the republican plan.

With the new growth initiative in biomedical research and technology, the total amount of discretionary health funding which would come under the appropriations cap would be $10.7 billion in budget authority in 1986. This is $1.0 billion above the republican leadership plan.

No changes are made in the federal employees or civil service retirement health benefits program.

Issue: Medicaid cuts

The Republican leadership plan:

Originally adopted the President's proposal to place a permanent cap on the Medicaid Program. Cuts would have been 300 million dollars in 1986—2 billion dollars over three years. Since the plan came to the floor, Senator Packwood added back 800 million dollars in 1987 and 1988.

The Medicaid cap that was going to cost each and every state millions of dollars—that was going to unfairly penalize those states wanting to improve their programs and maybe provide medical care to kids who might be five years old or a little older.

I am glad to have that squarely on the record from the chairman of the Finance Committee.

But, again, where are the cuts he would leave in Medicaid going to come from? The amendment still would cut Medicaid by 1.2 billion dollars over three years (compared to the President's proposal to cut it 2.0 billion dollars over three years).

One proposal that has been circulating, one that might be a workable idea, is to set out new Medicaid rules which would force all States to collect all payments they can find from private health insurance coverage held by Medicaid recipients. The GAO has issued a report recommending that be done.

But we also know that CBO says you could get no more than 500 million dollars over three years from some action like this.

That leaves another 750 million dollars over three years that the amendment's sponsors would say are "unspecified" savings. Where will that come from?

There are a number of ways you can get these additional Medicaid savings—all of which involve reductions in State payments.

Maybe it won't be a permanent cap—but it will be reductions in State payments.

The Chiles-Hollings plan:

Recognizes that Medicaid has already been cut by almost 4 billion dollars over the last four years.

Cannot justify further large cuts in low-income programs.

Assumes savings of $0.5 billion over three years from requiring States to collect payments from other health insurance held by Medicaid recipients.

Issue: Cuts in health professions education and training

The Republican plan:

Eliminates all programs immediately.

Is advertised as cutting out training programs for physicians who are in oversupply and therefore is no longer a wise expenditure. However, physician training is only part of these programs.

Also completely eliminated would be support for graduate programs in health administration and public health, physician assistant and nurse practitioner programs, and special health education initiatives in geriatric care. Area health education centers, designed to increase health care in areas with extreme shortages, would be eliminated. All advance nursing training and nursing research grants would be eliminated.

Even if there are some policy decisions made about a reordering of our priorities and comitment to support for health professions training, it is hardly fair to eliminate all programs immediately without any opportunity for either universities or students to make an adjustment.

The Chiles-Hollings plan:

Allows for some gradual changes in our commitments to health professions training programs and would protect a continued investment in priority areas. Among those would be advanced training programs and continued development of new curricula for our medical schools and public health schools. Rapid changes in medical care and approaches toward public health make it unwise to withdraw support.

Issue: National Institutes of Health

The Republican plan:

Would cut NIH funding well below a freeze level—$0.1 billion below.

Long-standing research projects at major universities might have to be abruptly terminated. This was acknowledged by the NIH Director at recent Appropriations Committee hearings.

Congress appropriated funds last year sufficient to fund 6,500 new and competing research awards in 1985 and 1986. The plan would cut back that number by 1,000 grants to a total of 5,500. The General Accounting Office has challenged the legality of the President's earlier decision to administratively cut back the new grant awards to a level of 5,000—and in the meantime funds from the 1985 appropriation are not being awarded. The research community is already in a turmoil and some decisions will soon need to be made.

Biomedical research is a long term proposition. Cutbacks cannot be considered temporary. They affect all our future advances in medicine and health and biotechnology. What we learn through research today determines what our frontiers will be tomorrow. How many scientists we train today determines our entire research capability tomorrow.

The Chiles plan:

Allows effort to prevent and cure disease and disability to continue at full funding levels.

Makes a new commitment to spur advances in biomedical research as part of a science and technology growth initiative.

We should be looking for new relationships with the private sector to make a commitment to applied research in areas with high marketplace potential. The U.S. is the recognized leader now in biomedical and biotechnical science, with the largest investment in basic research. We lag behind other nations, however, in applied research with marketplace applications. Other countries (Japan for instance) use our knowledge base and apply it to developing marketable goods and services. Example: Research funded by NIH can help develop new drugs and pesticides, improve food production and nutrition, and even spur the development of the computer industry.

FUNCTION 570: MEDICARE

Issue: Increases in beneficiary out-of-pocket costs

The Republican leadership plan:

The original plan would have increased Medicare beneficiary out-of-pocket costs for health care by $5 billion (three year total), at the same time cutting Social Security benefits by $22.6 billion (three year total of 2 percent COLA reductions). Would increase premiums and deductibles, add a new home health copayment, and delay eligibility for one month.

Though the recent Packwood amendment added back about $1.8 billion over three years, it was a cosmetic action. Beneficiary out-of-pocket costs would still have to increase by $3 billion or more (three years).

Every one of these four items has been debated and rejected by Congress before at least two or three times. They are another example on how the White House pads the budget each year with proposals they know are not acceptable to Congress.

Under the White House plan, premiums paid by beneficiaries each month for Medicare coverage, deducted from Social Security checks, would increase each year until they reached 35 percent of program costs by 1990 (they now total 25 percent of program costs). Premiums are now $186 a year. Under the plan they would be $205 in 1986, $299 in 1988, and would reach $416 by 1990.

In the amended Republican leadership plan premiums would still increase to 30 percent of program costs.

The original plan claimed, correctly, that no monthly Social Security check would be reduced as a result of the premium increase on top of the Social Security COLA reduction. However, most or all of the "guaranteed" 2 percent COLA that was being granted under the plan over the three years would have been eaten up by the premium increase for 3.2 million Social Security beneficiaries who have small Social Security benefit amounts (under $260 a month). That number does not include those elderly who are enrolled in a state Medicaid Program, who do not have to pay the premium themselves. All of these 3.2 million will get caught. We don't know what their total incomes are, but many, not all, are going to be very old, and probably women, with very little other income.

Even with a lesser premium increase, if there is any Social Security action there would be similar effects.

The plan would also increase the annual medical insurance deductible paid by Medicare beneficiaries from $75 to $92 by 1990. It would continue to increase every year.

The plan would add a new co-payment for home health services. After 20 visits, there would be a new charge of $4.80 per visit next year. It would increase every year, reaching $6.25 per visit by 1990. This sounds small, and the administration says most Medicare beneficiaries would not be affected. But 40 percent of all Medicare beneficiaries, over 450,000 people, use more than 20 visits a year—230,000 beneficiaries would have new expenses of well over $100 per year; 60,000 people would have charges well over $600 a year.

Congress has rejected the proposal to delay initial Medicare eligibility for three years in a row. That also doesn't sound so bad at first: If I turn age 65 on June 15, I would become eligible for Medicare on July 1, rather than June 1 as happens now. The proponents of the plan claim that most people would still be covered by other insurance—so it wouldn't make any difference even if they got sick during that period. But it was rejected because there was always a very troublesome group of people we couldn't find a way to protect. Even if we change the law and require all private insurance and Medicaid to extend coverage, there will still be between 150,000 and 200,000 new Medicare enrollees every year who will have no protection if they get sick.

The Chiles plan:

Rejects these increases in Medicare beneficiary out-of-pocket costs. Will not penalize Medicare beneficiaries for increases in health care costs, instead directing efforts to contain costs at the source.

Continues efforts at health care cost reduction and strengthening the Medicare trust fund by freezing providers for one year.

Issue: Hospital cuts

The Republican leadership plan:

Freezes payments to hospitals for one year—but then goes beyond that and cuts another $600 million in 1986; the additional cuts are $3 billion over three years.

These cuts are not cutting into profit margins of prosperous hospitals—they are the cuts that could force public hospitals to close their doors. Most of this additional cut would come from a 50 percent reduction in the "indirect teaching adjustment." This is now used to compensate hospitals that take care of more than their fair share of Medicare beneficiaries and poor people who have no insurance and cannot pay for care at all. Public hospitals, county hospitals, and large teaching hospitals have to absorb the costs of poor people refused by other hospitals.

The Republicans claim that the "indirect teaching adjustment," without justification, was doubled over what it previously was when the new Medicare reimbursement system was enacted two years ago. It pays for some of the costs of hospital interns and residents. But the change was made then specifically to adjust for large indigent caseloads until a better formula could be found. The prospective reimbursement legislation ordered the administration to find a way to make a better adjustment, but the administration has so far refused.

Using this indirect teaching adjustment is not the best proxy for indigent care and keeping public hospitals from closing their doors, but we can't cut it out completely until we find another way.

The Chiles plan:

Assumes that there will be a one-year freeze on hospital reimbursements—even though the congressionally appointed Prospective Payment Assessment Commission has recommended that there is an increase of 2.5 percent in hospital reimbursement rates for next year. Under the plan, hospital payments under Medicare would still be reduced by $2 billion in 1986 (−$9.3 billion over three years). That is a big enough cut.

Would have the same effect on the Medicare hospital insurance trust fund as the Republican leadership plan. Savings are still sufficient to ensure that the trust fund will be able to make payments well into the mid to late-1990's.

Because we know that the "indirect teaching adjustment" is not necessarily the best measure of taking care of the indigent care problem, the Chiles plan assumes that some additional savings will be made: −$200 million FY 1986, as opposed to −$600 million in the Republican plan. Even though this is still a cut on top of a freeze for hospitals, it allows room for the Finance Committee to make more appropriate adjustments.

The new prospective payment system for hospitals has already resulted in Medicare savings of several billion dollars. This would not have happened without the cooperation of hospitals. But the new system is not even yet fully implemented, and further adjustments will have to be made. A freeze is already tough medicine to take right in the middle of a transition to a new payment system. We could destroy the progress we have already made by going too far this year.

The Chiles plan is supported by the American Hospital Association. This is a good example of the kind of cooperation we have been getting from most hospitals on the tough issue of reducing Medicare outlays.

Medicare has already been cut by $40 billion over the last three years.

FUNCTION 700: VETERANS BENEFITS AND SERVICES

Chiles-Hollings plan description

Provides for $27.6 billion in budget authority and $27.0 billion in outlays for 1986. This is $0.1 billion below baseline budget authority in 1986.

Would grant COLA's for both veterans low-income pension and disability compensation programs.

Medical services would be funded at a level sufficient to provide for the program level appropriated in 1985 (194,000 full-time equivalent personnel) with some allowance for additional personnel for new VA medical facility activations (plus 2,000 FTEE); $9.4 billion in BA in 1986 is provided.

New medical construction projects would be funded below the baseline (minus $0.2 billion in BA in 1986), slowing the rate of new hospital construction.

Modest savings of $0.6 billion over three years are assumed and reconciled to the Veterans' Committee. This could be achieved either by requiring the VA to collect private health insurance payments from policies held by veterans using the VA health care system—or by increasing the VA housing loan origination fee to 2 percent in FY 1986, reaching 3 percent in FY 1988.

Other programs, such as medical research and grants to States for construction of State nursing homes would either be frozen or reduced slightly below baseline levels, as requested by the President and recommended by the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

No changes in veterans education programs.

Additional unspecified savings of $300 million in outlays over three years are assumed, consistent with the Cranston amendment.

FUNCTION 600: CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT
REPUBLICAN LEADERSHIP PLAN

My plan would make no changes to civil retirement (CSRS) other than a temporary one-year COLA freeze.

The leadership plan would make deep, permanent cuts in civil service retirement in addition to severe COLA cuts in all years.

The leadership plan would cut about $8 billion from CSRS over 3 years.

The leadership plan would raise the contribution rate for active Federal workers by 2 percent a year beginning in FY 87. In conjunction with a one-year pay freeze in FY86, this means a permanent reduction in Federal pay of 6 percent a year in real terms.

The leadership plan would delay survivor benefits for spouses of retirees or workers who die, if the spouse is under age 60 and does not have a dependent child under age 16. The benefit would be delayed until the survivor reaches age 60.

This proposal is inequitable because it would eliminate benefits to the survivor of a retiree even though the retiree had elected to take a reduced annuity at the time he retired from the workforce.

This proposal would change the rules precipitously for workers and retirees who had made financial plans on the basis of the provisions of current law.

The leadership plan would substantially increase the costs to the Postal Service for the retirement system of its employees. This would result in an increase in the price of postage stamps of several cents.

The leadership plan assumes $2 billion in unspecified savings over 3 years. What are these changes?

COLA's

The COLA policy proposed for Social Security and other retirement and disability programs would providing for COLA's in all years payable in January as under current law. The proposal would provide for a half-year COLA in January, 1986 and full COLA's in all years thereafter.

The January, 1986 COLA could be based on the change in the Consumer Price Index for half the preceding year. In all years thereafter, the proposed plan would provide for COLA's based on a full twelve-month change in the Consumer Price Index.

The proposal also provides sufficient funds (15 percent of the savings from the ½ year COLA freeze) to allow the Finance Committee to protect low-income Social Security beneficiaries as the changes described above are implemented. Finance Committee would be able to take account of coupled interactions among Social Security, SSI, Medicare, and Medicaid to insure no reduction in benefits for low-income elderly.

The half-year COLA freeze assumed in my plan is temporary. I do not support any permanent COLA reduction.

I believe that a half-year COLA freeze is fair because everyone must sacrifice if we are to bring this deficit down. We must achieve some deficit reduction from defense, from domestic programs, from Social Security, and from tax expenditures if we are to achieve our deficit reduction goal in a fair and balanced way.

A COLA reduction will strengthen the Social Security system for the rest of this decade.

Under current law, the solvency of the system still has very little margin of safety to protect it during the rest of the 1980's. In fact, the latest Social Security trustees report shows that under a plausible set of economic assumptions used by the Social Security actuaries, Social Security would not be able to pay full COLA's in a few years. If we have a very serious recession before then, the solvency of the system could be in even greater jeopardy.

It has been argued that Social Security is not contributing to the deficit now because income to the trust fund will exceed outgo for the rest of the decade. This ignores the fact that since 1972, the Social Security system has added more than $100 billion to cumulative deficits. It also ignores the fact that over the next six years about $30 billion will be drawn from a new source of general revenues that is being used to finance Social Security. These general revenues come from income taxation of benefits that are credited to the Social Security trust fund. No other program has such an arrangement.

Almost all of the general revenues flowing into Social Security result from the taxation of a portion of Social Security benefits for some beneficiaries. The Social Security Program is the only program in which revenues derived from taxation of benefits are cycled back into the program's trust fund. This does not occur for civil service retirement, or military retirement, or unemployment insurance benefits.

Social Security has the most liberal provisions regarding taxation of benefits of any retirement or pension program or benefit. For all other programs, the individual is fully taxes on all of his benefits, less the sum of any contributions he has made plus accrued interest. Social Security is much more liberal than all other programs because:

(A) Most Social Security beneficiaries are not taxed at all.

(B) For those beneficiaries subject to tax, at most only half their benefits are taxed. This maximum is far less than for other retirement programs or private pensions.

(C) For those who are taxed, most do not pay the maximum tax.

The President had previously argued that Social Security does not contribute to the deficit. Obviously, he must have changed his mind if he has now included Social Security COLA reductions in his deficit package.

My package would not require any increase in poverty as a result of the half-year COLA freeze for Social Security beneficiaries. Sufficient funding is provided to allow the Finance Committee to protect these low-income Social Security recipients. A requirement for means-testing of the COLA is not assumed in the plan, however.

The leadership plan would reduce COLA's by more than 2 percent a year in all years covered by this budget.

This cut would leave all retirees far worse off than they would be under a temporary half-year freeze. By the end of the three years, the reduction in a recipient's annual benefit would be 50 percent greater under the Republican plan than under our plan. And this larger cut would continue in each and every year after that, as long as the recipient or his survivor were alive.

The leadership plan would reduce Social Security benefits by $40 billion more than my plan would over the next five years.

The leadership plan could easily be converted into a permanent COLA reduction after being in effect for three years. If made permanent, it would result in a 20 percent reduction in the value of the average beneficiary's benefits over his lifetime and that of his survivor. At the end of the survivor's lifespan, he would receive a yearly benefit that is only 62 percent of the benefit he would be entitled to under current law.

The leadership plan would push about 600,000 persons into poverty according to the Congressional Budget Office.

In addition, the plan would reduce benefits for close to 3 million families who are already below the poverty line; this reduction would average $200 per year per family.

The leadership plan would cut benefits for close to 3 million more families who are near the poverty line, by an average of about $300 per year.

The leadership plan specifically assumes that supplemental security income benefits (SSI) would be increased in order to ameliorate the impact of the COLA cuts for low-income beneficiaries. Unfortunately, this strategy will not achieve its intended objective at all. According to CBO's analysis, none of the low-income Social Security recipients who would be hurt by the Republican Social Security COLA cut would be helped by the proposed SSI increase.

FUNCTION 920

The plan assumes a pay freeze for Federal civilian workers in FY86. This is consistent with assuming a COLA freeze for retired Federal workers and retired military personnel.

My mark assumes that pay raises will be given in January of each of the outyears. This is the same assumption which the Senate agreed to in its version of the first concurrent resolution on the budget last year. For the last two years, pay raises have been given in January, not October, 1986.

The plan does not assume the CBO baseline pay raise amounts for the outyears. These amounts increase to the point where 5 percent pay raises occur by 1989. The plan assumes, 3 percent growth in discretionary programs in the outyears. Therefore, for civilian pay raises, the plan also assumes 3 percent increases in the outyears. This is the same as the President's proposal for these outyear pay increases.

The plan assumes a 1 percent reduction in the Federal workforce through attrition. As annual attrition rates are much higher, this modest change can be absorbed without difficulty. The Republican leadership plan has a much more severe reduction: 4 percent.

The plan assumes a one-year delay in the waiting-period required for within-grade pay increases for Federal workers. Under current law, such raises are almost automatic, unlike typical private sector policy. The Republican leadership plan contains the same assumption.

The plan assumes a 15 percent reduction in administrative overhead for Federal agencies. This reduction would not affect salaries or benefits. The Republican leadership plan assumes a reduction in overhead as well, although their assumed reduction is 10 percent. At a time when we are asking all sectors of the country to "share the pair" of deficit reduction, a reduction in administrative overhead is one of the less painful ways to bring down the deficit.

My mark also assumes making permanent the minor change in the computation of pay-per-pay-period for Federal workers. This provision of law would otherwise expire at the end of this fiscal year. The Republican leadership plan also assumes that this provision becomes permanent.

Issue: COLA's for compensation and pension programs

The Republican plan:

The original White House/Republican plan reduced COLA's for both the low-income Veterans Pension Program and the Disability Compensation Program by 2 percent for each of three years.

This will result in a permanent reduction of benefits in each program by 6 percent per year in real terms.

This type of substantial, sustained COLA reduction over a period of several years can easily lead to permanent COLA reduction enacted into law at the end of this period.

Cutting COLA's in the Veteran's Pension Program will push some surviving spouse beneficiaries below the poverty line and will reduce benefits for other surviving spouses who are below the poverty line already.

The Chiles-Hollings plan:

Assumes full COLA's for veteran's pension benefits. This program is means-tested; the Chiles-Hollings plan does not assume a COLA freeze for any means-tested programs.

Continues the sound and fair policy of treating beneficiaries of the veterans' pension and the veterans' compensation program in the same manner. The Chiles-Hollings plan provides full COLAs for both programs.

Issue: Veterans medical services and construction

The Republican plan:

Cuts $2.1 billion from medical services over three years (−$0.6 billion in 1986).

Cuts will come from:

A means test for hospital care for most non-service-disabled veterans with incomes above $11,000 a year ($15,000 for a couple)

Legislation to require the VA to collect insurance payments from health insurance policies held by veterans and prohibiting insurance policy exclusionary provisions, and Slowing down the rate of new hospital construction.

The plan cuts $1.8 billion more from medical services over three years than the President first proposed. The new White House plan cuts $400 million more in 1986 alone.

Where will the cuts come from? There is a lot of confusion:

There is confusion about the means test proposal. The VA Administrator says that he and Budget Director Stockman agreed that any savings estimated for a means test are "funny" numbers and there would be no significant savings in 1986 from any proposal.

Then, after the plan was submitted by the White House, CBO said that it would save 400 million dollars in 1986 and as much as 4.8 billion dollars over five years. That is because 20 percent of all current veterans patients would lose eligibility for VA health care.

According to CBO, the means test would bar 105 thousand veterans from hospital admission next year (15 percent of the total VA hospital inpatient load) and 570 thousand from using outpatient services (19 percent of total outpatient clinic utilization).

The White House characterizes the means test proposal as introducing "fairness" into the system by applying the same standards of financial need for non-service-disabled veterans over the age of 65 as are now applied to those under age 65. But CBO estimates that only 25 percent of veterans losing eligibility for VA care under the legislative proposal would be age 65 or older.

While that 25 percent age 65 or older would be eligible for Medicare, it is very difficult to determine just who the other younger veterans are and what their total incomes are in relation to their medical expenses. If a veteran had high medical expenses, he could "spend down" and become eligible for VA medical care again. A CBO example: A veteran with one dependent, with an income of just under $20,000 a year, would have to spend $2,500 out of pocket on medical expenses before he would be eligible for any VA medical care.

The Chiles-Hollings plan:

Recognizes that some efforts need to be made to slow growth in the VA hospital system. New construction would be slowed.

Also recognizes that current medical services cannot be abruptly terminated. If changes are to be made there is time to plan for them.

Issue: Veterans Housing Program—increase in loan origination fees

The Republican Plan:

Increases the current fee of 1 percent of mortagage amount to 3.8 percent by 1988.

There has been a lot of waffling on this issue.

The President first proposed to increase the fee to 5 percent in 1986. This was discussed in Budget Committee and after everyone found out that the 5 percent fee would reduce loan originations by 61,000, and increase mortgage payments by 29 dollars a month (an increase of almost $11,000 over the life of an average loan), the Republicans backed down.

The next plan, in the SBC/Domenici resolution reported out of committee, increased the fee to 3.8 percent in 1986. That would still reduce applications by over 42,000 a year and increase payments by 18 dollars a month.

Now we have the new package to increase the fee to 2 percent next year reaching 3.8 percent in 1990. This is down to a much more reasonable level. Additional average monthly mortgage payments would be about 7 dollars next year.

The Chiles-Hollings plan:

Assumes some savings which, if the Veterans Committee decided to take in the Housing Program, would not have to increase the fee beyond 3 percent in FY1988.

F. 750/Administration of Justice:

Freezes all justice and law enforcement programs at FY85 levels in FY86. Adds inflation in the out-years.

Freezes both the Legal Services Corporation and the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Programs at last year's levels. (Does not terminate these programs as originally proposed by the President.)

Assumes costs associated with two new laws—the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 and the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeships Act of 1984.

The Chiles-Hollings plan totals are identical to the Republican leadership plan for this function (750).

Function 800/General Government:

Freezes all general Government programs at last year's levels in FY86. Adds costs of inflation in the out-years.

Rejects Republican leadership's plan to impose user fees on certain U.S. Customs Service operations.

Rejects Republican leadership's plan to levy fees on five Government-sponsored credit agencies when borrowing or issuing debt and pass-through securities from the Treasury.

(Five Government-sponsored credit agencies are:

1. Federal National Mortgage Association;
2. Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation;
3. Student Loan Marketing Association;
4. Farm Credit System;
5. Federal Home Loan Banks.)

Function 850: General purpose fiscal assistance:

Continues General Revenue Sharing Program at full funding level—$4.6 billion in budget authority—FY86. Assumes program is not re-authorized in FY87.

Assumes remainder of programs in this function are frozen.

Numbers for this function 850 are identical to Republican leadership plan for 3 years. The Chiles-Hollings plan takes into consideration the fact that many local government budgets are already locked in for FY86. This proposal will give localities time to plan for alternative funding.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I was merely going to ask the distinguished Senator from Florida if he could help me for a moment. As I understood it, when we decided yesterday to have the Senator's amendment up now and, at 3 o'clock Senator BYRD's, I understood that whatever time he used in support of his budget substitute would be charged to his side and whatever time we use in opposition would be charged to us.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, my understanding was that we were basically assigning 1 hour to our side and 30 minutes to the Senator's side.

Mr. DOMENICI. That is satisfactory with the Senator from New Mexico. If we do not use the half hour—and we do not intend to use our half hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator proposing a unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes, Mr. President. I ask, if it needs a unanimous consent in terms of our time on the resolution, that we be charged only the time we use in opposition to it.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I thought there were going to be 30 minutes——

Mr. DOMENICI. What I am proposing is up to 30 minutes if we use it, but we may not use the 30 minutes.

I am not offering it now, Mr. President. We shall confirm it later.

Mr. CHILES. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate the cooperation and leadership given by the Senator from Florida, and I am glad to compromise and join in the submission of this particular plan. To me this is the only comprehensive, across-the-board freeze plan that has been before the U.S. Senate this session.

Some 3 years ago, the distinguished majority leader, Howard Baker, approached me and asked that I submit my freeze plan. The evening before, President Reagan, somewhat nettled, had said, "If you don't like my particular program then put up an alternative or shut up." The next day we did submit our alternative. President Reagan and TIP O'NEILL both said, "Shut up" anyway. The President wanted more in defense, and TIP wanted more in social programs. That year we only received 16 votes. The year before last, Mr. President, our freeze plan received only 26, and last year, an election year, in a bipartisan move we received 38.

I wish to express my gratitude to those who have been working over the past several years for this budget freeze and particularly the members of the Budget Committee who supported this particular approach. It goes without saying that, had we adopted that freeze in 1982 we would already be looking at a balanced budget this year. But we did not do that, and now we are struggling, once again, to get a comprehensive, shared sacrifice plan.

I emphasize that we all must make a "shared sacrifice," because in my judgement the problem is so mammoth that a shared sacrifice is the only way to conquer it. The first thing our Government did this morning was borrow $500 million just to pay interest costs. It will do the same thing tomorrow, and on Friday, and on Saturday, and on Sunday, to the tune of $181 billion a year. The interest cost alone on our debt exceeds what it cost to run the entire cost of Government when this Senator first came to the U.S. Senate some 19 years ago. So, you can see, these deficits have gotten totally out of control. The challenge they represent calls for a sacrifice from every quarter.

If you could cut the deficits by just freezing the military, fine. If you could do it by just freezing social programs, and spending cuts as we call them, good. If you could do it without raising revenues, that would even be better. But it will take restraint on the part of revenues, entitlements, social programs, and defense. It will take restraint from all quarters.

It has been very difficult, Mr. President, to cohese here a bipartisan movement. I hope we can get some support on both sides of the aisle because of the posture taken of the leadership on the other side. Specifically, people should remember—and I am not speaking politically but factually—President Ronald Reagan submitted a budget that called for $118 billion in increased spending. Now, that budget was put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I want to save the Government printing bill. That is the only place it will appear in any governmental records. But the Congressional Budget Office went down each item of the President's budget and listed the increases in budget authority requested by President Reagan in his budget as submitted to the Congress this year. And despite the litany and the rhetoric of the State of the Union and the special appearances on TV talks about spending cuts, control, spending cuts, the actual fact is, Reagan was saying what old John Mitchell used to say: "Watch what we do, not what we say." We were being asked to increase spending $118 billion. That is why the President's budget was voted down by a vote of 18 to 4 in the Budget Committee.

Now, the compromise budget plan cut 6 percent real growth in defense down to 3 percent real growth and eliminated programs. It still requested $50 billion in cuts which amount to $30 billion in increased spending. This is why we have to adhere to a freeze, just holding the line. The only increases you will find—of course, they have many, many cuts in here, some $10 billion below a freeze. I emphasize that, $10 billion below a freeze is the mandatory increase of interest costs, the inflationary increase of the Defense budget and then, of course, there are some with a freeze on entitlements, but there are some increases with respect to the means tested programs—food stamps. We cannot tell how many hungry people will present themselves. The cost in health, we cannot tell how many will get sick. We cannot tell how many will be on welfare, SSI, and others. So the means tested programs are the only ones we on this side of the aisle are exempting from this across-the-board freeze, this compromise plan.

I am constrained to say, of course, that what I am citing are absolute CBO figures. I note on our submission into the record that what we calculate as the remaining deficit the Congressional Budget Office may not necessarily report as their own estimate. We have used CBO procedures in making our deficit calculations. I am not trying to overanalyze the plan. What I am trying to say is that on balance our plan represents $677 billion over the 5-year period in spending cuts and nominal revenue increases.

This plan calls for over $100 billion a year in savings and that is about as traumatic a sacrifice as we can politically put through. This Senator was, of course, requesting in his original freeze plan a full-year COLA freeze, but we have compromised on that. We are trying the art of the possible. We are trying to be realistic and still ask for a sacrifice of every particular segment of the economy so we have compromised on a 6-month COLA freeze. We better the administration's goal of a deficit that is less than 2 percent of the GNP in the 3-year period ending in 1988. Ours would bring it down to 1.8 percent. Our plan ends up in 1990 with a deficit of $21 billion. The proportion of savings between revenues and spending cuts is exactly 68.7 percent in spending cuts, 31.3 percent in the revenues, which are only nominal. You can easily pick up that amount of revenue. A minimum corporate tax of 10 percent would pick up that $15 billion.

So in essence what you really have is a sacrifice of spending cuts over revenues. No one can legitimately say spend and spend. We are saying in fairness to all segments of the economy that tax expenditures go from $367 billion to $400 billion in this year, that we hold the line somewhat on tax expenditures to the tune not of $30 billion but only half of that, $15 billion. We are asking the other sectors of the economy to sacrifice as well. So our plan is balanced, it is comprehensive. It calls for discipline and sacrifice across the board. I urge our colleagues' earnest consideration of this. I think there is no better way to emphasize at this particular point our sincerity and genuineness of concern that we have and the realistic attempt that is being made; that in the field of national defense our distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee for many, many years, a senior Member of this Congress, the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi, has been loyal in trying to fashion with all of us, and particularly with this Senator, a shared sacrifice across the board. And so if it pleases our distinguished leader, Senator CHILES, on this particular point, I hope he could yield some time to the Senator from Mississippi and we could hear from him at this time.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Mississippi, if he wishes to speak at this time.

Mr. STENNIS. How much time?

Mr. CHILES. Ten minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, first, I want to make clear that I have great admiration for the Senators who serve on our Budget Committee, one of the tough assignments, and who do the work on the floor, the unending work of the very highest quality, with worthy leadership. Several of them fully equal the better prepared Senators I have known during my service in the Senate.

Mr. President, if we keep going along with the system we are using now in trying to get at this budget from beginning to end, without adequate hearings, without complete reports, without enough preparation or chance for the average Senator to know what is going on and what the facts are, we will no longer be known as a deliberative body. Instead, it will be a joke for us to call ourselves a deliberative body, and we will be failing in our mission, in spite of this good work.

I wish to highly commend Senators HOLLINGS and CHILES for their splendid work on this complicated problem. A year ago I was greatly attracted to the outstanding bill or plan presented by the Senator from South Carolina and voted for it. Through hard work he put together and made understood what I believe is the best bill offered to meet this grave situation, and deserves much credit. The Senator from Florida has been outstanding in his work and leadership on this difficult problem.

Mr. President, I have a small amount of time, which is all right, but I have had the privilege of attending and working on 30 consecutive appropriations bills each for a full budget year. I have had the further privilege of helping in the writing of the military authorization bill since the year after the Korean war started. That is a long time.

My point is that this is time in which to learn a little by observation, experience, trial and error, and ups and downs. I have known from that experience that we should have to do something about this budget—excessive spending or whatever you may call it.

I handled the appropriations bill for the Department of Defense on this floor in 1964, from beginning to end, and through our conference with the House. That year, we finished all the appropriations bills, which added up to a little less than $100 billion. That was 1964. In 1984, last year, the amount of interest we had to pay on the national debt was $111 billion, $11 billion more than it cost to run the whole Government in 1964.

That was enough to wake me up. I do not claim any credit for myself. We had been working on this budget matter from 1978, a small group of us from the Senate and the House, with competent economists who came in and gave us their version of things. We had to abandon that quest without making any recommendations. Frankly, it got too close to election time. That problem was recognized.

I am not a man of great learning, but it finally gets through; and I thought then that the way to get at it—the best way, the fairest way, and the most effective way—was to put a little of the burden on everybody. Let everyone share this extra burden. It involves the survival of our system of government. Let everyone carry a little part. So make the reductions for each group, the same percentage. The average fellow thinks that is fair, and he can understand it. They talk about it, and a plan like that can be worked out.

That is the way I feel now. It is more convincing to me, as we go along.

A year ago, we had what was called the Hollings plan. I am not quick to cosponsor bills. I am not quick to vote ahead of my thinking. I voted for that Hollings plan in 1984 because, in my humble opinion, it was the best that had been brought forward. It came nearer to solving the problem, nearer to being practical and enforceable and understood, and each citizen had a chance to do his part.

I became convinced just as strongly that if we stretch this thing out so long and so far to meet the goal of a balanced budget, or a nearly balanced budget, by this method alone, restraining our spending, without augmenting something at the other end of the line, it would take years and years and it would finally fall from exhaustion.

So there absolutely must be some additional revenue coming into the Treasury in order to successfully cope with this giant problem. Make no mistake: It is a giant, a killing giant, and it is something that will carry on to our children or grandchildren, unsolved, and will finally destroy our system of government. That is when I said, "Yes, I will vote for some kind of measure that brings in additional money."

I am not versed in the subject of taxation. I am willing for our committee to make an effort along that line. But as surely as night follows day, I am convinced that we will have to have a supplemental force behind any measure—administration or Dole plan, or whatever it is—that gets results. There must be less outgo and more income. Fortunately there is time to carry it out.

I almost tremble to hear men like Mr. Volcker—well versed, the nominee of two Presidents, approved almost unanimously here—the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, when he talks about the alarm with which he views the idea of this excessive budget. The foreign investments that have been coming here for years and years is going to recede, and we will cease to be the leading nation in maintaining our financial obligations. I point with pride to the fact that every undisputed obligation our Government has ever had in its almost 200 years has been paid on time by our Treasury.

Mr. Volcker says—he does not say things unless he means them fully—that we are flirting with an idea here that is going to cause us to lose foreign money support and take the chance that this situation will again run up interest rates, run up inflation—the very things we know are devastating to the big man, the little man, and those in between.

So I have no doubt about what my duty is. I feel that I am holding part of the power that is in this body, 1/100th of it, that has been surrendered to me. The people have that power, but they gave it up, gave a part of it to me—on a temporary basis, of course—to exercise the power for the giver. That is what it is—power to adjust where adjustment must be had in order to keep our economy sound.

I am satisfied that these figures are approximately correct. They are speculative to some degree, an estimation.

In the financial affairs of our National Government, what are the facts? What are our needs? What shall we do? When shall we start?

The facts are that for many years we have spent far more money each year than we have received for the Federal Treasury. We are thus rapidly building a larger and larger Federal debt which takes more and more of our yearly earnings to pay the annual interest. Unless we change our course, we shall soon be unable to pay the annual interest, much less the debt. This means the eventual collapse of the financial structure of our entire Government, including also the States, the cities, and other subdivisions.

Those of us who have been here many years have not heretofore been confronted by a challenge as severe as we now face.

Let me illustrate further: In 1964 the Congress appropriated slightly less than $100 billion with which to operate the entire Federal Government. This amount was sufficient. I had personal knowledge of and handled on the Senate floor the Department of Defense appropriation bill. In 1984, just 20 years later, we appropriated $111 billion solely to pay the interest on the Federal debt for the 12-month period of fiscal year 1984. The total amount spent for all purposes for the operation of the Federal Government for fiscal year 1984 was $842 billion. This created a shortfall for the year of $175 billion, which was added to the then existing debt, and we started paying interest thereon, as is true with the remainder of the Federal debt.

For the current fiscal year 1985, excluding Social Security contributions, the presently anticipated tax revenue to be collected by the Treasury from individuals and businesses is expected to be $396 billion. Almost all of this sum will be required to pay the interest on the national debt and pay the amount appropriated for the Department of Defense. All the remaining cost of operating the Federal Government for fiscal 1985 will be paid with borrowed money, approximately $214 billion, which will be added to our present indebtedness, and upon which we shall start paying interest annually.

These staggering figures are almost unbelievable, although they are true and official.

If this goes on at the present rate for 4 additional years, the national debt will reach $3 trillion in fiscal 1989, when the interest that we shall pay on the full debt will be $206 billion per year. Except for the Department of Defense, there were no appreciable increases in appropriations.

I was a Member of the Senate during much of the time this debt was accumulating. I voted for some of the items. I voted against many of them. I acknowledge my part of the blame for what happened. It is certainly my duty and the duty of all of us to act and to act now on some plan that will bring us and future generations relief from the certain eventual destruction our Nation faces unless we find and enforce a remedy to protect our Nation's financial affairs.

In my personal search for an approach to this situation, I have diligently sought advice and counsel from many people of learning and experience in the field of Government finance, and I have supplied what points I can through commonsense.

One whose counsel I value highly is Mr. Paul Volcker, who is now Chairman, and has been for the last 6 years, of the Federal Reserve Board, following his nomination by two Presidents—Mr. Carter and Mr. Reagan—with his approval each time by a great majority of the Senators voting on the nomination. Mr. Volcker is highly outstanding in this field; his thoughts are followed by many wise and able men. He thinks we are slipping dangerously in our Government finances and are placing our financial system at a high level of risk unless we improve our plan and practices.

Last year it greatly aroused my concern when Mr. Volcker said:

> . . . the largest and richest economy in the world is on the verge of becoming a net debtor internationally and would soon become the largest.

And this year it is quite disturbing to hear Mr. Volcker and other financial experts say that without the current, substantial flow of foreign savings into our economy the choice would be either higher interest rates or inflation, and either choice would bring to a quick end the gains in the economy that have been made since the end of the great 1982 recession.

What shall we do? It is absolutely essential that something effective be done, and that a plan for relief be started now. Time will be required to complete an effective plan, but we must begin. Summed up, it means we must get along on less and we must take in more in the Treasury.

I urge that as a first step the enactment of an across-the-board freeze on Government spending. Under this concept, major categories of Government spending in fiscal year 1986 would be constrained to the level authorized for this fiscal year of 1985. In propounding this concept, let me emphasize that the governing principle here is legislating these actions across the board. We must have an equal and even sharing of the deficit reduction burden.

I have been a member of the Appropriations Committee since 1955, and my experience in how our system works in matters of spending tells me that it would be unwise and unworkable to try to achieve an effective reduction any other way. A deficit reduction plan that would single out certain programs for termination, or drastic reduction without adequate hearing and factfinding would deny due consideration to those affected. In the end, such actions will weaken the resolution and will produce only a modest result.

Therefore, as a first step, I urge passage of a budget resolution that would attempt only to evenly distribute the deficit reduction burden.

I believe there is support for this kind of approach. Last year, when the Senate considered its budget resolution, I joined Senator HOLLINGS of South Carolina, a member of the Budget Committee, in offering a budget freeze amendment. This amendment received 38 votes. This was more votes than any other plan offered except the President's plan, which was adopted.

A comprehensive spending freeze similar to the plan which I have again joined in with the Senator from South Carolina, will save a lot of money each year, and will eventually lead to a solution.

To go with an across-the-board spending freeze plan, there must be a plan for increasing payments to the Treasury. This is necessary to achieve a deficit reduction large enough to bring the deficit under control. I am no expert in the field of taxes. There are others here, especially my colleagues who are members of the Financial Committee, who know better than I how to formulate the specifics, but as a matter of commonsense, I believe we must look to revenue income more if we are to achieve a balanced budget within a reasonable time.

This balanced approach to achieving a sizable deficit reduction is a fair plan. This plan will save a lot of money each year, and will eventually lead to a solution to our problem.

This plan can save us from the financial destruction we face and put us back on a sound financial track.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 10 minutes has just expired.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD].

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, very briefly, first of all, I wish to commend the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina for coming together on this particular package. I am honored and pleased to be a cosponsor of it.

George Marshall had a wonderful expression that he used to refer to often in talking about this city. He used to say, "There is no limit to what you can accomplish in Washington, DC, if you are willing to give somebody else credit for it."

I know FRITZ HOLLINGS has worked as hard as any other Member of this body for the last several years, particularly in the last several months, on a package of his own. He fits George Marshall's description perfectly in working this out with Senator CHILES to come up with a package that reflects, I think, the will, the desire, and the determination of both of these Members. And I commend them both for it.

I think it also reflects, if you look down the list of cosponsors, that this is one of those rare occasions when people from different sections of this country, with different sets of priorities, in some cases, can come together because there is a larger issue involved here.

There is a wonderful ad on television, Mr. President, that says, "You can pay me now or you can pay me later." That is what this is about. This is it. We will either adopt this package in the next 50 minutes or I suspect we will be back in a week or two, or three, or four, with basically this package, or something very close to it. This is what I think every single one of us knows is ultimately going to be the kind of a plan that will really make a difference. So I hope that we might avoid all of that and come to the recognition that this is about as balanced and equitable a program as I have seen come down that road in this long, long discussion of deficit reduction.

Mr. President, as I go down this list, I look at things like Amtrak, COLA's, community development block grants, revenue sharing, and the Small Business Administration. I am going to go back home to Connecticut. Those are issues that are important. I am going to have to stand up, and defend my vote on this particular amendment when it comes to those particular issues.

But, I am not worried about it at all because I know the people of Connecticut, and I think the people of this country, recognize there is a larger issue here. And I suspect that my friends from South Carolina and Florida are going to have to go back home and explain farm cuts, rural electrification programs, and a number of other things that are going to fall with particular severity on their constituency.

But I think the fact is that we have been willing to draw all of these elements together, make reductions in a number of them, and then also come up with a revenue feature that will allow us to not only make deficit reductions but actually produce a balanced budget by 1990.

Now, there are a lot of proposals around here. There are constitutional amendments to balance the budget and there are constitutional conventions and all sorts of other, what I call, bumper sticker gimmicks that promise a result without telling us how to get there.

The Chiles-Hollings proposal tells us how to get there. This is the first vote I know of in the last 4 years where we are actually going to have an opportunity to say to the American public: "At the end of all this, we will put this country's fiscal house in order."

Again, I know in private conversations, when you talk to people around here from both sides of the aisle, you know that revenues have to be a part of this proposal. No one wants to say it on that side of the aisle publicly right now, but if you have quiet conversations you know that this has got to be a feature of it, otherwise we are deluding ourselves and our constituencies.

So, Mr. President, I think this is the best chance we have. I think it is ultimately where we will end up. It is painful on everyone, but it is equitable. It spreads out the burden. That really is what makes this proposal, so attractive. It gives us all a chance to support something that really will get us to a very real deficit reduction.

In fact, if you take the OMB figures, it is a surplus of $38 billion. If we take the Congressional Budget Office figures, which I think are more reliable figures, with all due respect, we still have a deficit at the end of 5 years, but it is certainly a minimal one.

So, Mr. President, I am delighted to be a cosponsor of this.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I thank and commend my colleague from Florida and my distinguished colleague from South Carolina.

Mr. President, it has been perfectly obvious to all who have watched these proceedings that all we have done for the last 2 weeks is go through an elaborate charade and posturing. We have gone from foreign aid, switching around $200 million here, to congressional pay, which is even so small as to not show up in this budget, because we wanted to create some record to somehow flim-flam the American public and make them think we have been doing something when we have been doing nothing on either side of the aisle.

Mr. President, for years, since 1981, this Senator and Senators on both sides of the aisle have said that 1985 is the year—as a matter of fact, we have said we should have done something in 1981 to keep this deficit from growing and 1982 as it continued to grow and 1983 as it continued to grow and 1984 as it got to monumental proportions. They said, "Yes, we know you are right, but it is an election year and we cannot do anything about the deficit."

Well, here we are, Mr. President. It is 1985. This is the year when the rubber was supposed to meet the road. And, Mr. President, frankly, I thought by now this late in the proceedings something serious would be afoot with respect to dealing with this deficit. But is it? No. Still posturing.

Now we have finally one measure to vote on which makes sense, one measure that is, I think, a serious attempt to deal with the deficit.

I know we have got the Dole package, Mr. President. It has certain appeal. It does not have taxes. Yes, you can go out to the American public and say, "Well, this doesn't have taxes" or "Your taxes are too low," and all of that.

But we know, Mr. President, that corporate taxes today are an outrage. It is an outrage for companies like GE, my friends, and General Dynamics, my friends, and a host of others who are my friends, who are making multibillion dollars in profits and not only are they not paying any taxes, but we are sending them money.

And we are being told that we cannot mention the word "taxes" because somehow that is going to offend the American public. Well, it is not so, Mr. President. The American public has awakened to the scandal in this country that is going on with respect to our tax system, to the giveaways, the corporate welfare that is going on. And here we have budget deficits of $220 billion and we are told we cannot do anything about it because somehow we have got to preserve that tax system.

Well, Mr. President, it is time now to act. It is time to act. It is time to include a modest amount of taxes, as much as I hate to be associated with taxes. We cannot wait on the President to return from Europe. We cannot wait for the President to take his feet out of concrete on the issue of taxes. We cannot wait for the propitious moment on taxes over anything else.

We have got to act, Mr. President. The hour is late. There is a limit on posturing. There is a limit on partisanship. There is a limit on politics and I think that limit is right now.

For that reason, I am going to join with Senator HOLLINGS and Senator CHILES in their package and hope we can get something done.

Mr. CHILES. I thank the Senator and I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Oklahoma [Senator BOREN].

Mr. BOREN. I thank my colleague from Florida.

As others have done, I want to commend Senator CHILES and Senator HOLLINGS for offering this budget package. I am proud to join with them in cosponsoring this proposal. It is, as has been said, the only proposal before us which has light at the end of the tunnel. It does produce a balanced budget within 5 years.

As Senator DODD has just said a minute ago, I think the question is: Will we have the courage to act this afternoon and adopt this kind of plan or will we have to come back to it many months from now or many weeks from now and ultimately accept it at that time?

Because it does have the broad outlines that are necessary to solve the budgetary problem. It touches all Americans. It demands a common sacrifice. It does not leave untouched the constituency of either political party. It asks all Americans to join in the solution. I believe that the American people are willing to accept this kind of proposal.

Recently, I mailed a questionnaire to postal patrons in my State and the citizens of my State. I have had an extraordinary response in just the last 10 days. I have received over 120 of these questionnaires back. We are approaching a 15-percent return. They had to put their own stamps on the questionnaire to return them. More are still coming in. I asked them to pick between four plans—the status quo, the President's original budget proposal, a freeze on spending, or a freeze on spending plus additional spending cuts plus revenues, more or less the plan now before us under the title of the Chiles-Hollings plan.

Of those responding, 68 percent favored the plan—the broad outlines of the plan now before us. Only 3 percent thought we could go along with the status quo. Nine percent favored the President's budget, and 19 percent favored a freeze on spending only. I went ahead and asked a followup question: Would you favor a minimum tax on high-income individuals and corporations who are now escaping the payment of taxes? Ninety-one percent said that they were in favor of such a proposal. I asked them directly: Would you support a temporary tax increase if the money were used to reduce the deficit and not used to increase spending? Sixty percent said yes. Only 35 percent said no. I asked them: On the other hand, would you be willing to make sacrifices? Would you support freezing cost-of-living adjustments, COLA's, for Government programs, including Social Security, if it were a part of a package in which all spending were frozen and all Americans were asked to make sacrifices? Seventy percent said yes, they would be willing to support a COLA freeze including Social Security. Only 25 percent said no.

I ask unanimous consent that the full results of this poll, this questionnaire, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the results were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOREN QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

Recently Senator David Boren received a record response to a questionnaire which he sent to Oklahoma citizens. Over 120,000 were returned in the first 10 days and more are still coming in.

Oklahomans were asked to pick between four main budget plans: First, the status quo with no cuts; second, the President's original budget; third, an across-the-board freeze on spending only with no revenue increases; and fourth, a spending freeze plus, with additional cuts, plus increases in revenues.

The results indicate that 3% favored the first plan, 9% favored the second, 19% favored the third and 68% favored the fourth.

The following are results from other questions:

1. Do you favor imposing a minimum tax on high income individuals and corporations which now escape paying taxes? Ans: yes 91%, no 7%, undecided 2%.

2. Would you support a temporary tax increase if money went only to reduce the deficit and not to increase spending? Ans: yes 60%, no 35%, undecided 5%.

3. Would you support freezing cost-of-living adjustments (COLAs) for government programs including social security if it was part of an across-the-board program to freeze all spending? Ans: yes 70%, no 25%, undecided 5%.

4. Do you think the level of defense spending recommended by the administration is: Too high? 58%, Too low? 7%, About right? 32%. Undecided 3%.

5. Do you think the level of education spending recommended by the Administration is: Too high? 21%, Too low? 37%, About right? 42%.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, as I have said, this proposal before us is balanced. I think it is a proposal that merits bipartisan consideration. As one Senator, it frustrates me to see us voting on the basis of whether a plan is proposed on one side of the aisle or not. This is a plan that is an American plan. It asks all Americans to join together to make the sacrifice necessary, and I can tell you the American people do not want to see us continue to play political games. They want to see us get on with solving the problem. This is a plan that asks all Americans to sacrifice. It is a plan that brings us to a balanced budget. It is a plan that puts the emphasis on spending reductions even though it does have a minimum amount of revenue which is necessary to get us to a balanced budget, and which can be raised without increasing individual income tax rates, and the plan so specifies.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, to not wait any longer. Let us not wait to play out a political scenario. Let us vote for a plan that deserves passage now. When the roll is called, let us not put off action any longer. Let us send a signal to our people back home that we believe in them, and we believe in their willingness as Americans to make the sacrifices as long as they are fairly shared that are necessary. We believe they are ready to give up a little bit on their cost-of-living increase. We believe they are ready to have a balanced package that includes revenues if it is necessary to do the job. Let us not wait several weeks or several months. Let us take the action recommended a few moments ago by Senator DODD, and adopt the package now that makes sense for the country.

Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senator CHILES and Senator HOLLINGS in offering this budget package. I commend both of them for their leadership in putting together a package that will achieve a balanced budget. This is the only proposal which has light at the end of the tunnel. The Chiles-Hollings plan produces a balanced budget in 5 years.

Under this plan, the deficit is reduced $46 billion in fiscal year 1986 using CBO assumptions. Using OMB accounting, the deficit would be reduced $59 billion in fiscal year 1986. Within 3 years, the deficit would be reduced $270 billion—$320 billion using OMB accounting. This would result in a deficit of $86 billion in fiscal year 1986—$132 with CBO accounting. In fiscal year 1988, the deficit would be $13 billion less than the GOP leadership plan.

It is impossible to achieve a balanced budget without increasing revenues in some way. Under this plan, spending is reduced $2.50 for every $1 raised in revenue. Revenues, under this plan, will be $72 billion over 3 years. The plan stipulates, however, that there will be no increase in individual tax rates. The means of raising revenues will be left up to the finance committee, which, in my opinion, is good policy. We should set overall revenue goals.

As a member of the Finance Committee, I would urge that serious consideration be given to an import fee on foreign crude oil and refined products. Our domestic producers now pay the windfall profits tax. Foreign production should bear its share of the burden. Cigarette taxes could also be held at current levels, and corporations which now escape all taxes could be required to pay their fair share. All of this could be done without any increase in income taxes for the average overburdened American taxpayer.

The Chiles-Hollings plan produces a balanced budget in a fair way. The poor and the elderly are protected. Agriculture will not be cut $18 billion as proposed in the GOP leadership package; rather, agricultural programs will be reduced fairly in the outyears. It is crucial that we not adopt deep cuts in agriculture in fiscal year 1986, as this would literally bankrupt the already depressed agricultural sector.

Mr. President, we must take responsible action now to produce a balanced budget but we must do so in a fair and equitable way. We cannot adopt measures which will place the majority of the burden of deficit reduction upon one sector of the economy. Under the Chiles-Hollings plan, everyone, except the very poor, will be making some sacrifices to achieve a balanced budget. We are all Americans and a shared sacrifice is the only fair way to approach the budget crisis.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, and I thank him for the role he has played in helping put this plan together, and for the meetings that he held in trying to bring all of us together in this plan.

I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the temptation is well nigh irresistable to indulge in blame placing, rancor, and recrimination on why we are here today trying to do something about the deficit. In 1980 there was a solemn promise made to balance the budget by 1984; a promise to balance the budget by cutting taxes and spending even more. Now that promise has been irreversibly broken. Indeed, it has been shattered. So now I find myself along with many of my distinguished colleagues having to vote for a package that I wish I did not have to vote for. I do not relish the idea of having to vote to postpone COLA's for Social Security recipients and other retirees for 6 months. And certainly, coming from an agricultural State, I resent and deplore having to vote to cut agricultural programs, even the modest $100 million in 1986 that is provided for in this package because the plight of farmers is desperate. But there is no pleasant way to deal with this critical problem of deficits. We politicians can't have a tendency to burrow under every fence we straddle. And we want to deal with this problem in a way that will leave our constituents happy. That is not possible in this case, but the one thing we can do is to make the burdens and the sacrifices fair, even, and equal and the results can be dramatic in reducing the deficit. That is what we are here for. And if we succeed, I promise the benefits will far outweigh the burdens. Indeed, the tragedy that surely awaits us all if we do nothing, is 100 times worse than the small sacrifices required in this deficit reduction package.

If we insist on a plan that will perfectly satisfy every Senator, there will be no deficit reduction. If we adopt a plan that requires no additional revenues, then we are going to have deficits of over $100 billion a year forever, and in the process allow the wealthiest corporations in this country to continue avoiding payment of any taxes.

In 1980, the President said, "I will balance the budget by 1984 and maybe by 1983." Last year, as we faced $200 billion deficits, he said, "We will grow our way out of it." Not one thoughtful person in this country believed that, and now every person in this country knows we can't do that.

So we have the leadership package, offered by Senator DOLE, for the President and it is based on the assumption that the T-bill rate in 1990 will be 5 percent, that mortgage interest rates in 1990 will be 7 percent, that we will enjoy a 4-percent growth rate in 1986, 1987, and 1988. Only the Office of Management and Budget says that and nobody else believes it. It is a smokescreen and figures to again deceive the American people. The President says that over the next 3 years he is proposing to save $97 billion in defense cuts off the Rose Garden agreement. The Rose Garden agreement is the one where the President walked out in the Rose Garden, shook hands with himself, and said, "We got a deal." OMB says it will save $97 billion. But the Congressional Budget Office says it will only save $46 billion. So in the leadership package there is a claim of $51 billion in defense cuts that simply don't exist. We should all at least be realistic about how much each proposal cuts.

I believe the Chiles-Hollings proposal is realistic, and probably conservative. But it does two very important things: First, it balances the budget by 1990, while the President's proposal never balances the budget; and second, it cuts $2.50 in spending for every $1 it raises and even the revenue raises can't take place until after the spending cuts have been made.

Every year since 1982 we have been back here making midcourse corrections, correcting the broken promises of the year before, because of what can only be charitably called myopia and self-delusion.

The Chiles-Hollings proposal freezes or cuts virtually every single Federal program, and it will also freeze the salaries of Senators and House Members. A freeze in congressional salaries doesn't save much but it is absolutely essential. And we can make additional cuts in spending before the end of the year.

Everybody in the U.S. Senate deplores deficits. But today we are going to separate those who deplore the deficits but choose to finesse the problem, from those who deplore deficits, see them as a threat to the survival of this Nation, are willing to vote to do something about it.

Three years ago 69 Senators voted for a constitutional amendment that would require a balanced budget. Today, only 51 votes are required to balance the budget. Today, we have an opportunity to not just talk about cutting deficits, instead today we have an opportunity to substantially cut these staggering deficits.

I would hope that many of my colleagues would join me in making this, perhaps unpleasant, but necessary vote to restore some semblance of sanity to the Federal budget.

Mr. President, I applaud the fine efforts of my colleagues, Senators CHILES and HOLLINGS in putting a truly worthwhile proposal together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

Let me, too, join in the comments on the job that has been done by the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina. I think the American people are being misjudged when people say you cannot vote to cut this, when you cannot vote to cut that one. You will never get that one. They will make you pay for it at the polls. I think they are smarter than that, and they understand that sacrifices have to be made. That is the primary objective for all of us.

Mayor La Guardia used to say there is no Republican way and no Democratic way to clean the streets of New York. I think that the debate here today exemplifies that. There is no Republican way or Democratic way to balance the books of this country.

The American people expect the Senate to put aside partisan rhetoric; to work together to cut back these $200 billion deficits which challenge America's continued economic health. The American people expect us to develop a plan that provides a clear national vision, that treats all sectors of our society equally.

Furthermore, they expect us to develop a plan that at least sometime in the foreseeable future is going to give us a balanced budget.

As I look at each of these other plans, this is the only one that brings about those kinds of results in every aspect. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas that there are some places that I might want to change in this plan. But if you wait for a bill that fills every one of your objectives, we will never get a bill and we will never face up to the problems before us today.

The Chiles-Hollings plan provides for equal sacrifice. Unfortunately, I think the original proposal offered by the White House did not give you that equitable sharing of deficit reduction. It provided large gaps in the safety net, demanding deep sacrifices by a lot of those who were least able to complain in our society. It called for deep sacrifices by children in child nutrition programs; the elderly in Medicaid and Medicare; and veterans, in health care. This alternative will go a long way toward helping protect that kind of health care.

There will remain sacrifices that all segments of society will be called on to make. But I think they are going to be fairer and more equitably placed.

Farmers are going to be able to move to a free market system without major economic disruption.

Defense spending will be kept at the same level that the Senate has already agreed to.

Cost-of-living adjustments are going to be delayed by 6 months, but there will be no permanent change that takes place in that COLA structure.

This plan protects our senior citizens, veterans, and civil service retirees, while asking them to share fairly and equitably in the reduction of this deficit. I think they are ready to face up to that.

Finally, Mr. President, the Chiles-Hollings budget offers the only hope that has been offered in this debate that we finally get to what everybody in this Senate wants, a balanced budget. Using the OMB assumptions, the Chiles-Hollings alternative would provide us with a budget surplus of $38 billion by 1990. Some say there is some smoke in those numbers and they have been cooked a bit, and I frankly think they are overly optimistic. But if we use the CBO's economic assumptions, a bipartisan group, it will provide us with a balanced national budget by 1991.

As one who is committed to the concept of a balanced Federal budget, I have found that this plan in the only one that achieves that goal.

The President has campaigned for a balanced budget constitutional amendment, but this is the first blueprint I have seen offered on this floor during this debate that will bring about that kind of a goal.

The Senate is once again called upon to aggressively reduce this deficit, and I think the Senate has done it in the measure that has been presented here.

In the event that we fail in this alternative, then I urge the President to work with us in a serious bipartisan manner to reduce that deficit.

The time for partisanship has long passed and the time for mutual cooperation and sacrifice is about to pass us by unless we seize this opportunity.

I think this Nation of ours is at the crossroads. I think what we are facing is one of the most serious choices that I have seen since I have been in the U.S. Senate. I think it is time that we face up to it and accept our responsibility and choose this as the solution.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this package, and I hope that our colleagues on the other side of the aisle will join us.

All America is in one boat relative to this economy. We are either going to fairly share in deficit reduction or we are all going to sink in a sea of red ink. We are either all going to share fairly in deficit reduction or we are going to carry the burden of having saddled our great grandchildren with our own profligacy and lack of self-discipline.

We will either each take small doses of medicine now or large doses later when our economy staggers under growing deficits.

I opt for responsible action now rather than ducking this deficit.

The deficit reduction has to be real and it has to be fair. That is why the Chiles-Hollings plan has revenue. There is not a general tax increase in it. In fact, that is prohibited. Nobody is for a general tax increase. Further, it is clear that this package strikes a reasonable balance between spending cuts and revenue increases. It cuts spending $2.50 for every $1 of revenue increases.

But what about the fact that we have tens of thousands of profitable corporations in this country and high-income-earning individuals who pay nothing in taxes, who shelter all of their income, who contribute nothing to the tax burden that has to be shared by everybody else.

This package leaves open the possibility of finally having an effective minimum tax on corporations and individuals.

What about that tobacco tax? Does it make sense—does it really make sense for the Government to lose $2 billion a year in tobacco tax revenue, which is what is going to start happening on October 1 unless we just continue the current tax in place? Not when we have deficits that are over $100 billion and now reaching $200 billion.

Yes, Mr. President, this plan delays Social Security COLA's for 6 months. But this package offers the best hope of avoiding a 1-year freeze on cost-of-living adjustments.

It seems clear that there will be another effort by the administration and others for either a 1-year COLA freeze or a 3-year structural change, which would be far worse for Social Security recipients than what is in this package.

Mr. President, I commend my friends from Florida and South Carolina. I have closely watched them put this package together. I am proud to be associated with them. They are doing the responsible thing. I am glad they did what they did. I hope our Republican colleagues will join many of us on this side of the aisle.

Again, all America is in the same boat. We are all impacted by one economy. Our boats are going to rise or fall together. This package makes it possible for each of us in a fair way to share in America's future.

In summary, Mr. President, I support the Chiles-Hollings deficit-reduction package because it sets us on a realistic course toward a balanced budget in the foreseeable future and because it gets us there through a comprehensive program of shared sacrifice while still allowing valuable programs to survive. There are certainly elements of the package which my first preference would be to leave out, such as the 6-month delay in the cost-of-living adjustment for Social Security recipients, and the drastic reduction in the fill rate of the strategic petroleum reserve. Similarly, the eventual elimination of general revenue sharing and the making of the Community Service Block Grant Program into a Federal/State Matching Program would not be included in a budget package if I were the only one drafting it.

But on balance, the Chiles-Hollings deficit-reduction package is a far better alternative than the White House/Republican leadership plan and a far better alternative than doing nothing. The White House plan does not project a balanced budget, and on top of that is based on overly optimistic economic assumptions. The Chiles-Hollings plan has a balanced budget as a specific and achievable goal, and is based on realistic economic assumptions. The Chiles-Hollings plan leaves room in it for raising revenues through a more effective minimum tax on corporations and wealthy individuals in order to assure that some individuals and corporations are not avoiding taxes while others are asked to sacrifice as a result of spending cuts.

The Chiles-Hollings approach does not leave room for a general tax increase. Nor should it.

The White House plan would freeze Social Security COLA's for 1 year, cut back on child nutrition and Medicaid at the same time that it is not asking profitable corporations and wealthy individuals who are now paying nothing in taxes to pay one dime toward deficit reduction. With respect to the defense budget, the Chiles-Hollings plan asks the Defense Department to tighten its belt further than does the White House plan in fiscal year 1986 by requiring that it freeze spending in real terms at last years level. This level of spending would not harm our national security and is essential if some of our most vulnerable citizens are going to be asked to share the burden of deficit reduction.

For all these reasons, I support the Chiles-Hollings deficit-reduction package.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am also honored to be a cosponsor of this amendment. I commend the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina for their statesmanlike effort in putting this very responsible proposal together and presenting it to the Senate. I believe it is a genuine attempt to deal with an extremely serious problem. This proposal contains very bitter medicine for many people in this country, but it is medicine that we must take if we are ever going to get the deficit under control.

Mr. President, I have noticed that in the discussion of the deficit, everyone in this body favors reducing the deficit, but when we get down to considering specific proposals, there always seems to be some higher priority than actually reducing the deficit. Either it is maintaining the defense buildup, keeping COLA's in place, not raising taxes, or some other item which seems to take precedence.

This proposal, I believe, establishes deficit reduction as our first priority. I believe it does so in a fair way and shares the burdens of deficit reduction. I am honored to be a cosponsor of it.

Like my colleagues, I believe we must take swift and effective action to reduce the deficit. The Chiles-Hollings substitute is a bipartisan freeze plan that calls for the greatest deficit reduction—approximately $59 billion in fiscal year 1986 and $270 billion over 3 years, under OMB economic assumptions. Most significantly, it produces a balanced budget in 5 years.

The Chiles-Hollings substitute also reduces the deficit by sharing the burdens of reducing the deficit by addressing all Federal spending in a similar way. Instead of eliminating or unfairly cutting needed Federal programs, it calls for freezes and carefully targeted spending reductions. It also provides for continued economic growth and improved competitiveness, as well as protections for the poor and elderly.

The Chiles-Hollings substitute instead of cutting programs vital to our economic growth and competitiveness, provides for investments in export promotion, science and technology, labor force development, resource protection, competition and credit. Cuts in these programs at this time would be shortsighted as they would threaten our economic stability.

Instead of cutting many key programs that provide protection for the poor and elderly, the Chiles-Hollings substitute protects programs like child nutrition, Medicaid, veterans health care, education for the disadvantaged and handicapped, and others that must be continued.

The plan recognizes that reductions in some domestic programs are necessary and reductions below a freeze are called for in certain domestic programs. However, the plan is premised on the requirement that a balanced approach to reducing the deficit requires addressing both spending and revenues. The proposal includes revenue enhancements, to be determined by the Finance Committee. This would be done by closing loopholes in the tax code and ensuring that at least minimum taxes are paid by all.

Under the Chiles-Hollings substitute, defense spending is held to inflation in fiscal year 1986 with 3 percent real growth in fiscal year 1987-90. Additional savings is required from reform of progress payments to defense contractors. In my opinion, defense is not being gutted in the Chiles-Hollings substitute. Indeed it is growing more than any other Federal program. Granting a $9.9 billion increase in budget authority above the fiscal year 1985 level allows the defense budget to keep pace with inflation in fiscal year 1986, and real 3-percent increases are granted in the outyears. Under the Chiles-Hollings plan, defense will continue to grow as a proportion of Federal expenditures.

My support for no growth is dictated primarily by my growing concern about the unprecedented Federal deficit which we are facing at this time. The Chiles-Hollings plan is the only plan that gets our economy back into balance by the end of the decade. If our economy cannot remain healthy and continue growing, we are not going to be able to maintain a consensus for continued growth in defense spending.

I support this plan because I believe that it would not be harmful to our defense posture. We can afford to defer certain marginal defense programs and still continue our defense modernization. Indeed, there would still be significant increases in procurement of many weapons systems over last year's level. Under this plan we would not be abrogating our NATO commitment. I would also note that last year the Pentagon allowed $3.2 billion in obligational authority to lapse, according to the administration's fiscal year 1986 budget request. I am attaching a table detailing the unobligated balances which lapsed last year.

As we all know, the need to reduce the deficit at this time is overwhelming. Indeed, such action is past due. The $200 billion deficit threatens to suffocate any hope for sustained economic recovery. It contributes to artificially high interest rates, to unemployment, to the trade deficit and more. It is also clear that there is no hope of deficit reduction solely through economic growth.

It is clear that the existing budget deficits are so huge that, even with planned spending cuts, solid economic growth of 4 percent a year, and sharply falling interest rates, the debt could continue to increase rapidly. To continue on the present course would be absolutely disastrous. At this time when the interest on the debt is $155 billion this year alone, we cannot afford to continue to let the debt and deficit grow. We must act quickly. And the most effective proposal and the most equitable, in my opinion, is the Chiles-Hollings substitute.

I would urge my colleagues to support the Chiles-Hollings substitute.

I ask unanimous consent that a table entitled "Unobligated Balances Lapsing, DOD Fiscal Year 1984" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, without being too repetitious, let me say that I also admire the great leadership of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina. I have had the privilege of serving with them on the Budget Committee ever since I came to the Senate. I guess I have spent more time with them on budget considerations than possibly any other project that we have had.

Mr. HOLLINGS. If I may say, no one has worked more diligently than the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. He has worked with Senator CHILES our ranking member and all colleagues on both sides of the aisle trying to put together this package. We are grateful to him for his leadership.

Mr. EXON. I appreciate the overly generous statement of the Senator.

Mr. President, this is not a perfect package. I have never seen a perfect package before in the U.S. Senate. There are some things I do not like about it.

I think that the reduction of about 14 percent in agriculture over 3 years at a time when they are having a depression out there is too much. But it is far, far better, is it not, than 40 percent as recommended by the other package that we are being asked to vote on?

Also, as I understand it, the matter of impacted aid has been sufficiently covered in this program so that we would not be literally putting some of our school districts with heavy military concentrations out of business. I think that is an important step in the right direction.

Also, I think it is fair to mention that this package has in it, I believe, the REA arrangement that was entered into sometime last week with officials of the REA.

So, while this is not perfect, and while it does not do all of the things I would like to see it do, it is, Mr. President, a hard-fought, workable compromise. I think it deserves the support of every Member of this body.

Mr. President, 2 weeks ago, President Reagan said we are on an "immoral dead-end course," where every man, woman, and child owes an $8,000 share of the national debt. I am pleased that the President has finally recognized that deficit spending threatens the economic health of the Nation.

Several of us in this body have been sending the same message for years. Let us not forget that every man, women, and child's share of the national debt was only $4,000 at the beginning of the supply-side experiment. Even that was an excessive burden on the American economy.

The supply-side revolution promised decreased taxes, increased spending, and lower deficits. The Congress was assured by the administration that the budget would be balanced by 1983 if the President's 1981 package was enacted. Well, it was enacted with very little alteration. Today, we have $200 billion deficits and a national debt which has doubled in 4 years.

Some of us expressed reservations and urged caution. I remember very well, during the debate of the 1981 bill, offering an amendment with my good friend from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY. That amendment would have made the second and third phase of the tax cut conditional on the promised reductions in the deficit. If Congress had adopted that proposal, I dare to say that we would not be in today's mess.

Over the years, fiscal conservatives such as Senators HOLLINGS, ANDREWS, NUNN, JOHNSTON, GRASSLEY, and I have offered various mid-course corrections. If any of our alternative budget proposals had been adopted, we would now be well on our way to a balanced budget.

Today, I am proud to be associated with the deficit reduction package put forward by Senator CHILES and Senator HOLLINGS. It represents a major assault on deficit spending.

This budget exceeds the deficit reduction goals of the President. It stands in stark contrast to the budget proposed by the Senate majority package.

The Chiles-Hollings plan prudently manages Federal investments. For example, major savings are made in the Amtrak budget. This contrasts with the majority leadership proposal which would essentially scrap our national passenger rail system at a great net loss.

It also realistically assesses the economic condition in rural America. This contrasts with the majority leadership budget which cripples American agriculture in a time of rural economic depression. Indeed, no sector of the economy has experienced such a sustained downturn as agriculture. Farming has not shared in the recovery. The Chiles-Hollings plan is a fiscally responsible approach to the rural economic crisis.

Most important, the Chiles-Hollings plan is fair. All Americans sacrifice to bring the deficit under control. This contrasts with the majority leadership plan which exempts from any deficit reduction plan the Pentagon bureaucracy, defense contractors, and profitable corporations that pay no taxes.

This proposal is a fiscally sound response to the deficit crisis. Spending cuts are the key focus. Every penny of new revenue generated by closing unfair tax loopholes would go to reduce the deficit and not to finance new spending.

It is the only plan that holds out the prospect of a balanced budget by the end of the decade. It is the only proposal which asks big corporations to pay their fair share of taxes.

I hope all in this body would put partisanship aside and look at the Chiles-Hollings alternative on its merits. America can no longer afford to pay 15 cents out of every tax dollar for interest on the national debt. This is not a Democratic or Republican problem. It is an American problem which demands a comprehensive and effective response.

I urge my colleagues to lay partisanship aside and to vote to restore sanity to the Nation's fiscal affairs.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI).

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the distinguished Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, I think the greatest amount of applause should go to Senators HOLLINGS and CHILES for the work they have put in here. I know they have given a lot and done a lot for not only this side of the aisle but for the entire body to come up with something that is fair.

I ask the Senator from Florida or the Senator from South Carolina, is my understanding correct that there is also a freeze here on Federal salaries?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Definitely, for 1 year. I would freeze your salary and mine for a full year, I say to the Senator.

Mr. DECONCINI. I think that is important to anybody who addresses the question of COLA's, particularly when referring to Social Security recipients. I have yet to address any group in Arizona that wants to have their COLA frozen for 6 months or a year. All groups, however, has said they would go along with having them frozen for 6 months or a year if everyone else's is frozen, particularly ours, I say to the Senator from South Carolina. That is a sacrifice for everyone here, but it demonstrates that on this side of the aisle, we are prepared to make that sacrifice. I think that is a good step forward.

The Senator from Nebraska has pointed out several areas I was going to call to the attention of the body for the RECORD which I think give a more proportional share of sacrifice without eliminating some of the programs such as was put before us in the proposal now pending.

I think I would go along with this as well as with the Byrd proposal.

Mr. President, I strongly support the Chiles-Hollings substitute budget plan.

I have probably spent more time, attended more meetings, and struggled for more hours in an effort to reach a budget compromise that is fair, equitable, and which really makes a difference in the deficit. This budget plan is it. It is all three. It is fair. It treats everyone fairly. And it is the only budget package that reaches a balanced budget in the near future. I support it 100 percent and I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this proposal.

Mr. President, let me quickly add that there are some items in this package that I do not like. I do not like limiting cost of living adjustments for our senior citizens and our veterans. I do not like freezing law enforcement programs for a year. I do not like rolling back farm programs and programs that help our cities, small businesses or those groups that rely on a subsidized postal rate to collect money for charities, churches, or veterans causes. And I do not like increasing revenue on businesses to help cut our Federal deficit. But, unlike the underlying White House—Republican leadership package, the Chiles-Hollings plan forces everyone to take a cut. It has more than 2-to-1 ratio of spending cuts to revenue enhancements. And, most importantly, it forces all elements of the Federal Government to share in the deficit reduction sacrifice that we all must make.

Mr. President, this plan is not a panacea for reducing the deficit. But what it is, is a "game plan," a comprehensive strategy for reducing the momentum of deficit spending and for bringing fiscal restraint back into the Government. I hope that the Chiles-Hollings package passes. It deserves our support. And once it does pass, it will be incumbent upon all of us to work together—Democrats and Republicans; the White House and the Congress; businesses and labor—to implement this plan in a way that will achieve real deficit reduction in a way that is fair and equitable.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I thank my colleague, and I join the rest of my colleagues in embracing the proposal of Senator CHILES and Senator HOLLINGS.

I said last week that I could support some strong medicine that would include reducing defense spending, reducing important cost-of-living increases for our older citizens and taking steps that would call for sacrifice from many other groups. But I was not prepared to do those things unless we had a glidepath that would lead to light at the end of the tunnel. This proposal does that, Mr. President. This is the only proposal we are likely to vote on in these deliberations that will give us, at least on paper, a balanced budget by 1990 or 1991.

No one can predict absolutely that we will reach a balanced budget by 1990, because no one can guarantee the economic assumptions. But these are the same economic assumptions that project the President's deficit, according to CBO, never getting below $100 billion. He has a glidepath for continued deficits for the rest of this decade and for the next decade. I am not prepared to go home and ask my senior citizens or my veterans or my people on Medicare or other people who are being asked to sacrifice to take the strong medicine of program cuts so that we can reach a budget deficit of $145 billion in 1988. That is the President's proposal and the Republican proposal; it puts us on a glidepath of $100 billion deficits in perpetuity.

The American people are willing to sacrifice. I told a group of elderly citizens yesterday that I would vote for a 1-year COLA freeze provided we had light at the end of the tunnel and that their sacrifice would be meaningful.

I believe the older people in this country are willing to sacrifice. They have already sacrificed enormously so that we can have the country we have today, and I believe they are ready to sacrifice again provided it is going to move the country into a sound fiscal position. This package presented by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Florida accomplishes that goal.

One thing is for sure: If we continue to let this deficit go unaddressed, the medicine we will have to take is going to get worse and worse. I am afraid the President has put us on that kind of path.

The President expresses my sentiments when he says he wants to increase defense. There is no doubt that we have numerous and important defense needs.

He also expresses my sentiments when he says he does not want to increase taxes. No one wants to increase taxes. But when the President looks at his own budget and never gets the deficit below $100 billion, even with the most optimistic of optimistic economic assumptions, I think it is time for the President of the United States and this body to face the truth.

The truth is that if we do not have some revenues—this budget package has only 30 percent revenues, and 70 percent spending cuts—we are not going to see any light at the end of the tunnel. And the longer we avoid telling the American people that truth, the more bitter the medicine is going to be when we finally face up to it. I think most people in this body recognize that, and I hope they will recognize it with their votes for this budget package.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I do not desire to speak yet. I would like to clarify where we are. As I understand it, if we are still on this amendment at 3 o'clock, we will pull it down and the Byrd amendment will be in order. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. I have no desire to do that. However, we have not spoken in opposition yet. Since we agreed originally that we would have a half hour, I say to my good friend from Florida, if we do start our opposition here when the clock strikes 2:30, we shall be finished in 30 minutes and then we can stay on the scheduled plan. If that is the case, we would like to use a half hour at some point, whenever they would like to accommodate us.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the opposition can go ahead and start now and that will give us some time to reply if there is any reply.

Mr. DOMENICI. Let us go ahead and do that, Mr. President, because we may not use all our half hour and we may use more; the other side has used much more.

I would like to put this debate in perspective. I congratulate the sponsors. Frankly, it is very difficult to put a budget together, no question about it. I have heard a number of speakers address the deficit situation of our country here this afternoon. This proposal recommends many difficult policy changes. To the extent that those who are cosponsors or who are going to vote for the Chiles-Hollings budget substitute have been part of it, obviously, they made some pretty tough decisions. I do not think they are tough enough and I shall try to put into perspective the real differences.

It is pretty obvious to this Senator that unless you change the automatic cost-of-living indexes in the budget in some way, you cannot really assemble an effective package. I compliment the Senators; to that extent they have been halfway effective. Until this point the two principal sponsors have supported a 1-year cost-of-living increase freeze. Both the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Florida have advocated a budget with a 1-year freeze. The philosophy in the current proposal is that we should have half of a cost-of-living freeze—half a year, not a full year. Not all of 1985 cost-of-living freeze for Social Security, but half a freeze.

I compliment the Senators in all honesty for taking a program that is part of all American's automatic pension increases and saying it should be frozen for at least part of 1 year.

You have gone halfway, and to that extent you have joined with us in recognizing one of the major problems and one of the real areas of shared sacrifice. Second, if I have it analyzed right, you are proposing 0-3-3 in terms of real growth for defense. We have been using those percentages, so on the surface your proposal would appear to be the same as the amendment proposed by Senator GRASSLEY that passed by three votes the other day. However, I find that your outlay estimates are actually lower under your 0-3-3 proposal than in the Grassley amendment. That is interesting. Since in a budget resolution the best you can do is to set the level of budget authority, we should all know that this package takes $8 billion in outlays over 3 years that CBO projects will be spent in defense under the 0-3-3- proposal and shifts it to domestic programs. So in terms of outlays, this proposal contains $8 billion less in defense outlays over 3 years than the Grassley amendment. I do not think those levels will hold through appropriations. But in any event the sponsors of this amendment make a different assumption about outlay rates—that we are going to delay payments we make to our contractors.

So, therein right off the bat are two differences. Now we get to the real difference. I hear my friends on the other side, for whom I have great respect. I have discussed this budget problem many times with most of those who have spoken. But herein is the most important difference. I look at the text of the proposal and it says we have to enact a minimum tax. Then it says we are not going to increase anybody's taxes. Then it says this is a minimum tax and others and others.

Now, let me tell you how much this is so everybody can understand. In order to achieve a balanced budget, there is $197 billion in taxes. Now, I am not trying to exaggerate. I am reading from this sheet. They are going to get to a balanced budget with this proposal, and there is $197 billion in taxes.

Now, I want to be fair and state the 3 years total for new taxes. Over 3 years, $72 billion in taxes are assumed, and they are categorized as a "tax expenditure freeze" and "other revenues." Frankly, we cannot specify how these revenues are raised in this budget resolution. All we can do is say to the Finance Committee you raise at least $12 billion, $25 billion, and $35 billion in fiscal year 1986, fiscal year 1987, and fiscal year 1988, respectively, in new taxes and then in 4 years from now make sure it is $50 billion and 5 years from now, $75 billion, and we have our balanced budget.

So $197 billion is the amount of new taxes raised over 5 years. We cannot tell them it is a minimum tax. They have to change the tax laws substantially to raise that amount of revenue.

So, in defense they spend $8 billion less; and in pension programs they provide only half a COLA freeze. Actually, the sponsors do not propose a freeze but only a 6-month delay in the inflation computation date. But, let us take the proposal at face value and we raise $72 billion in taxes. We do all of this but we are not much better off in terms of deficit reduction than the leadership package over 3 years.

Where did all of the rest of that money go? It all went back into the domestic programs of the Federal Government. Having just received this package, I can not go through it in any detail. What we should all know is that we are raising taxes because we could not find $5 billion in domestic spending in the first year, $27 billion in the second year, and about $40 billion in the third year.

Out of the huge Federal inventory of programs, we have reduced defense as low as we are going to and we still cannot find the equivalent savings in domestic programs. If we cannot cut a substantial amount out of a package of about $600 billion in Federal domestic programs, we should be prepared today, if we adopt this package, to say to the American people that to reduce budget deficits we are going to raise taxes. We cannot do it any other way.

Frankly, I do not believe it is fair to say that the only package offered which can get you to a balanced budget in 5 years is this one. I believe the leadership package, if you adopt it intact and save $294 billion over 3 years without raising any taxes, moves you toward a balanced budget. Indeed, I believe you will be closer to balance with the Senate-White House proposal than under this one. We have found again and again when it comes time to really cut on this budget, we are going to look first to taxes, not to how much we can cut the expenditures of Government. I believe that taxes should be the last resort. It would hardly be the last resort to start raising taxes in the first serious piece of budget legislation that we pass, the budget resolution.

So over 3 years, the Chiles-Hollings proposal would raise $72 billion in new taxes, would provide for the equivalent of half of a COLA freeze but not a whole one, cut $8 billion below the Grassley amendment in defense outlays. All the rest of the savings that you lost out of the leadership package would be put back into domestic programs including the $72 billion in new taxes. I repeat, as a practical matter, these taxes cannot come from a tax expenditure freeze on corporations. Ultimately, those revenues will come from new taxes on the American people. I say this because tax expenditures that go to individuals are three times greater than the tax expenditures that go to business. I ask my good friend, the chairman of the Finance Committee, Is it not true that $3 of all tax expenditures go to individuals for every $1 that goes to business? Maybe we should change the subheading to "Freeze Business but not People," because if we are going to talk about tax expenditures, we have to start talking about interest deductions on homes, deductions for pensions, maybe charitable deductions, and all the rest.

While I opened complimenting my friends and I close complimenting them for a serious package, I really do not think we ought to adopt it because I believe we can do better. I do not think we are near finished for those of us who think we have spent a wasteful 10 or 12 days. I think we are going to get a good deficit reduction package because the country needs it and I think ultimately the Senate is going to get it done. But, I think it may be a good many days from now.

I yield to the chairman of the Finance Committee. He desires 5 minutes. I yield 5 minutes to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank the Chair. I thank the chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina are to be complimented for having proposed this package before us because it very well lays out the differences between the Republican and the Democratic philosophies as to how we want to achieve a balanced budget. And I think both packages might eventually lead us there. But this Government has only two great obligations. One is to protect our shores against foreign invasion and the other is to preserve our liberties against domestic infringement and all the rest that Government provides or desires or wishes or wants. And they may be nice if we are willing to pay for them.

The Democratic proposal says they are nice and they are willing to pay for them with taxes. The Republican proposal basically says we will defend our shores and we will preserve our liberties and that as for the rest, as for urban development action grants and revenue sharing and crop insurance, this country will not only survive without them, it will thrive without them and that we are better off on balance to reduce the deficit by cutting spending than we are by increasing taxes.

I was intrigued with the poll that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] referred to because we have all seen similar polls or taken similar polls. The way I have normally seen it posed is as follows: First, do you favor reducing the Federal deficit? Yes, almost 100 percent.

Given your choice, would you rather do it by cutting spending alone, by a combination of cutting spending and raising taxes, or by raising taxes alone? The normal response to that poll is that between 65 and 80 percent want to do it by cutting spending alone, maybe 10 to 15 percent want to do it with a combination. I seldom see a poll that more than 5 percent want to do it by raising taxes.

That is why I want to compliment again the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina and their fellow cosponsors. They have chosen the route of cutting some spending and raising taxes significantly. It is a fair proposal. It is a proposal that well represents the philosophy of the Democratic Party now and the Democratic Party in the past and I think the Democratic Party in the future.

The proposal we offer on this side says that we think this country can reduce its interest rates 2 to 3 percent and its unemployment percent over 18 months if we adopt this package, and we can do it without raising taxes.

I do not think that in my 16 years in the Senate the difference in the philosophy of the two parties has been better propounded than by the proposal offered by the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina and the proposal offered by the leadership on this side. I do not think it requires any further debate, and I believe that the vote on this proposal may reveal which way this Congress prefers to go.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first, I wish to congratulate Senator HOLLINGS, Senator CHILES, and the other Senators who are making this effort, because I think it demonstrates what I have been trying to articulate for the last 10 days: that there are as many people on that side as there are on this side—maybe with some few exceptions—who are concerned about deficit reduction. I think the difference comes when we try to say how we should do it.

This package is a bit different, in that it includes substantial revenues. You face up to the hard question of COLA's, between 6 months or a year delay, there probably is not much difference; because we both have indicated—at least, the majority on this side and a number on the other side—that entitlements have to be included in some way.

As the distinguished Senator from Oregon has just stated, and the Senator from New Mexico has said earlier, I believe that before we complete action tomorrow, we should agree on some deficit reduction package. If we can do it without raising taxes, it should be done.

I say that as one who took considerable heat in 1982 and again in 1984 for bringing tax bills to the floor. Some even went so far as to say that I twisted the President's arm in 1982, and that was not the case. I think he determined that at that time something should be done.

So I am not standing here and saying that we should never have any revenues. But I do believe that the question of revenues, 72 billion dollars' worth, may have been addressed in the last election, to the extent that most people, when asked about tax increases, indicated their opposition.

I was not present to hear the account of how you are going to get $72 billion. But I think you also have to face that fact that most of us are for tax fairness or tax simplification; and if we start raising revenues now, it is going to throw a wrench into the work of the Secretary of the Treasury on tax reform, and many Democrats and Republicans support tax simplification and tax fairness.

They will need that revenue to lower the rates for corporations and individuals, and they are going to do away with all the preferences and a lot of the so-called loopholes that corporations and others now enjoy.

So I hope this amendment will be defeated. I have great respect for my colleagues who have offered the amendment, but it seems to me that we should pass a measure out of this body that does not contain tax increases. We can do it without anybody making any great sacrifice.

Ours may not be a perfect plan. This clearly is not the perfect plan. But there has to be some plan that can get 50 or 51 votes.

In our plan, we did not get a single Member on the other side of the aisle voting with us. I accept that. I think we are now in the final stage. So every Democrat voted against the Republican plan, and I can understand that. But we ought to have another package, maybe tomorrow or later, because I now find that instead of just having one colleague in the hospital, there are now two Republicans in the hospital. That makes it even more difficult. I sent one to look at the other, and they kept them both. [Laughter.]

We are a little shorthanded. So whether or not we are going to vote tomorrow, I am not certain.

I want to make a plea to the other side of the aisle that after you have tried to raise taxes, increase revenues, whatever you call it, in either this package or the next package, if you succeed, I will be surprised. But if you do not succeed, I hope we can call upon Members on the other side of the aisle to help us rise above the political atmosphere and make one vote for the American people.

Again I will recite the Gallup Poll in Sunday's newspaper: 58 percent of the people polled said that the deficit is very serious, 23 percent said it was fairly serious, and only 5 percent said it did not make any difference. Those are the supply siders. There are a few left in the capital but not many. So a good margin of the American people, 81 percent, said we should do something about it.

I hope that when all is said and done, I can encourage at least four or five of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to join us tomorrow, not in a partisan effort but in a bipartisan effort to demonstrate to the American people that we have all had our arguments, have all made our cases, and that today, tomorrow, or sometime we will bite the bullet and vote for deficit reduction.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand that Senator SYMMS desires to speak for 2 minutes, and I yield to him.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues in complimenting our colleagues on the other side of the aisle for offering this amendment. But as a Senator who comes from a farm State, I would be remiss if I did not point out, in the overall picture, that a good friend of mine on the Budget Committee, the Senator from Nebraska, said there was no one for the budget package with respect to farm policy.

I think it should be clearly understood here that the budget reduction package that the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee and the President had agreed on, which was brought in here when we started this debate about the budget, is supported by the American Farm Bureau Federation, National Grange, National Farmer Organization, American Soybean Association, National Cattlemen's Association, just to name a few, because they think it is in the best interests of agriculture.

Mr. President, people who want the continuation of the farm programs try to tell the farmers what to plant, when to plant, and how to plant, and they watch those farmers get bigger and bigger payments from the Government and get further in debt.

Mr. President, as one who is a farmer, I rise as much in consternation as I do in opposition to the amendment.

My consternation stems from what must be a tremendous difference of opinion between the distinguished Senators offering the amendment and the vast majority of learned agricultural academicians, agriculture public policy groups, and various food and agricultural groups that have been calling for fundamental changes in this country's farm and food policies.

Mr. President, let me just briefly list five organizations which are just as concerned about American agriculture's future as are the offerors of the amendment. But these groups do not, I assume, see that future enhanced by a continuation of past policies and therefore are endorsing the leadership deficit reduction package. These organizations are:

First, American Farm Bureau Federation, the largest farm organization in America; second, National Grange; third National Farmers Organization; fourth American Soybean Association; and fifth, National Cattlemen's Association.

Mr. President, not to be overlooked is that wide array of organizations and agribusiness industries who have similarly endorsed this package, including the assumed savings in agriculture. These are:

American Bakers Association, Food Marketing Institute, General Foods Corp., General Mills, Caterpillar Tractor Co., Grocery Manufacturers of America, Milk and Ice Cream Organization, Nabisco, National Independent Dairy-Food Association, Ralston Purina Co., American Feed Industry Association, and Dart & Kraft, Inc.

Further, Mr. President, I must note that over the last year there have been a number of major public policy conferences focusing on the 1985 farm bill debate. One of the largest of these conferences was sponsored by the National Center for Food and Agricultural Policy, which is housed at Resources for the Future. That center, along with the National Agricultural Forum and 17 other cosponsors held a conference last December.

That major conference concluded all but unanimously that the cost of Federal farm programs should be cut, and that cutting the overall deficit to reduce interest rates and a too-strong dollar were critical to American agriculture's future.

Finally, Mr. President, just recently a coalition for consensus on agricultural policy, a diverse group of some 14 independent agricultural policy veterans recommended major changes in the orientation and composition of U.S. policies related to agriculture. Many of their rcommended changes parallel the earlier groups findings including a reduction in the deficit and a reduction in commodity price support levels. This group consisted of academicians and representatives from a number of academicians and representatives from a number of nonpartisan organizations engaged in public policy issues relevant to American agricultural policy, including:

American Farmland Trust; National Planning Association; Roosevelt Center for American Policy Studies; Resources for the Future; American Enterprise Institute; Curry Foundation; Community Nutrition Institute; Field Foundation; National Agricultural Forum; National Audobon Society; Public Voice for Food & Health Policy; Consumer Federation of America.

Mr. President, I mention all these farm organizations and public policy think tanks only because I think it is important that the Senate know that what is included in this budget compromise for agriculture is not something totally out of the main stream of good public policy thinking.

What all these groups and individuals are telling us is that past policies have not worked and that change in policy is paramount for the future of agriculture. The amendment offered by the distinguished Senators returns us to these past policies. I for one, and apparently a number of other people, think that would be wrong.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the majority leader has just emphasized the necessity for taking action to reduce the deficit, and I thoroughly concur with that conclusion.

I should like at this point to review some of the facts which are applicable to the Republican package and are applicable to the Chiles-Hollings package and to every other proposal that has been made.

Mr. President, we are rightly concerned about the tremendous growth of Federal expenditures. Indeed Federal spending has increased by 44 percent during the past 4 years. However, this increase has been predominately the result of two factors—an unprecedented peacetime buildup in the defense area and a shocking increase in interest payments to finance our debt. The defense increases have been financed by substantial reductions in domestic spending: The Congressional Budget Office estimates that over this period cuts in domestic programs were more than sufficient to finance the defense buildup.

During the period 1981 to 1985 defense spending was increased by $94 billion. The Congressional Budget Office attributes $77 billion of this sum to the defense buildup. During this same period spending on domestic programs other than Social Security and interest on the national debt has increased by only $60 billion. In the nondefense discretionary area alone, the domestic spending area over which Congress has the greatest flexibility, spending has been cut by $96 billion over the past 5 years, which is a tribute to the work of the chairman of the Budget Committee. This $96 billion would have been sufficient to finance the entire defense buildup.

This does not include the additional savings that have been realized in the entitlement programs and Social Security spending over this period which the Budget Office has estimated to be an additional $71 billion. So spending is not the problem. Spending has been dramatically reduced in the domestic area: A reduction sufficient to finance our increased defense spending.

However, one spending item has increased. It is a spending item which provides no defense, creates no jobs, helps no needy individual acquire job skills, provides no food for the hungry—this spending item is interest on the national debt. We spend 89 percent more in interest today than we did just 4 years ago. This year we will spend $61 billion more in interest than we did 4 years ago. Four years from now we will spend almost twice as much on interest as we currently spend on all nondefense discretionary programs.

Why have our interest payments increased so rapidly? Why have our deficits accumulated so quickly? If domestic spending cuts have offset the increase in defense spending, how can this be? The answer is painfully simple.

In 1981, the President proposed and the Congress passed a massive spending measure—not called a spending measure, of course; it was called a tax cut—a massive tax cut that has dramatically reduced Federal revenues. The Congressional Budget Office estimates the revenue loss over the past 4 years at $326 billion. During this period, actual revenues from the individual income tax have increased by only 4 percent—about 1 percent per year. Corporate income taxes were actually $4 billion lower in 1984 than they were in 1981. The magic of lowering taxes to gain more revenues has not materialized and I sadly fear—I am looking at the chairman of the Finance Committee—that it will never materialize.

The only magic we see is the terrible multiplication of compound interest. What we are doing is choosing to pile up debts that will leave our children with no choices—only a massive debt and interest payments that will consume their efforts. Of the $230 billion we will be paying on interest in 1990, over one-half will be directly the result of the 1981 tax cut. The growth in interest payments accelerates at an alarming rate as our deficits grow. What started as a falling pebble is becoming a destructive avalanche.

We are very rightly concerned about the tremendous growth of Federal expenditures, but the fastest growing burden on the American people is the interest on the debt. We cannot go to the American people and ask them to sacrifice and share the burdens through painful spending cuts, if we do not reduce spending on these interest payments. This can only be done by substantial and immediate reductions in the deficit. We have as a body voted to maintain certain vital domestic spending programs, and to maintain an adequate defense. These are not cost-free decisions, they must be paid for.

In conclusion, a constituent of mine from Cumberland, in western Maryland, sent me a bit of wisdom about the deeper meaning of the Congress' annual budget exercise. He wrote:

> I feel that the ones of us that are in the lower middle class are being asked to have this budget balanced on our backs when this is really created by the massive tax cuts that helped us not a bit. Also a blank check for the military that is completely out of reason. I know for I am one who finds that my insurance after retiring from the railroad does not cover the medicines that I need every month.
> Does this mean that we are going back to the time when only the wealthy were able to send their children to the good schools and the number that went to college were a very small percentage? When we take away this program we are hurting the country of tomorrow.
> There are so many programs that have made this country great during the past fifty years. The factory worker, the steel worker, the railroad worker and all the other hourly-paid workers were able to dream of having a home, a car, perhaps two, and could dream of their children going to school, dream of retirement and of a good health program. Even with all the setbacks such as three wars, we have grown to be a great nation, a nation with a heart, one that cared for its middle class and poor. Do we now throw this away and go back fifty years to the conditions that we had then? I hope not.

That is the hope of a retired railroad worker in Cumberland. That is the hope we should realize at the conclusion of the budget process.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute off the resolution to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the first point made by the chairman of the Budget Committee was that there is not much difference on Social Security.

The second point he made questioned $8 billion in savings in defense. These savings are easily explained by the recent change in progress payments policy recently made by the DOD. Rather than providing 85 percent for the payments, this administration has been making 90 and 95 percent payments based on the size of the contractor. Now, the DOD has returned to the previous progress payments of 80 to 85 percent. This will also pay out additional savings with respect to defense.

We are not playing with figures. The chairman of the Budget Committee says we cannot find another $14 billion in savings, so we had to raise taxes. Well, that is true. We are for truth in budgeting.

Now, if we take—and if the Washington press corps would only cooperate—they claim $51 billion in savings, but the Congressional Budget Office says only $37 billion in savings. So they find their $14 billion by using cooked figures, by a sleight of hand. We could have done that rather than raising taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 1 minute has expired.

The question is on the amendment.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CHILES. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator off the resolution.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I want to vote for this package, but I am unable to do so. One of the main reasons has to do with the 6-month Social Security COLA delay. I just want to review the history quickly so everybody understands this issue and votes with their eyes open.

Since 1981, we have cut Social Security through 1990 by a total of over $100 billion with a variety of cuts. I will not name them all, but one of them was a permanent 6-month delay of the Social Security COLA adjustment, when the cost-of-living adjustment, takes place. That has already been enacted once and, as a matter of fact, it has cost senior citizens, between the years of 1983 and 1988, $21½ billion out of the total $100 billion that has already been cut out of Social Security.

So it seems to me the senior citizens have already been to the deficit reduction party before, and they have made their contribution.

But what this provision here would do, the additional 6-month delay would cost seniors about $10.9 billion over the next 3 years. That is a lot of money. And that is money that inflation has taken away that otherwise would be restored, so it comes directly out of their standard of living.

I think it is important that we understand the magnitude of these numbers before we just go ahead and vote on them, because we will have more time later to debate it. But I think this is a group in our society that has already made their major contribution to deficit reduction previously. I do not think they can afford to do it again. We should not ask them to do it again. I would hope, in any final package, that we would not break the promise that the President made to seniors that there would be no further cuts in Social Security.

I thank my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 minutes has expired.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me for a brief question?

Mr. CHILES. Yes, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. I thank the distinguished Senator. Would the Senator tell me, in contrast to the proposals of the distinguished majority leader, if there are any programs, spending programs, in this budget resolution which he proposes which are entirely cut out, as is the case with about 17 programs in the leadership proposal; and, if so, how many and which ones they are?

Mr. CHILES. I say to the distinguished Senator from Washington, revenue sharing is cut out, as is in the plan that you have, a major program that we have enacted, and rehab loans are cut out. The other programs are cut down, but not out.

Mr. GORTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes off the resolution.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I want to echo what has been said on the other side of the aisle, and that is that I would hope that some day, in the interest of the country and responsibility, we would start joining hands in this body to vote for something that is really meaningful. And I would like to believe that today is the day.

The proof of the pudding is on that chart. I do not care whether you like CBO or OMB. There it is. This is the most dramatic deficit reduction plan you are going to get an opportunity to vote for. It is the one that will steady the financial markets of this country, it will give the people some confidence, and in my opinion the constituent groups who suffered under this will accept it because, as Senator NUNN said earlier, the medicine you are going to have to swallow if the economy of this country collapses is 100 times greater than this. If we wait another year or another 2 years and the economy still has not collapsed, the medicine you will have to accept is still more bitter than this.

Two years ago this body voted for a constitutional amendment to balance the budget, and 69 Senators voted aye. I have never heard such eloquence in my life about the deficits. Here is a proposal to balance the budget in less time than you could ever do it with a constitutional amendment, and it only requires 51 votes. So I plead with all of those people who are among that 69 to vote aye on this proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I yield myself 4 minutes off the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. I think our debate is about to wrap up. I think it has been an interesting debate. I listened to my distinguished friends on the other side. It seemed interesting that they said they welcomed our proposal because, in their words, it established the principle that COLA's are something that have to be part of the package. But I did not hear anything further than that. When it got to taxes on the wealthy and the big corporations, wait a minute, they said. That is something different. We cannot have that a part of the package.

I just want to say to my friends that when we start talking about restraining COLA's, we are talking about that as one part of a package that does something to everybody in this country. It would restrain everybody a little bit, and that say there has to be a little fair sharing in this deficit reduction effort. It would say that those people who are not paying their taxes now ought to pay a little, and that those corporations that are getting money back from the taxpayers now, ought to ante up a little. It says if all that happens, then we know the seniors will be willing to do their share, too. So do not tell me we are now establishing the principle of COLA adjustment. That is not true. We are talking about shared sacrifices.

I listened to my great friend from Oregon, and his remarks about true distinctions between the two parties. I wonder how many times my distinguished friend from Oregon has voted on taxes since he has been here? He is on the Finance Committee. He has voted on that before.

When it comes to taxes, my friends on the other side of the aisle should not talk about the principle anymore. We are talking about the price now. We are talking about where you are to establish principle for us. Of course, you are not pure. I do not believe you have your virginity in regard to voting for taxes anymore. In fact, the last time we were told that the President was mad because we did not get "two to one." If we had only gotten two to one—and that was a deal you all supposedly made with him. We never got down there to discuss that notion, but he said there was some betrayal because he was promised $2 in spending cuts and $1 in tax cuts.

Mr. President, this plan contains $2.50 in spending cuts for every $1 in tax cuts. We are going to give him a little something better.

We have another provision in here that says we will not enact the bill until the spending cuts have been made, before the tax cuts can go into effect. So we are going to keep faith with the President. We are not going to flimflam him like maybe you all did in the rose garden or something. We are going to keep the faith. We are going to give him two-and-a-half for one.

So what we are talking about basically is are we serious about this deficit reduction? If we are, then we know that everyone has to participate. If you take taxes off the table, then COLA's come off the table. If you take COLA's off the table, then somebody says you cannot hold defense to zero growth. Without defense restraint, you cannot cut other things. That is what happened to us all the time before. Today, we are saying put it all up there. Let us do it fairly. Let us get the thing behind us for the good of the country. That is what this package we have offered is all about.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, for the third time in as many years, Senator HOLLINGS is leading the fight to force real deficit reduction through across-the-board spending restraints and responsible revenue measures. And, for the third straight year, I will support the Senator's actions. I also congratulate Senator CHILES for his leadership in helping to put this package together.

Alone among all the budget proposals that have been considered by the Senate over the past weeks, this budget will produce a balanced budget in 5 years. It will reduce the budget deficit by $13 billion more in 1988 than the plan originally promoted by the President and the Republican leadership of this body.

It is overall a fair package. It cuts domestic spending by $86 billion and cuts defense spending by $72 billion over 3 years, while also forcing everyone—corporations and wealthy individuals—to pay their fair share of taxes. Spending would be reduced $2.50 for every $1 raised in taxes without raising individual tax rates.

The package provides much more protection for the poor and elderly than does the President's proposal. Unlike his plan, this budget will not cut many programs, such as child nutrition, Medicaid, veterans health care, education of the disadvantaged and handicapped, housing for the elderly and handicapped, or increase beneficiary out-of-pocket costs for Medicare. While the overall package is fair—and I will support it as a package—I am very much concerned with one of its elements.

This plan would delay COLA's for 6 months. I am concerned that this provision will renege on promises to protect COLA's for our senior citizens. This proposal is superior to the full 1-year freeze or permanent changes in COLA's promoted by the President and the Republican leadership. However, I am not convinced that we cannot find additional spending cuts and closing of tax loopholes to come up with the same amount of deficit reduction that would be achieved by this delay in Social Security COLA's.

Because of this concern and the commitment I believe we have made to our elderly, if this passes, and I hope it will, I plan to work with those who share my concern on a proposal that would restore the full COLA for next year, while meeting the deficit reductions targets in this plan through additional spending cuts and tax equity efforts.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the economic challenge facing our Nation and the Senate is to reduce the huge Federal Government budget deficits that have developed during the past 4 years. Equally important is the challenge to reduce the deficit in a way that is fair, and that preserves programs that contribute to the strength of our Nation.

The choices are not easy, but I believe the budget proposal now before the Senate—the Chiles-Hollings budget amendment—is far preferable to the budget proposed by the administration, and I will vote for it.

This budget proposal would cut the deficit more than the administration budget would and would provide a balanced budget within 5 years.

In addition, this budget proposal would preserve Federal Government programs of proven worth that would be either totally abolished or deeply cut under the administration budget. These include such programs as Student Assistance, Amtrak, the Small Business Administration, Urban Development Action Grants [UDAG's], Sea Grant College Program, and reduced postal rates for nonprofit organizations.

Unlike the administration budget which would increase defense spending by more than $70 billion over the next 3 years, this budget proposal would place a lid on the runaway increase in defense spending.

The administration budget does nothing to reduce the drain on the Treasury caused by mushrooming special tax breaks and tax credits that permit too many corporations and individuals to avoid paying their fair share of taxes—but this budget proposal would save $72 billion over the next 3 years by reducing the growth in these tax expenditures.

This budget proposal would place real restraint on Government spending, and make some long overdue spending cuts. It would for example save $7 billion by cutting our wasteful farm subsidy programs—programs which I believe could be cut even more. It would freeze many areas of Government spending, including, incidentally, a freeze on the pay of Members of Congress.

Finally, this budget is much fairer to the needy, to the elderly, to Social Security recipients, to veterans, and to those who rely on Medicare for health care. While the administration proposed to cut cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security and other programs every year for the next 3 years, this budget would provide for one 6-month COLA freeze, followed by full COLA's in following years.

The administration budget proposed sharp increases in Medicare premiums, while this budget imposes no new costs on Medicare enrollees.

This budget proposal is not perfect. I would much prefer that there be no reduction in Social Security COLA's—not even the 6-month freeze required by this proposal. I voted earlier for a budget amendment to assure full Social Security COLA's, and I continue to believe that is required by fairness. The choice that confronts us, however, is between this budget proposal and the administration proposal which would impose much greater sacrifices on the elderly and the retired dependent on Social Security and Medicare. Given this choice I will vote for the Chiles-Hollings budget proposal.

This budget proposal meets the challenge of reducing Federal Government budget deficits. It would reduce the deficit by $59 billion in 1986, and over 3 years would reduce deficits by a total of $320 billion. In both cases, that is a bigger cut in the deficit than the administration has proposed. And, unlike the administration budget, this proposal respects the real needs of the American people and it respects the real contributions that proven Government programs make to our strength as a nation.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I want to commend my distinguished colleagues, FRITZ HOLLINGS and LAWTON CHILES for what I think is one of the best programs for effectively dealing with the deficits we face today. I support the fundamental approach and integrity of their effort to reduce this deficit and distribute the cuts fairly.

My only problem with the Chiles-Hollings plan is the reduction in Social Security COLA's to a 6-month increase. I do not believe that Social Security should be a part of deficit considerations in this package. Social Security is a space contract which was renegotiated only 2 years ago. I do not think that Social Security is the cause of the deficit and it should not be the victim of a reduction effort at this time.

Again I commend my colleagues and state that I look forward to working on the floor for a final package that combines both fairness and equity.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, this is a difficult vote for me. It is difficult because by voting for the Chiles-Hollings bill, I am having to compromise on a number of positions that I have long held and strongly defended. Take the issue of Social Security cost-of-living adjustments, for instance. Since I entered the Senate in 1975, I have supported the full COLA increase for our Nation's elderly citizens each and every time it has come up for a vote. For me, keeping faith with America's senior citizens is not just a cause, it is a matter of conscience.

On the subject of defense spending, my views and my votes have been equally clear. I believe in a strong America and I believe that requires a strong national defense. And, unfortunately, there is simply no bargain basement way of achieving it. So I have consistently supported defense expenditures that I thought were necessary, especially in light of the continuing threat posed by the Soviet Union. Just last week, in fact, I opposed a majority of my colleagues in the Democratic Party by voting to increase defense spending in 1986 by 3 percent above inflation.

But these are not ordinary times, Mr. President, and we are not facing ordinary economic problems. Indeed, I believe that the budget deficits we face today—deficits that have been caused, I might add, not by Democratic policies or Democratic programs, but by the Reagan administration's incredible fiscal irresponsibility—these deficits have confronted us with nothing less than a national economic emergency. And lest I be accused of overstating the case or of indulging in rhetorical excess, let me provide you with a little evidence.

It took this Nation 200 years to run up a national debt of $1 trillion—that was the work of every President from George Washington through Jimmy Carter put together. But it's going to take this administration just 6 years to double that debt to $2 trillion. Think about it. The same administration that caustically criticized the Carter administration for even proposing a budget deficit of less than $50 billion; the same administration that once promised to balance the Federal budget by 1983; and the same administration that continues to raise hypocrisy to an art form by bleating about its support for a balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution; this same administration has given us $200 billion a year budget deficits for as far as the eye can see and has doubled a national debt that it took us over two centuries to accumulate.

And I'm sure I don't need to remind anyone in this body of what those deficits are doing to our country. They're keeping real interest rates high and they're keeping the level of American exports low. They are so distorting the value of the dollar that our farmers can't sell their products abroad and our consumers can't resist buying foreign products at home. Those deficits are mortgaging the future of our children and our grandchildren, and they're threatening to literally wreck today's economy for the rest of us.

So the question before this body is not whether to reduce those deficits, but how we should go about doing it. The Reagan administration has offered its usual response: Increase a few pet programs and projects, and sock it to everybody else, including the poor and the middle classes. Well, that formula may have worked for a few years, but it isn't going to work any more.

I believe the American people are ready to sacrifice, ready to do their part, and ready to pitch in to bail America out. But they want the sacrifices to be fair. They want them to be equitable. And they want them to be spread equally throughout our society. What they will not stand for is having Social Security COLA's cut while many profitable corporations pay no taxes at all and while defense appropriations are raised beyond even the Pentagon's ability to spend the money. They will not stand by and watch programs that benefit the poor and the middle classes eliminated, while policies that protect the rich continue in place. The President says that he will veto any tax increase whatsoever, and smugly tells Congress that sending him a bill that raises taxes will "make his day." But when the voters see that 67 of America's biggest corporations paid no taxes last year, they say: "Pay your way."

I agree with that sentiment, Mr. President, and I am happy to point out that the Chiles-Hollings bill contains a minimum corporate tax of 15 percent on profitable corporations. Equally important, this bill spreads the sacrifice required to save our economy throughout our society. It is strong medicine. It is tough medicine. It is medicine that I deeply wish were not necessary. But I would be abdicating the responsibility I assumed when I was sworn into this office if I turned my back now and looked the other way. It is time for conviction. It is time for backbone. And it is time to vote responsibly and to act in the national interest. I shall support the Chiles-Hollings bill, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. EAST] and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are absent due to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 63, as follows:

So the amendment (No. 63) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 64

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized and will suspend until all Senators clear the well. All staff people please retire from the Chamber and cease all conversations.

The distinguished minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

On behalf of myself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. RIEGLE, and others, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and Mr. RIEGLE, proposes an amendment numbered 64 to the amendment numbered 43.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader deserves to be heard. Will all Senators and all staff please cease conversations.

The minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and ask unanimous consent that the time used in getting order not be charged against either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I should begin by saying that Mr. CHILES, Mr. HOLLINGS, and others who worked so long and gave so much effort to the amendment which they offered are to be complimented. The amendment which they offered and the amendment which I now have offered on behalf of others and myself are really not very far apart in most respects. Both—the Chiles-Hollings amendment and the amendment that is now before the Senate—in my judgment are better amendments than is the White House-Republican leadership proposal. I could very well have voted for the Chiles-Hollings amendment but for one aspect of that amendment.

Mr. CHILES and I sought to bring our amendments together so that we could have an amendment which we could all support, and but for the one item we could have done that.

A DEBATE ON THE FUTURE AND FAIRNESS

Mr. President, we now are debating the budget of the U.S. Government for fiscal year 1986 and beyond. For months, Americans have been bombared by the media with countless stories about this budget proposal, and that budget compromise—this White House ultimatum, and that offer to negotiate. During the past 3 weeks, much of the attention has shifted to what amendments will be offered by whom, and speculation concerning whether Republican Senators will support the budget desired by the President.

Throughout the budget debate, the major focus has been on counting dollars: How big the deficit is; how many dollars will be spent for this, that, or another program; how much this or that program will be cut. Surely these matters are important; by definition, a budget must address the question of "how much for what?" And certainly it matters a great deal how much is allocated to each function of Government.

However, I believe it is long past time for the budget debate to be returned to what it originally was meant to be—determining the kind of future to which the American people aspire, and the role Government can best play in assuring that future. I do not believe it was intended to be, and strongly believe it should not be, an exercise in creative accounting where the only thing that is important is whether the numbers add up in column A or column B.

The budget is out of kilter, and we must reduce unprecedented deficits that threaten to drown our children in debt and debt service. But after agreeing this is the case, it is neither wise nor rational to indiscriminately dismantle the very programs upon which our future depends.

Where does the so-called White House-Republican leadership budget before us provide for positive steps to strengthen our economy, correct our economic weaknesses, and increase our commercial competitiveness in an increasingly interdependent world? Sadly, the answer is "nowhere."

Where does this budget proposal provide for necessary investment today in our fundamental national resources—our people and our infrastructure—in order to be sure that we have a healthy, capable work force, livable cities, adequate lines of transportation and commercial intercourse, and sufficient energy sources? Sadly, the answer is "it doesn't."

How does the Republicans' budget contend with the necessity to allocate fairly the discomfort of necessary belt tightening among those who benefit from Government programs? The sad fact is that this budget saddles the burden disproportionately on the elderly, on the sick, on children, and on the impoverished.

In addition to these fundamental flaws, the Republican budget proposal misses a golden opportunity to make a badly needed public policy change that also would lower the deficit. We are confronted today with a frightening deficit at the same time hundreds of large, profitable corporations are paying little or nothing in income taxes. The American worker should not be asked to pay additional taxes at this time. I do not support any new taxes on individuals. But what I do support is requiring that all corporations pay their fair share in taxes. What they don't pay winds up in only one of two columns of the budget: Either individual taxpayers have to pay the bill, or it just gets tacked on to the mushrooming deficit.

There is no excuse for waiting longer to make the simple changes in the Tax Code to correct the most egregious loopholes. Taking such action now need not prejudice or threaten in any way the vital objective of fundamental tax simplification on which the House Ways and Means Committee already is at work, and on which I hope the Senate Finance Committee will begin work soon.

Today, on behalf of myself and Senators CRANSTON, INOUYE, MATSUNAGA, and MELCHER, I am offering an amendment to address the deficiencies I have outlined. Very importantly, this amendment does not add a penny to the deficit. It pays for itself. Compared to the White House Republican leadership budget proposal, my amendment reduced the deficit more—in each of the next 3 years as well as over the entirety of that 3-year period.

CONTENTS OF THE BYRD AMENDMENT

I would like to describe the components of my amendment:

ECONOMIC GROWTH AND COMPETITIVENESS

First, in order to assure economic growth and competitiveness, my amendment will add $1 billion in outlays in fiscal year 1986, and $7.1 billion over the 3-year period, fiscal years 1986–88, for export promotion activities and for preserving our basic civilian science, research, and technology programs, and our Job Training and Disclocated Worker Retraining Programs.

The signs all around us are unmistakable. It is impossible for any modern nation to confine its economy within its own borders. Whether we wish for it to be so or not, we are participants in an international, global economy. In that economy, we are competing with some very capable, resourceful, and ambitious nations and people. Government must be an active participant in assuring that our Nation remains competitive.

Nations that are succeeding in the global economy harness their public powers and capabilities just as they devote their private skills, energies, and ambitions to this cause. Failure to invest in basic science and technological research eventually will suffocate our industrial and commercial machine.

Much of the credit for our preeminence in many fields is due to the initial investment in research made with Federal funds in past years, and reducing that investment now is exactly the wrong step to take. An economy that lacks sufficiently trained and skilled workers to do its work will dry up and die. We must enhance the ability of the private sector to do this essential job, but the Federal Government also has a role to play. That role is to catalyze necessary job training and retraining, collect and provide employment market data, and assist businesses and industries to project their employment needs so that the educational and vocational preparation system can cater to them on a timely basis.

The Republican budget slashes these programs—like the Job Training Partnership Act which the administration continually cites as its major contribution to assuring our businesses and industries have the supply of appropriately qualified labor they need—and completely eliminates some of them, such as the Job Corps and the Work Incentive Program to help welfare recipients find and keep private sector employment. My package not only preserves the Federal training programs but protects them against inflation, so that they will retain the capability to serve at least as many Americans in the future as they serve today. That is not sufficient, but surely we cannot do less.

It is inconceivable to me that this Nation, which has benefited to such an incalculable degree in so many ways from those programs, would consider drastic cuts in the budget for basic civilian scientific and technological research, applied science, and health and disease prevention research. One of the proudest moments in the history of humankind was when the United States set the goal—and reached the goal—of putting a man on the Moon. The pride of accomplishment and the national prestige that came from our success would have been sufficient reward—but we also have reaped untold benefits in halo effects as the fantastic strides in technology that flowed from the space program have made their way into our everyday lives.

The advances in medical science and treatment that have been experienced during the past 50 years have revolutionized our understanding of our bodies and how to extend our lives far beyond anything our ancestors ever would have dreamed about. We have completely eradicated some diseases, and are fast on the trail of others. The reduction in pain and suffering is beyond value.

The miraculous thing about the frontiers of science and medical research is that the more they are explored, the more we discover still awaits our exploration. The more we learn, the more we see is out there to be learned.

My amendment preserves the basic civilian science and research activities, and assures that they will receive budgets of constant purchasing power during the next 3 years. This includes such agencies as the National Science Foundation, NASA, and the National Institutes of Health.

As I noted previously, we are immersed unavoidably in intense trade competition with very resourceful nations around the world. Many other nations make deep and substantial commitments of public resources to enhance the competitiveness of their products and services in the world market. For example, the Japanese Government supports more than 40 percent of its exports while our Government supports only 5 percent of American exports. The costs of failing to compete effectively are incomprehensible—and unaffordable.

Our economic security and global competitiveness are essential elements in building a secure, promising future. In omitting significant support for export promotion, the Republican budget puts that future at risk. In a year in which the trade deficit could exceed $140 billion, we cannot afford to undercut our competitive position by doing away with Government export promotion programs that enjoy the support of the President's own Commission on Competitiveness, the President's Export Council, the Senate Democratic working group on trade policy, and a broad coalition of business and labor groups.

For this reason, my amendment makes possible a substantial additional investment of public funds for the purpose of export promotion—something cut to the bone by the Republican budget. This budget capacity would be available for the Congress to allocate to those export promotion activities that it determines to be the most cost-effective and productive. This component of my budget would result in the reinstatement of a total of nearly $1½ billion in outlays over a 3-year period that the Republicans stripped from the Federal budget.

FAIRNESS AND EQUITY

The second major thrust of my amendment is to return fairness and equity to the grossly inequitable budget proposed by the White House and the Republican leadership.

Already the Senate resoundingly rejected the proposal that cost-of-living adjustments be cut in Social Security, Railroad Retirement, veterans' pensions and disability programs, and Federal civilian and military retirement programs. My amendment incorporates these Senate decisions, providing the beneficiaries of these programs and the Black Lung Program with an unrestricted COLA over the next 3 years.

My amendment also provides sufficient funding to prevent imposition of any new out-of-pocket cost increases for disabled or elderly Medicare beneficiaries. It rejects proposals in the so-called Republican leadership package to increase the premium for physicians' bills and outpatient coverage (Medicare part B), to increase the part B deductible all beneficiaries must pay before they are eligible for any help with their doctors' bills, and to impose substantial copayments for every home health visit. My amendment restores approximately one-third of the amount by which the Republican proposal's cut in Medicare's hospital reimbursement extends even below the level of an absolute dollar freeze—a severe blow that many hospitals simply could not withstand, and which those hospitals that survived would be forced to pass on to other patients.

As the Senate previously recognized, the cuts proposed in the already-battered Medicaid Program were unacceptably and unjustifiably harsh. My amendment fully restores the additional cuts in this program. Federal payments for Medicaid must not be further cut when they will mean children living below the poverty level, many of whom do not now receive sufficient medical care, and elderly nursing home residents, will lose some of the medical care they now receive.

The programs I have just mentioned serve predominantly elderly Americans, the disabled, and impoverished children, particularly sick and injured elderly persons and poor children. Included among these are the veterans who served our Nation selflessly during time of conflict. These Americans already have borne the largest share of the burden of budget reductions enacted at the Federal level during the past 4 years. They should not be asked to make additional and heavy sacrifices.

Social Security is a bulwark against poverty for the elderly. Cuts in its COLA inescapably will force hundreds of thousands of present and future beneficiaries into poverty. I cannot play any part in taking such a backwards step, and believe it is unacceptable for this Government to break a contract with either current beneficiaries, or today's workers who will be tomorrow's beneficiaries, when the solvency of the program does not require it. I further will have no part in helping to break a promise repeatedly made by the President of the United States both during and since last year's election campaign.

My amendment also protects important veterans programs. It restores the COLA for veterans disability and pensions programs and for military retirement. And it restores the cuts in funding for delivery of health care to veterans and eliminates the increased fees for veterans' mortgages—both proposed in the White House-Republican leadership budget. In this regard, my package incorporates the funding level proposed and supported by the Democratic members of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee. We owe our veterans our lasting gratitude for the sacrifices they have made in assuring the defense of our Nation and our democratic form of government, but we owe them more than just words. Veterans programs are the tangible expression of our gratitude—and, in the case of veterans disability programs, are a moral obligation.

INVESTMENT IN OUR FUTURE

As I noted previously, the budget before us is sadly deficient in its provision for investment in the most vital and fundamental national resources—our people and our infrastructure. The future of progress, growth, higher living standards, and fulfillment to which Americans aspire will become a reality instead of just a dream only if we invest in these basic resources today.

My amendment provides sufficient funding to protect Federal education programs and child nutrition programs against inflation and to save from destruction and protect against inflation a group of vital economic development, transportation, and urban infrastructure programs—such as Mass Transportation, Urban Development Action Grants, Amtrak, the Economic Development Administration, and the Appalachian Regional Commission. My amendment also restores all but about $7 billion in outlays of the massive cut in funding for farm and agriculture programs contained in the Republican budget, reinstating all but a very small amount of the Republicans' cut targeted for fiscal year 1986.

My reasons for this portion of my amendment are simple. If we fail to make investments in these areas now, our children surely will pay an awful price for our selfishness and lack of vision. But in many cases we will not have that long to wait; we will pay the price very, very soon if we ignore some of these necessities.

Nothing is more important to the future of this Nation than assuring that our children receive the best educations we can provide to them. To this end, my amendment makes numerous changes in the deficient Republican budget for education. My amendment restores funds to assure at least level funding at the 1985 level for elementary, secondary, and higher education programs singled out for cuts and elimination in the Republican budget, including the impact aid "B" program and the Higher Education Student Assistance Programs. For especially critical elementary, secondary, and higher education programs, my amendment adds sufficient funding to preserve the ability to serve the same number of students in the future as currently are being served, despite the bite of inflation. This includes the Chapter I program of Aid for the Disadvantaged, the Head Start Program—which is a preschool program—and the Pell Grant Program.

My amendment assumes savings of $100 million in the guaranteed student loan program, $50 million less than the savings assumed in the Republican budget—a level of savings I am advised can be made without diminishing access or the number of students served by tightening administration of the program, particularly through decreasing the default rate. Finally, my education provisions provide approximately $200 million in new funding for creation or enhancement of programs geared toward increasing basic reading, writing, math, science, and computer skills; providing better teacher training in these areas; and encouraging excellence in education programs, such as gifted and talented student programs, in these and other areas—such as history and foreign language curricula.

Children cannot learn, or grow to become healthy adults who are contributors to their Nation rather than dependent upon it, if they are malnourished. The American School Food Services association estimates that 5,000 to 6,000 schools would drop out of the School Lunch Program if the budget cuts proposed by the Republican budget are enacted. This could deny school lunches to approximately 3 to 5 million children—and comes on top of cuts in fiscal year 1981 and 1982 when approximately 2,000 schools and over 3 million children were forced out of the program. These cuts—in programs that are widely applauded for their success and their cost-effectiveness—must be prevented, and my amendment provides funding so that no service reduction will be required.

Investing for the future also means maintaining our cities and assuring that they remain habitable for the majority of our population that resides and works in them, and so they remain conducive to profitable economic activity. My amendment speaks to this necessity in the following ways: First, we must support adequately the essential infrastructure which is necessary for growth and development in the private economy. Governments around the world long have recognized that investments in roads, bridges, sanitation systems, and mass transportation are essential ingredients of an active, growing economy. At the same time, history has demonstrated that such investments will not be made on an adequate scale by relying solely on private economic actors. The benefits of such investment are spread among a large number of firms, so, although all will benefit, none is willing to bear the costs of construction alone.

Another key element of urban growth and development is an ability of local jurisdictions to nurture and attract new growth investments. The Urban Development Action Grant Program has been demonstrably effective in using a small amount of public seed money to encourage private investment in urban development projects.

My amendment recognizes and addresses these urban needs, adding sufficient funding to preserve these programs and protect them against inflation over a 3-year period.

Intercity and interregional transportation also is vital to our national well-being. It is important to realize that Amtrak is a fundamental component of our national transportation network. Its system serves about 20 million persons each year, and provides rail connections for about 500 communities across the United States—many of which are without transportation alternatives. More than half of Amtrak's passengers have only modest family incomes. More than a third are elderly. In short, many Americans use Amtrak because they need it. As we look toward the future, where interdependence will be increasing, not receding, and where transportation will be critical, not less important, we cannot allow ourselves to disinvest in this manner. Amtrak should be saved, and my amendment will accomplish that by providing a full inflation adjustment for its subsidy for the next 3 years.

In looking to the future, we must not overlook, or, worse, consciously shove aside, disadvantaged communities and regions of our Nation which need help to reenter the mainstream of American economic life. Consequently, my amendment deletes the elimination of the Economic Development Administration and the Appalachian Regional Commission. These two Government programs have paid rich dividends since their inception—both to the individual cities, towns, and regions they have served, and to the Nation as a whole. While the need for such assistance is still so desperate, it would be shortsighted to cut off these important programs now. These programs are preserved and protected against inflation in my amendment.

American agriculture, particularly the family farmer, is going through some of the darkest days since the depression. At a time when we need to be offering help and support to agriculture, the Republican budget proposes some of the deepest slashes in this history of the Federal farm programs. My amendment will restore all but approximately $7 billion of the proposed cut over the 3-year period covered by the budget, with much smaller reductions falling in fiscal year 1986. This should allow the agriculture committees of the Congress to fashion an adequate farm bill that protects American farmers while responsibly reducing the cost of the farm programs to American taxpayers.

PAYING FOR THESE CHANGES

The fourth major section of my amendment deals with the issue of revenue. Because of the threat to our national prosperity posed by the huge Federal deficit, I believe we cannot afford simply to increase spending without regard to the deficit. I feel very strongly that the Federal Government must support the programs I have outlined earlier, but I feel just as strongly that we should be prepared to raise enough revenue to pay for such spending. At the same time, I believe that our tax system is so unfair that we should make some specific changes in the Tax Code on their merits alone, regardless of their impact on revenues or the deficit.

This budget resolution gives us the unique opportunity to combine increased tax fairness with a responsible approach to Federal spending and the Federal deficit. My amendment achieves these goals by setting a modest target for new revenues, a target which the Finance Committee could easily realize through tax law changes which close corporate loopholes and increase the fairness of the corporate tax system.

I emphasize that I do not believe it is appropriate to increase personal income taxes, and I will not support any such increases. It is essential, I believe, to raise the revenues I have included in my package in ways that do not touch the personal income tax.

My amendment proposes to raise approximately $60 billion in new revenues over the next 3 years. This is a fairly modest revenue target, in the same general range as the revenue increase enacted last year in the appropriately titled "Deficit Reduction Tax Act." That tax bill, containing numerous provisions authored by Republican Senators, was able to achieve its revenue goals primarily by changes in corporate tax provisions. I am fully confident that the Finance Committee could continue to work in the same direction, and achieve the revenue targets in my amendment without increasing individual taxes at all.

CLOSING CORPORATE TAX LOOPHOLES

A budget, of course, only gives the Finance Committee a revenue target. It is up to the committee to determine how to achieve that target. But let me describe the assumptions I have been using to derive the revenue projections in my amendment. They show that the revenue target in my amendment indeed can be attained by closing or reducing corporate tax loopholes.

First, I assume enactment of a 20 percent alternative minimum tax on corporations, using a fairly broad definition of economic income as the basis for assessing such a tax.

An alternative minimum tax on corporations which uses the same 20 percent rate presently applied to the minimum tax on individuals would raise significant amounts of revenue and would make certain that all profitable corporations paid their fair share of taxes.

Second, I assume enactment of legislation to control the growth of corporate "tax expenditures." Taken as a whole, tax exemptions, credits, and deductions used by the corporate sector will total approximately $94.8 billion in fiscal year 1985—an amount equal to nearly two-thirds of the entire cost of all nondefense discretionary programs in the Federal budget. Yet, at a time when other spending programs of Government will be cut or frozen, corporate tax expenditures are allowed to grow unchecked. Last year, the joint committee on taxation estimated that the cumulative total of corporate tax expenditures would rise by at least 8 percent between fiscal year 1985 and fiscal year 1986, at a time when the administration is projecting only a 4.3-percent rise in inflation. Applying a "freeze" on corporate tax expenditures in fiscal year 1986 would both increase Federal revenues and ask the corporate sector to bear a reasonable share of the burden of deficit reduction.

Third, I assume enactment of legislation to close certain tax loopholes which permit corporations to shelter their income from taxation. A number of these loopholes were scaled back in the Deficit Reduction Act, and the Finance Committee can, and I assume that it will again this year, move further toward the elimination of many of these tax breaks.

Fourth, I have included in the spending portion of my amendment some $200 million a year in additional funding for the Internal Revenue Service to enhance and strengthen their compliance and enforcement activities. Many individuals and corporations are avoiding paying the taxes they now legally owe because the IRS lacks the resources to spot tax avoidance and obtain the amounts due to the Treasury. By the Treasury's own estimate, over $80 billion a year in taxes owed is not collected. Yet in spite of this appalling statistic, the administration has actually proposed to reduce the budget for the IRS. My amendment would reverse this "penny-wise and pound-foolish" approach by increasing IRS funding. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that $8 in increased tax receipts can be produced for each $1 invested in additional IRS resources, so the additional funding which my amendment provides for this purpose should both improve the basic fairness of the tax system and yield significant increases in revenues.

Finally, with respect to revenues, I have assumed for purposes of developing the revenue target in the amendment that the cigarette excise tax provisions enacted under the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act will remain in force, and that the 16 cents per pack excise tax will not be decreased to 8 cents, as is assumed by the Dole package. At a time when this Nation is facing staggering deficits as far as the eye can see, we cannot and must not allow ourselves even to think about cutting taxes further. This is not a new tax, but only a continuation of a tax that currently is in place.

I believe that a combination of these provisions would significantly improve the basic fairness of our tax system, while also raising sufficient revenue to pay for the essential spending restorations which I call for in the rest of my amendment.

SLOWING THE GROWTH OF DEFENSE SPENDING

In order to proceed toward a balanced package—and toward a budget that is both wise and prudent—I will reduce the increase in the real growth for defense contained in the White House Republican leadership budget from 3 to 1 percent in fiscal year 1986, leaving in place the 3-percent real growth contemplated in the Republican budget for both of the succeeding years.

In the past, I have been a strong advocate of increased levels of defense spending and have supported the higher levels over the past 4 years. I also recognize that we have asked our allies in NATO to try to reach the goal of 3 percent in annual real growth to which we have agreed. Nevertheless, I believe there are good reasons to support a lower level of growth next year. First and foremost, the Pentagon must be impressed with the need to exercise substantially more effective cost control over its Weapons Procurement Program than has been the case over the last 4 years. The seemingly endless series of horror stories of sloppiness, both on the part of the contractors and Pentagon officials, and constant overcharging for commonplace items such as light bulbs, wrenches, soldering irons, toilet seats, and so forth, has eroded the national consensus for the level of real growth in spending which we have approved during the past 4 years.

Therefore, I believe the Defense Department can absorb this modest reduction in its fiscal year 1986 budget—and that the difference can and should be made up rather easily with some appropriate belt-tightening.

I want to note that the Senate Armed Services Committee, in its markup of its 1986 authorization measure, as one alternative did conduct a markup of the defense programs at a zero percent real growth level. In the context of doing that, no major weapons systems were eliminated from our inventory.

In the long run, the American people are more likely to continue to support a vigorous level of defense spending if the appropriate level of cost-consciousness and discipline is instituted throughout our procurement process. I believe the slight reduction in real spending growth—which still more than adjusts the defense budget for inflation—will contribute to this much-desired goal, while at the same time yielding a much fairer and more equitable budget.

REDUCTION IN FOREIGN AID

The final component of my budget amendment is a reduction in foreign aid by $1.9 billion in outlays over a 3-year period compared to the Republican budget's proposal. These reductions can be—and should be—achieved without cutting aid to Israel, Egypt, Greece, and Turkey below the levels they have received this year. My amendment contains essentially the same reductions in foreign aid as contained in the Chiles-Hollings amendment the Senate considered earlier today.

WE MUST LOOK TO THE FUTURE

The American people appreciate and aspire to excellence, to advancement, to growth, and to improvement. They also know that our Government—a government that is of, by, and for the people, not an independent authority and oppressor that defies the will of the majority—in the past has been a key contributor to realization of such hopes and aspirations. They also know intuitively that it must continue to be a key contributor if their dreams and ambitions for the future are to be realized.

And, in a nutshell, that is the budget debate in which the Senate is involved today. The only way Government can be such a contributor to the kind of future we want to see is if the Congress—in the present—assures that the Federal budget allows for and contributes to those objectives rather than strangling them.

The challenge is to craft a budget that points toward a future for this Nation and its people which will realize our full potential. We intend to do just that.

The amendment I am offering today is designed to assure that at least the minimum of necessary resources is available for investment in our people, our cities, and our energy and transportation infrastructure; for improving our competitive posture in the world economy and enhancing our domestic industries; and for spreading more fairly and equitably across the Nation the burdens of reducing the largest budget deficits in our history.

Perhaps most importantly, my amendment seeks to assure that our Nation's future will not be diminished by this budget. I hope the Senate will recognize that the budget debate is not just about dollars and cents, but is, in fact, about the future of our country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table entitled "Components of the Byrd Amendment to the White House-Senate Republican Compromise Budget."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPONENTS OF PROPOSED ROBERT C. BYRD AMENDMENT TO THE WHITE HOUSE-SENATE REPUBLICAN COMPROMISE BUDGET

[In fiscal years and billions of dollars]

	Effect on the Republican compromise budget's outlays
	1986	1987	1988	Total 1986–88
I. ADD-BACKS
Fairness and Equity:
Social Security, Railroad Retirement, Black Lung (Restore COLA)	+$2.8	+$7.2	+$11.9	+$21.9
Veterans pensions, disability; civilian, military retirement (Restore COLA)	+0.9	+2.2	+3.6	+6.7
Veterans health care programs, et cetera	+0.6	+0.9	+1.1	+2.6
Medicare: (Prevent new part B premium and deductible increase and other out-of-pocket cost increases; partial restoration of hospital reimbursement cuts below freeze level)	+1.1	+1.9	+3.1	+6.1
Medicaid: (remove artificial cap imposed on Federal participation in program)	+0.3	+0.6	+1.1	+2.0
Assuring economic growth and competitiveness:
Science & Research Activities (NSF, NIH, NASA, etc.)	+0.5	+0.8	+0.9	+2.2
Export promotion	+0.1	+0.5	+0.8	+1.4
Job training (including Job Corps, JTPA, etc.)	+0.4	+1.4	+1.7	+3.5
Making investments in our future—Human and physical capital:
Education programs	+0.5	+1.2	+1.6	+3.3
Child Nutrition programs	+0.4	+0.5	+0.7	+1.6
Economic/Transportation/Urban infrastructure programs (mass transit, UDAG Amtrak, EDA/ARC, etc.)	+0.9	+1.4	+2.1	+4.4
Agriculture	+3.8	+3.0	+4.1	+10.9
Other: Strengthening IRS tax compliance capacity	+0.2	+0.2	+0.3	+0.7
Subtotal—Add-backs	+12.5	+21.9	+33.1	+67.5
II OFFSETTING REVENUE
New Revenues: [1] Dollar amounts are budget targets only. The Finance Committee would have to draft specific legislation to achieve these target levels. These target levels could be met by the following:
Corporate Tax Loophole Closers: Revenues could be achieved in a number of ways, including a 20 percent alternative minimum corporate tax; a temporary freeze on the value of corporate tax expenditures; and targeted eliminations or reductions of existing corporate tax credits, deductions, and exemptions. (This proposal contemplates no increase of any kind in personal taxes.)	−12.0	−17.2	−21.8	−51.0
Extend the TEFRA cigarette tax	−1.5	−1.7	−1.7	−4.9
Subtotal, new revenues	−13.5	−18.9	−23.5	−55.9
Revenues attributable to strengthened enforcement of existing tax laws and collection of existing tax liabilities	−1.0	−1.7	−2.3	−5.0
Subtotal—Revenues	−14.5	−20.6	−25.8	−60.9
III. OUTLAY SAVINGS ATTRIBUTABLE TO SMALLER REAL DEFENSE SPENDING INCREASE
Reduce defense real spending increase (B.A.) in 1986 from 3 percent to 1 percent. (3 percent in both 1987 and 1988)	−2.0	−4.2	−5.6	−11.8
IV. REDUCTIONS IN FOREIGN AID
Foreign aid reductions	−0.3	−0.7	−0.9	−1.9
Total net budget effect of package relative to the Senate Republican-White House compromise budget [1]	−4.5	−4.3	−0.2	−9.1
Robert C. Byrd Package:
Remaining deficits [2]	170.9	142.5	99.6
Deficit reduction [2 3]	−56.5	−102.2	−144.0	−302.8
Senate Republican-White House compromise budget:
Remaining deficits	175.4	146.8	99.8
Deficit reduction	−52.0	−97.9	−143.8	−293.7

[1] (That is, this package will reduce the deficit $9.1 billion more than the Senate Republican-White House compromise budget in fiscal year 1986 through fiscal year 1988. These totals include net interest savings over the period. They also include all savings attributable to cuts made in the Senate Republican-White House compromise budget not altered by the provisions of the Byrd package.)

[2] These figures take into account all savings achieved by the Senate Republican-White House compromise budget to which the amendment will be offered—except those directly altered by the Byrd package.

[3] OMB economic forecast.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield before he yields the floor for a question?

Mr. BYRD. Yes. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, Mr. RIEGLE. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. RIEGLE. Just to engage in a brief discussion, if I may.

Mr. BYRD. Very well.

Mr. RIEGLE. First, I want to commend the Senator for I think a very important step in putting this package together with great care, and with an eye to the future in terms of building on the strength of the country. My question is with regard to the items that this package does not address. There are other items that fall outside of this package that I know are of concern to the Senator and of concern to me. I assume that we are still free later in the amendment process and later on down the line to try to address other specific problem areas that for one reason or another were not put into this package. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is correct. This is a perfecting amendment for a number of reasons, one of which is it cannot be amended. It is an amendment in the second degree. No amendment can be offered to this amendment.

Second, as the distinguished Senator states, it is not a complete budget substitute as has been offered by others. Those items which are not touched by this amendment could be further amended if such amendments are mathematically consistent. So there will be plenty of further opportunities to amend this budget if Senators wish.

Mr. RIEGLE. I appreciate that answer. So there would be the opportunity for those of us that support revenue sharing or support consideration of maintaining Federal civil service COLA's that we would still be free to address at a later time, and, if the votes are there, to work those out, compromise, or offer amendments, we would be free to do so. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. They would be.

Mr. RIEGLE. Finally, I want to say in conclusion that I appreciate very much the focus on the future, the investments in the future, and not stealing from the future in the area of education, research, scientific development, and so forth. I think that question of preparing for the future—which this proposal does, and which the White House package does not—is a very important distinction.

I ask unanimous consent to be added as a cosponsor to the package.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICE. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield 3 minutes?

Mr. BYRD. Yes. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished minority whip.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator, Senator BYRD. I am delighted to be a principal cosponsor. This proposal will reduce the fiscal year 1986 deficit figure by $56.5. That is $4.5 billion more than the Republican-White House proposal before us. The most important thing about this plan is that it is a very realistic proposal for dealing with the deficit. Social Security and other COLA's are retained as has been voted by the Senate, and yet still we make a larger dent in the deficit than the proposal that was placed before us by the White House and the Republican leadership.

It also restores the Medicare-Medicaid cuts, and it restores cuts in veterans' medical care. Very importantly, it makes essential investments in American competitiveness, and in human and fiscal capital for our future in terms of education and so forth. It recaptures revenues for the Treasury through proposals for compliance, and for a corporate minimum tax. But it is not a tax increase. It does not affect the general rates paid by business, by corporations, and by individuals. It simply seeks to ensure greater fairness in our taxation system by ensuring that corporations—some of which notoriously have avoided paying any taxes at all, while earning billions and even getting tax refunds—will henceforth pay at least a modest share of what they should. It extends the cigarette tax which is due to expire in the fall of 1985. That is not a tax increase. I am confident that would be something that the Republican leadership would seek to accomplish at some later stage. It might as well be done now. It makes a realistic cut in defense, allowing for a 1-percent increase over inflation in 1986, and then a 3-percent increase over inflation in the ensuing 2 years.

I personally differ with that particular part of this package. I would like to see us restraining defense in this coming year without any increase and without even a COLA. But in the interest of accommodation, of compromise, and of getting a realistic package that can win adequate votes in the Senate, I nonetheless support this proposal.

The amendment also contains properly allocated cuts in foreign aid which let us keep our commitments under Camp David and other treaties but does make some reduction.

To repeat, the basic premise of this budget proposal offered by Senator BYRD is that it is grounded in reality. I believe the alternative placed before us by the Republican-White House leadership is not a sustainable, feasible project. We have already witnessed evidence to that in the adoption of amendments offered by Republicans, adopted by the Senate, which have made some very significant changes in that package placed before us by the White House and the Republican leadership.

I think that proposal is as unrealistic as the 1981 tax cuts which were supposed to pay for themselves but did not. This proposed budget that came from the White House and the Republican leadership was supposed to make a dent in the deficit but already significant changes have been made in it on amendments offered by the Republicans.

For all these reasons, I urge support for the pending amendment.

Mr. LAUTENBERG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Will the minority leader yield 10 minutes for me on this amendment?

Mr. BYRD. How much time do I have, may I ask the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GOLDWATER]. Twenty-three minutes and forty seconds.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

I yield, could we say, 8 minutes?

Mr. LAUTENBERG. I thank the Democratic leader. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in sponsoring the budget proposal offered by the Senate from West Virginia.

Mr. President, the question is not whether to cut the deficit. The deficit threatens our economic future. The question is how to cut the deficit.

The proposal before us cuts the deficit while investing in our future, by investing in the education of our children and in the promotion of science and by maintaining the infrastructure, the foundation for economic growth.

The proposal cuts the deficit without undercutting our obligation to care for the needy, the sick, and the hungry, through programs like Medicare, Medicaid and child nutrition. The proposal cuts the deficit without breaking our bond to older Americans on Social Security. It cuts the deficit by restraining defense spending. In fact, I think we could even do more. It recognizes that the burden of fighting the deficit must be shared equally, and that involves increased revenues.

Mr. President, the package goes a long way toward addressing the flaws in the budget plan proposed by the White House and the Republican leadership.

As the Senator from West Virginia knows, I had intended to offer an amendment to restore funding for three programs on which our economy depends: Amtrak, mass transit, and urban development action grants. I want to thank the Senator for incorporating that amendment into his package.

As he recognizes, if our goal is maintaining a healthy economy, we cannot take a meat ax to programs on which a healthy economy depends. And a healthy economy depends not only on broad fiscal policy, it depends on an efficient system to move people and goods, systems like Amtrak and mass transit. Reviving the economies of our ailing cities and towns depends on effective programs like the UDAG program which provides a catalyst for economic revival.

Mr. President, over the next 3 years, these programs would account for one two-hundredths of Federal spending, outlays, but under the so-called compromise budget they would bear three times their share in deficit reduction.

That is unfair and its unwise. In many areas of our Nation, the Urban Development Action Grant Program has made the difference between urban decay and urban revival. By making the difference between whether a hotel, an office development, a factory gets built. Development that can swing a city around. By leveraging private investment with public money the UDAG program has spurred over 2,400 developments in close to 1,100 cities, involving $26 billion in private investments.

And that private investment yields $990 million a year in tax revenues and reduced transfer payments. Cutting the program does not save money, it costs money.

But, Mr. President, our towns and cities also need mass transit, to move people to and from work in the densely populated cities, counties, and States of our Nation. Without mass transit aid, transit arteries will clog and the economic heart of the city may falter.

Simply put, providing an efficient and workable system of tranportation is an essential function of Government. That is why we need mass transit assistance.

Mr. President, that is why we also need Amtrak. This Nation should not be the only advanced, industrialized nation that lacks a government-supported, national passenger rail network.

We subsidize air travel, through airport construction, an air traffic control system, through subsidies for the aircraft industry. We build a network of national highways, for auto and truck traffic. But under the budget before us, we would abandon the rails.

In doing so, Mr. President, we would abandon 500 towns and cities along the lines.

We would abandon 20 million passengers, passengers who will turn to cars, buses and airplanes that could not possibly bear the load.

We would abandon $3 billion in locomotives, equipment, and plant.

We would tear down a railroad after investing so much to build it up.

Mr. President, let us not fool ourselves. Cutting Amtrak subsidies will not create a leaner railroad with fewer stops. Because if Amtrak cuts lines, it incurs labor protection costs that will bankrupt the railroad. Shutting down Amtrak will cost $2.1 billion in contracted labor protection costs and it will cost towns and cities a vital raillink. It will cost millions of people a way to get to work and to move around this country. It will cost 25,000 jobs in 44 States.

In sum, Mr. President, I commend the Senator from West Virginia for offering this package, and particularly for including it in the restoration of these important investments in our economy. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I would like to propound a few questions to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. That will be fine.

Mr. BRADLEY. I commend the leader for his package. As I understand the package, it calls upon the Finance Committee to raise about $60 billion in revenues over the next 3 years. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. About $61 billion.

Mr. BRADLEY. As I understand the Budget Act and the procedure of the Senate, the amendment cannot specify—and does not specify—how revenues will be raised. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. This amendment does not specify. The distinguished Senator is on that committee and could differ with me or any others who are supporting this proposal as to how we would prefer to see the revenues raised.

Mr. BRADLEY. So to vote for this amendment does not obligate one to vote for any specific tax proposals; is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BRADLEY. So indeed Senators might be able to arrive at a revenue number in different ways; is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BRADLEY. And it certainly does not mean that supporting the amendment is an endorsement of a minimum tax or of any particular kind of tax bill. That decision is left with the Finance Committee and with the individual Senator. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BRADLEY. I thank the minority leader very much.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator for clarifying this matter.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Democratic leader yield me 6 minutes?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I yield 6 minutes.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I would like to follow on the colloquy which just took place between the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from West Virginia, the minority leader.

The questions that the Senator from New Jersey propounded as a member of the Finance Committee and one of the leading experts on that committee in regard to taxes produced a very fine colloquy to have in the RECORD because it exactly explains a situation of the amendment regarding taxes in the proposed amendment.

I want to cite one of the reasons why we should not wait to make some adjustments, but to indicate that those adjustments should be made now by addressing this situation immediately in the budget resolution before us.

I have asked my staff to prepare the latest figures which are available for, I presume, the largest group of profitable corporations. That is, the group of largest profitable corporations that under the current tax law are not paying any income taxes. I would like to share that with my colleagues.

We do not necessarily have these in the best order under any criteria except right at the top we have four very profitable corporations who, instead of paying any Federal income taxes, actually got rebates.

The latest figures that are available are from 1983. The profits from General Electric, $2.4 billion. They got a $35 million rebate from the Treasury rather than paying some taxes.

Boeing had profits of $475 million, and they got a $44 million rebate.

Columbia Gas System had profits of $337 million and got a rebate of $31 million.

General Dynamics had almost a half billion dollars in profits, paid no income tax but got a $1 million rebate from the Treasury Department.

Lockheed paid no income taxes on profits of $461 million, and Commonwealth Edison had $1.1 billion in profits and paid $3 million—$3 million out of $1.1 billion of profit. They were taxed by the Federal Government, under our laws, $3 million.

AT&T had almost $9 billion in profits and paid taxes of $26 million. Sears, Roebuck, with $8 billion of profits, paid $67 million in taxes. Pacific Gas & Electric, $1.1 billion profit, $57 million in taxes. E.F. Hutton had $143 million profit and zero taxes paid.

W.R. Grace & Co. had $88 million in profit and did pay almost $3 million in taxes.

Mr. President, I think what this demonstrates, first of all, is that we have been a little bit lax in some of our recent tax bills and we have created a situation where, in order to encourage greater economic activity and, therefore, economic recovery, we have allowed the tax laws to be so wide open that practically no taxes are paid by these particular corporations in the latest year for which the figures are available.

Mr. President, I know none of us intends that, but since we are responsible for it, I do not think we should wait on indicating to the Finance Committee that the proper thing to do is to address this problem as soon as practical. Rather than view this as some sort of drawback to this particular amendment, the fact that it indicates that taxes should be raised along these lines, I believe that this is a very solid reason why we should vote for this particular proposal, this particular amendment to the budget resolution before us.

We should not allow ourselves to somehow be led along the path that collecting proper amounts of revenue from profitable companies should be put off any longer. We should indicate our desire and our direction to do that immediately. I am not talking about this amendment as if this provision were a sense-of-the-Senate resolution that ought to be corrected sometime. I am thinking of this as what it says in the amendment itself. It directs the Finance Committee to come up with a system of gathering additional revenue so that we can send some signal to the American people that we are, indeed, getting this deficit down, and this must be a part of it. We know that. It has come. If we have not decided in our own minds that it is coming, I invited any one of my colleagues to visit with some of their constituents to see what they think of this proposition.

This is not some quirk, Mr. President. I cited some 11 countries which are most glaring as having paid little or no taxes in 1983, the last year for which the figures are available. But if we say that 25 percent of their profits would be a reasonable tax, similar to what we pay on our own personal income and the rest of the taxpayers have to pay on the income that they earn, that would have netted to the Government $4 billion out of those figures that I have mentioned.

I might further point out that 129 major U.S. corporations paid taxes at a rate of less than 25 percent in 1983. I think it is time we correct it. I believe this provision in the amendment is very worthwhile and one that deserves the backing of all of us.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distisnguished Senator from Montana. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] 3 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, after 3 weeks of posturing, maneuvering, and sideshows, the Senate is getting serious about the budget:

Serious about how deeply we want to reduce the deficit; serious about keeping the promise of Social Security for senior citizens; serious about ending the reckless increases in military spending; serious about investing in programs that will truly strengthen our economy and our country; and serious about whether we mean it when we speak about sharing the burden fairly.

These tasks cannot be addressed separately. We do not have the luxury of passing one budget to cut the deficit, another to show the folks back home, and yet another to send to the President. We are obligated to pass one budget which represents our best judgment about the country's needs for the years ahead.

The Byrd proposal faces that crucial question directly and responsibly. It acknowledges that we cannot and should not preserve any program just because it exists. It also acknowledges that budget cuts across the board by some rote formula are wrong, because they fail to recognize that future economic strength depends upon wise investment today. And it honestly recognizes that there are two columns in the budget—revenues and expenditures. The proposals from the Republican side of the aisle suffer a special form of myopia in this respect.

The Republican leader—and even the President himself—have repeatedly said that additional revenues may be necessary as a last resort. Presumably, they regard the last resort as the 11th hour of the House-Senate conference that will ultimately write the final package.

But for those of us who will not be part of the House-Senate conference, the future is now. The last resort is here. This is the last chance to put our votes where our priorities are. The time for posturing against increased revenues is over. We all accept the need for deficit reduction and progress toward a balanced budget. But it is wrong to try to reach that target by savage cuts in programs vital to our Nation's future.

The Byrd plan is an honest, fair, and forward looking proposal. It cuts the deficit significantly—to less than $100 billion by 1988. It honors our promise to Social Security recipients and sustains our commitments to the poor. It maintains crucial investments in education, training, research and development. And it proposes that all taxpayers pay their fair share of the bill for the Nation's needs.

There are no tricks in this proposal. No sleight of hand. It straightforwardly sets forth our needs, honors our obligations, and proposes to pay for what we spend. I urge the Senate to adopt it as our budget for the Nation.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who is cosponsor of the amendment. I yield 2 minutes to Mr. METZENBAUM.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise to indicate my support for this plan, but in doing so, I want to make it clear that I do have one reservation about it. That reservation has to do with the fact that it provides for a 1-percent increase in defense spending.

Mr. President, this body, by a vote of 51 to 48, indicated its position on the matter of defense spending and indicated that it supported a freeze. I very strongly support the position that the Senate has heretofore indicated was the majority point of view. But I am aware of the fact that if this plan is adopted, it is subject to amendment. That being the case, I want to declare that if it is adopted, I—some other Senator might offer it, but if no other Senator does, I shall offer an amendment to reduce the defense spending increase from the 1 percent provided in this package.

I do that because I believe we are wasting too much as far as the Department of Defense is concerned. I think if we give the Department of Defense an increase for inflation, that would be totally adequate. But I think there are so many good aspects of the Byrd proposal that I want to vote for it, and with that understanding I do intend to vote for it.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield to my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I associate myself with the Senator's remarks. I indicate that should the amendment pass and he offers such a modifying amendment later, it would be my intention to support that amendment.

FAIR AND EFFECTIVE DEFICIT REDUCTION

Mr. President, I am supporting and cosponsoring the Byrd budget package because it is the only approach now available that is both fair and effective in sharply reducing deficits. It does not ask our senior citizens to forgo the needed annual inflation adjustment while providing such an adjustment for the Defense Department. It does not severely cut or eliminate many important domestic programs while ignoring that billions of dollars of revenues are lost each year through outright tax evasion and fraud.

What this package does provide is a vision for the future by assuring economic growth and strengthening the competitiveness of the American economic system. By increasing the funding for scientific research and development, export promotion, education, and job training and retraining, this package charts a course for the sound economic future of our Nation by making needed long-term investments.

Mr. President, as I mentioned earlier, this proposal is fair because it provides full COLA's for Social Security and veterans' pensions. It eliminates the increases in the out-of-pocket costs for Medicare beneficiaries contained in the White House-Senate Republican budget sparing our senior citizens sharply rising medical costs they cannot afford.

While this package does contain new revenues, it is clearly stated that none of the revenues are to be achieved by increasing the individual income tax rates. I flatly oppose any increase in individual income tax rates. I believe it is both possible and sound to raise the amount of revenues contained in this proposal by counting the new revenues that will be raised through tax simplification. A restructuring of our tax code will make it more difficult for individuals to avoid paying legally owed taxes, and will call on highly profitable corporations who presently pay no taxes, to begin to contribute a minimum fair share tax payment.

Most importantly, this package would result in lower deficits than those proposed in the White House-Senate Republican budget. It would cut the deficit $4.5 billion more in fiscal year 1986, $4.3 billion more in fiscal year 1987, and $200 million more in fiscal year 1988, for a total of $9 billion more in deficit reduction over the next 3 years, than the Republican White House plan.

In closing Mr. President, it is important to mention that as in any comprehensive proposal there are specific aspects of this package that I feel fall short of what is needed. For example, I am disappointed that certain housing elements, Federal civil service COLA's, and postal subsidies for the blind and disabled, among others are not included in this package. However, no package is perfect and if this proposal is adopted by the Senate it will be in a position where further amendments can be offered and many of the shortcomings can be corrected and I and others will attempt to make needed changes. I urge my colleagues to join with us in supporting this amendment.

Mr. CRANSTON. If the Senator will yield to me, I also associate myself with his remarks and state that that is the part of this measure which I like least. I joined as a cosponsor because I believe overall it is a very sensible program, far better than the alternatives facing us. But I will also join in an amendment to see to it that defense gains no interest if it is passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time has expired.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

It is only fitting at this point that I acknowledge the major assistance and support that has been given by many, many Senators on this side of the aisle in assembling this package. Over the course of the past 3 weeks I have talked individually or in small groups to virtually all Democratic Senators about which vital national priorities should be reflected in the budget and the deficiencies in the White House-Republican leadership budget which must be challenged. In particular, I would like to express appreciation to several Senators for their major contributions in the development of the amendment that has been offered today. These include Mr. MOYNIHAN and Mr. RIEGLE on Social Security COLA's, Senator CRANSTON on veterans' provisions, Senators KENNEDY and

CHILES on Medicare and Medicaid, Senator SARBANES on Federal retirees, Senator INOUYE, on export promotion, Senators MELCHER, BOREN, and HARKIN on agriculture, Senators LAUTENBERG, DODD, and MOYNIHAN on urban development action grants, mass transit, and Amtrak; Senators RIEGLE, SASSER, and MATSUNAGA on economic development programs; and Senator METZENBAUM on corporate tax loophole closers.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to thank my staff for their yeoman work on this amendment. I want to thank Susan Manes, staff director of the Policy Committee; Linda Peek, Communications Director; Barbara Videnieks, executive director of my office; Sally Laird, Steve Quick, Dick D'Amato, Kevin Nealer, Abby Saffold, Charles Kinney, and Marty Paone of the Policy Committee staff. And finally, I want to single out for special thanks Scott Bunton, deputy director of the Policy Committee and Tom Sliter of the Policy Committee staff, for their outstanding work.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GORTON. I yield myself 8 minutes.

Mr. President, I do wish to begin my remarks by commending the distinguished minority leader for what is obviously a serious proposal with respect to deficit reduction in spite of the fact that I may disagree with it. It is a tribute to him that he has been able to unite so many of his members behind it. It is perhaps a tribute to the President of the United States and the Republican leadership that it operates generally within the frame of reference of the budget debate to this point, that is to say, while there are restorations in this program, unlike amendments in previous years from that side of the aisle, there are no attempts to create major new programs or substantially to increase old ones. They are going in the same direction as we are. They simply have not, in my view, seen the logic of the Republican leadership's set of ideas.

Where we differ substantially is in two distinct areas: First, the distinguished Senator from Michigan was very careful to associate himself with the proposal of the minority leader only after he made it clear that he would attempt to restore more spending to it once it had been adopted as the agenda for the remainder of the debate. So the proposition that this amendment would actually save more on the budget deficits than does the one which is before the Senate right now is subject to that major proviso.

It is quite obvious that it would not satisfy the spending desires of many Members on the other side of the aisle, in that they would seek to add to the spending totals in this proposal. But even taking it in its present form and basing my argument on the assumption that there would be no further spending restorations, we have before us the classic debate in this body: Are we going to deal with the budget deficit exclusively, or almost exclusively, by reducing Federal spending programs or are we going to deal with it, very significantly at least, by increasing taxes, however sugar coated, however directed at nontax-paying corporations. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY] tried to make it exceedingly clear in supporting this proposal that he has grave reservations about the tax pattern assumed by the minority leader in these proposals. He did so with good reason—because these proposals clearly undermine the chances for serious tax reform later on in this year. In fact, I daresay, Mr. President, that they for all practical purposes would eliminate them because they take moneys from a corporate minimum tax, which this body has already voted will go into reducing individual income taxes as a part of a tax reform package, and transfer them into spending programs, thus sentencing tax reform to a much more dubious fate than would otherwise be the case.

This proposal also proceeds from the mistaken assumptions that it does not matter in the reduction of budget deficits whether you do it by reducing spending or by increasing taxes; that has no impact on the economy or on economic growth. That assumption, however, flies in the face of both facts and economic theory. Almost without exception the economists who testified before the Budget Committee stated that the economy would be stronger, that growth would be greater, that jobs would be more numerous if we solved our problems by cutting spending programs rather than by increasing taxes.

It is easy to talk about corporation minimum taxes and non-tax-paying corporations, but the money that they do not pay in taxes goes into providing jobs for American working men and American working women. This proposal would clearly result in a lower-employment level and a higher-unemployment level than the alternative Republican leadership proposal.

Finally, Mr. President, in distinction with the proposal which the Republican leadership has placed before us, this does not meet the test of fairness. It does restore cost-of-living adjustments—for all practical purposes, across the board—to retired persons under Federal retirement systems.

It does not, however, provide for any increase in the salaries of people who are at work for the Federal Government or otherwise. I find it a paradox that we should be unwilling to ask for the same sacrifice and the same discipline from those who are retired as we are asking from those who are actually at work.

I believe that fairness demands we treat such groups equally and not in a differential fashion. It is not to say that I disagree with every element of this proposal. Some of these restorations will be found in the final Republican leadership's proposal, and the real question will be whether or not we want to maximize economic growth, maximize job opportunities by dealing with spending programs which have grown beyond belief over the course of the last decade or so or whether we wish to surrender and say that we can only deal with these problems by increasing taxes and thus decreasing economic activity and economic opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator briefly yield for a clarification in reference to a comment he made in reference to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GORTON. The Senator will yield for a short question. If the Senator from Michigan wishes to make a speech, it will be on his own time.

Mr. RIEGLE. It will not be a speech. I had just wanted to correct the record.

The Senator from Washington correctly noted that I suggested being free to later deal with certain other items that were not contained in the package and that in fact would add cost. But as the Senator also knows, or I want to advise him, I also indicated there was one item in the package that I would move to reduce that would produce revenue to more than offset that. So it would not be the intention of the Senator from Michigan to offer any add ons that were not paid for by some other saving.

Mr. GORTON. The Senator notes the comments but also notes that revenue sharing, which was specifically mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, would cost all by itself considerably more than a 1-percent cut in the defense budget.

I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it be charged equally.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator withdraw that request?

Mr. GORTON. He will.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, a budget document is not just a set of numbers. There is no magic number in this regard, unless it is zero, a balanced budget, and I think we are all working toward that, some of us may disagree on the way to reach that goal.

But what we are talking about here is not just a set of numbers. It is a statement of priorities, policies and principles that will affect millions of Americans—and the direction that our Nation takes as it begins to prepare for the future.

The amendment that is before the Senate seeks to assure that our Nation's future will not be diminished by what we in this Congress do in this budget.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I remind the minority leader that the time under his control has expired.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes off the resolution.

I do not think that the amendment or the resolution addresses every matter to the full satisfaction of every Senator. There are other matters which I personally would like to have added or taken away. But I sought to do the best I could in addressing matters that are of great importance to every Senator in this body.

I hope that the Senate will recognize, then, that the budget debate is not just about dollars and cents. We are discussing real peoples' futures as we stand here. We are discussing this Nation's ability to compete in the global marketplace. We are discussing real peoples' parents and real peoples' children when we debate here about the figures on the budget chart.

This amendment begins to change the course and reflect this Nation's determination to reach for the stars, to reach for the best lives, to reach for the best living standard, to reach for the greatest opportunity, and to reach for the highest fulfillment attainable for our people. This is what the American people want. This is what the American people deserve. It is the responsibility of those of us in Congress to lay out the means of arriving at those goals.

So I urge my colleagues to vote for the amendment, to vote for the kind of future that we all want to see for our Nation and its citizens—your children, my children, your grandchildren and mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator for 2 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise to express concern over the Byrd amendment. I intend to vote for it, but I am voting for it with reservations. I would not vote for it if it called upon the Senate Finance Committee to draft specific legislation to achieve targeted revenue levels.

The Byrd amendment does not call for any specific or detailed revenue measures. While the debate on the Byrd amendment makes clear that the targeted levels could be achieved by certain specific and detailed measures, these are only recommendations. I clearly want it understood that I am not in favor of the recommendations that have been advocated by the proponents of the Byrd amendment.

I voted against the very punitive TEFRA tobacco tax when it was before the Senate earlier and I do not feel it should be extended. I, at this time, am not advocating the recommendations pertaining to corporate tax measures that have been mentioned by the proponents of the Byrd amendment. I would clearly want to study each and every one of these and see how they affect small businesses and small corporations, as well as how they will affect the growth policy of our economy, local units of government, and the well-being of various segments of the American economic society.

I believe the revenue targeted levels can be obtained through better tax compliance, strengthened enforcement of existing tax laws, and collection of existing tax liabilities.

It may well be that in our efforts to simplify our income tax laws that we will be able to bring about provisions in the Tax Code, greatly assisting tax compliance, enforcement, and collection. The goal of $14.5 billion in fiscal year 1986 is not an unrealistic goal to be obtained through closing of loopholes, strengthening enforcement, better compliance, and more effective collection.

I want it clearly understood that in supporting the Byrd amendment I am not advocating any new taxes or any additional taxes.

The Byrd amendment is attractive because it does not cut Social Security and provides a good number of add backs that are needed, particularly in science and research activities, veterans health care programs, Medicare, education and other provisions contained in the items of the Byrd amendment.

The Byrd amendment is attractive to me in that it provides for some real growth in national defense, under the present amended budget before the Senate, real growth in defense revitalization is at zero. I feel that we must have real growth in national defense and the Byrd amendment of 1-percent real growth is better than the zero growth that is presently adopted by the Senate.

I also like the reductions in foreign aid contained in the Byrd amendment. It is also attractive because it reduced the deficit in fiscal year 1986 by $56.5 billion, which is $4.5 billion more than the White House-Republican Senate multiple compromise budget and because it reduces the deficit over the 3-year period by more than $9 billion more than the GOP compromise package.

While I am not in agreement with everything in the Byrd amendment and would do many things differently, it represents the best overall budget package that has been presented to the Senate thus far and which has any possibility of passage.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the Byrd perfecting amendment to the budget resolution. It attempts to restore funding for necessary Federal programs, while continuing to address the serious deficit situation we now face. I support this amendment and I encourage my colleagues to support it.

I am, however, disappointed that the Chiles-Hollings substitute was not accepted. I supported that plan because it would have reduced the deficit fairly and effectively, calling for a balanced budget in 5 years.

An important element of the Byrd perfecting amendment which I would like to address is the language added on economic growth and competitiveness. This language focuses on a serious need which we must recognize and begin to address. Quite simply, as a Nation we are not as competitive as we could be.

There is popular agreement that we face a serious military threat in many parts of the world, but I suggest that we also face an economic threat with international dimensions. To be sure, both these threats are driven by external forces. The economic threat, however, is not as widely recognized.

While it may be true that the economy has rebounded from the depths of the recession of the early eighties, and that the President deserves credit for the prosperity we now enjoy, recently there have been clear signs of an economic slowdown. The Government has announced that its main index for predicting changes in economic trends registered a small but unexpected decline of two-tenths of 1 percent in March. In the wake of other recent reports of weak first-quarter economic growth and an upturn in inflation, we face serious questions regarding the strength of the economy at this time.

More than ever before, we operate in a highly competitive international marketplace and world economy. International trade now accounts for over 10 percent of our gross national product. Almost 10 million American workers owe their jobs to trade-related activities. Currently over 70 percent of American products now must compete with imports from countries in Europe, Asia, and Latin America.

Last year we imported $341.1 billion, but exported only $217.9 billion. As a result, the trade deficit reached $123.3 billion in 1984, more than double the previous year and the 9th year in a row we have imported more than we have exported. And our trade deficits have cost over 3 million jobs lost or not created since 1980. This year we are already off to a new record-setting, trade-deficit pace.

I agree that a part of the enormous trade deficit is related to the high value of the dollar relative to the currency of other nations. This imbalance must be addressed. We must also address the problems associated with the lack of coherent trade policy in this country. But, the deteriorating trade balance also reflects a weakening of our competitive position in the world economy.

This lack of competitiveness is not limited to the so-called "sunset" industries such as steel and automobiles, but is showing up in almost every sector of the American economy. Seven out of 10 American high-technology sectors have lost market shares since 1965, and in 1984 our trade deficit with Japan in electronics was greater than in automobiles. The declining competitive position of American industry is further documented in a recently completed report, "The President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness."

We are losing ground in almost every sector—in capital goods, high technology products, automotive goods, consumer goods, and industrial supplies and materials. Many of these are industries where we once held substantial leads in the world. The future of many of these and other basic industries is now seriously threatened.

New Mexico and many other States have been hurt by our trade problems. The mining industry has been hard hit by foreign competition, much of it unfair competition. The potash, copper, and uranium industries have been devastated. They have all suffered from decreased production, mine closings, high unemployment and regional economic dislocation in the face of foreign overproduction and dumping in U.S. markets.

I feel we need to reverse these trends in mining and other basic industries. But first we must recognize the problems and then take action to reverse harmful trends.

As a start we must reduce our Federal deficit so that interest rates will decline, make more money available for capital investment, and bring the value of the dollar into alignment with foreign currencies. We must also streamline remedies available to protect industries adversely affected by foreign govenment subsidization and unfair competition. We must direct more research and development dollars to the commercial sector, and we must improve the multilateral trading system.

However, as we are now debating the budget for fiscal year 1986 we still are not recognizing the challenge and the consequences or our failure to address our trade problems. Interestingly, the budget submitted by the President and the GOP compromise plan passed by the Senate last week contain spending cuts that would further exacerbate our competitiveness problems. Cuts are called for in programs to promote exports, to encourage research and development, and to improve our educational system in critical math, sceince, and high-technology areas. We must all work to restore these programs and resist shortsighted cuts in these areas.

The competitiveness language in the Byrd amendment restores cuts in these critical areas. It provides funding for the promotion of exports, research and technology, and educational programs in math, science, and high-technology areas. Funding is also restored for the dislocated workers section of the Job Training Partnership Act. For these reasons I support the Byrd amendment and hope my colleagues will adopt it.

The strength and vitality of the American economy are the underpinnings of our standard of living and our security. I believe we now face a challenge to our economic leadership in the world. I also believe that once we recognize that challenge and develop a consensus on how to meet it, we will bring to bear all the ingenuity, creativity, and energy that has made this country great.

I support the Byrd amendment, because it restores funding in many necessary Federal programs.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I will support and vote for the Byrd amendment because it is, as was the Chiles-Hollings amendment before it, superior to the so-called leadership plan.

Where it adds back funds which the Republican proposal would cut, it does so in a most responsible way. By providing for defense spending at a level 1 percent above inflation, it helps to meet what this Senator believes is our most solemn duty—that is, to adequately provide for the national defense.

By providing our elderly with full cost-of-living adjustments, it meets another obligation that I feel strongly about. So, in at least those two respects—on defense and retirement benefits—this amendment is superior to the alternative that I supported earlier today.

But both of these plans also face up to the fact that ultimately we must turn as well to the revenue side of our budgetary ledger. The Byrd amendment does, indeed, propose that we utilize responsible revenue-raising measures to help bring our outrageous deficits under control.

Finally, Mr. President, I prefer the Byrd amendment because it also addresses the substantial need to boost our efforts in education, in job training, and in science and research activities so vital to our future and to retain a Federal effort in insuring essential economic development, transportation, and infrastructure programs. But, again, it does this responsibly by advocating the revenues necessary and not by adding to our Nation's debt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BYRD. I yield 2 minutes, and if he needs 3, I will yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRADLEY. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. President, I rise simply to respond to what one of the opponents of this amendment stated a few minutes ago on the floor, which was that a vote for this proposal is a vote against tax reform.

I disagree most profoundly with that statement. It is possible to have major tax reform and over the course of several years to also have some increase in revenues. Indeed, the proposal that Congressman GEPHARDT and I have offered raises $40 billion over a 3-year period, even though it is revenue neutral in the first year. Tax reform is separate from the issue of whether there are other kinds of taxes that one might argue should be raised, whether that is freezing or increasing cigarette taxes, or gasoline taxes, or value-added tax or whatever. This most profoundly does not mean that to vote for this amendment is a vote against tax reform. Nor is it inconsistent with having voted for the Packwood amendment just last week, which stated that if there is a minimum tax, that revenues would be used for rate reduction and raising the threshold that one can reach before paying any tax.

So I think that the record would be incomplete if it were not clearly stated that support for this amendment is not inconsistent with support for tax reform. It is indeed fully consistent with doing so as long as one can explain how additional revenues would be raised.

I thank the minority leader for allowing me the time.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, we are going to vote shortly on the proposal of the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD, and I want to say that for those who thought the first 8 or 10 days of activity here on the Senate floor were futile and useless, and I have heard remarks such as "a waste of time," "running in place," I want to say that both proposals offered this afternoon indicate to me that there is a profound concern about the future of this country. In particular, the black cloud of debt hanging over the Nation that is going to ruin economic prosperity. Not for a few who are affected by Federal programs but for the general public of the United States.

I have said many times that while others may look at the last election and see all kinds of things in it, I was in it and I had briefing books about 18 to 24 inches thick. As I flew around, I could study them. When someone would talk about Superfund, I could be ready. In my State we have wild burros and donkeys and there is a Federal Wild Burros Act and I had a little book on it. Well, about 4 weeks before the election, after days of campaigning, I just said, "why don't we throw them all away" because there were only two issues. One issue that attracted everyone is why the young people came to the campaigns? Why 60 percent voted for the President? In my case, bragging, why 65, maybe 68 percent voted for me? Because they were concerned about economic prosperity.

They believed that their futures were tied, in spite of their competing interests. I think I understand this because I will have seven children in college next year. If I have no other record as a Senator, I think, in looking over history, that that is a record—seven in college. So I think I know how great young people are.

But I think that in spite of all the competing interests that young people have, it was the future they cared about. The future in terms of prosperity and economic opportunity. We are all here on the floor because we are frightened that we are not going to have that future unless we somehow drain that black cloud of debt in some way before it rains down on all of us in a catastrophic economic downtown.

So I do not think that the 22 hours used up on this resolution were useless. There were four or five very big issues decided upon and there have been two very important packages offered here today.

I compliment the distinguished minority leader. I cannot support his package. I think we can do better. But I compliment him.

As I understand it, he has reinstated all the cost-of-living indexes under current law except for one group: the civil servants. I do not think their retirement benefits have a cost-of-living adjustment assumed. I do not understand the rationale, but that is all right. He has put it back for all the other pensioners, but not them.

Mr. BYRD. Will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. BYRD. I understand that they are still frozen. The distinguished Senator, or any other Senator, may offer an amendment to put it back, as he knows.

Mr. DOMENICI. There is no question about that. We cannot put it back until after we have voted on this. But, nonetheless, we are just talking about our packages, and I am just offering a very simple, upfront observation that your amendment put all the COLA's back except that one. So now we have all the cost-of-living adjustments added back except for the civil servants. Your amendment has defense slightly higher than the Senate earlier voted at 0-3-3 real growth. Your amendment has 1-3-3 real growth a few billion dollars in budget authority are back in defense.

Then we get to the real difference. There is $65.6 billion less in savings from domestic programs, and there is $6.1 billion in new taxes.

Now, I do not want to repeat what I said in earlier debate, but clearly you cannot come down here on this floor of the Senate and say that is only a minimum corporate tax and a minimum tax on these who are not paying. It is in effect saying that we cannot get this budget reduced unless we add $6.1 billion in taxes.

I want to take only 2 minutes to explain why I do not think we ought to do that. First of all, it is very simple to say that taxes ought to be the last resort. I have done that already and I guess everybody has heard it for the last 3 or 4 months. They do not want to hear it anymore.

I do believe we ought to reduce the budget on the expenditure side to the maximum extent. When we are done if it is not enough, then tell the American people that is all we can do. Then look down 6 or 8 months from now when we finish this budget-cutting and say, "That was not good enough. We did not get the deficit down enough."

Let them be our judge. Let the people say then whether they want more taxes. I think that is a very good, democratic way to do it—front and center.

When that time occurs we can say, "Americans, we got the budget deficit down, but not enough. Now we will look at taxes." But if you put taxes in the very first piece of legislation that comes before us, I think you have told the American people that in this huge American budget, even with defense reduced as far as we can get it, we cannot cut spending more. I do not believe in that approach.

I cannot be part of a package unless it is different from this and cuts substantially more. I think we can and we should.

As to my second observation, we hear an awful lot about using tax reform to raise the $61 billion in this package. And we say to the American people that we are going to raise taxes in the interest of the average folks because there are those who ought to be paying their fair share.

Whether you are for tax reform or not, whether you are for this new tax reform package that the White House is talking about, the bill Senator BRADLEY has introduced, the bill Congressman KEMP and Senator KASTEN has introduced, let me tell you what I am for. I will bet you that 90 Senators are also for it. It is to take the working poor off the tax rolls. It is a sham to come here and say, "Let's tax somebody that is not paying enough and let's use it to pay for programs," when we have $16 billion in taxes being collected from the working poor.

They are the same people that we act in the name of when we talk about keeping one of these programs for $200 million or $300 million; $16 billion a year in taxes come into the tax coffers from people that fit the poverty definition to pay for these programs. I think it is an absurdity. I think it is an absurdity to ever talk about tax reform without using $16 billion to get the working poor off the rolls.

So when somebody says, "Enact a minimum tax: Tax those who are not paying," I say, "Aye," and let us use it first to get these people off the tax rolls that ought not to be on there.

Do you know that in 1977 they paid no taxes and now the average tax bill is 11.7 percent of their income. So I think that is where any new taxes ought to go first.

Frankly, I think it ought to go there before we pay for Amtrak. I think it ought to go there before we pay for Job Corps. I think it ought to go there before we pay for 15 or 20 programs and $200 million in additional spending that does not approach helping the millions of people that we could help by eliminating them from taxation.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. KENNEDY. It is my understanding that under the Bradley tax proposal that very concept is incorporated to exclude those that fall below the poverty line.

Mr. DOMENICI. I say to my good friend from Massachusetts that I have not looked at all the tax reform packages. I would assume that anyone as genuine as Senator BRADLEY would remove the working poor from the tax rolls.

Mr. KENNEDY. It is not too late to cosponsor that proposal. I daresay that many of those who are in strong support of the Byrd proposal are also cosponsors of the Bradley proposal to achieve the objectives of the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. DOMENICI. I understand. In due course, when I have time to study them, I will support one of them. There are a lot of them around that do a good job. I have not had enough time, with this other work here. But I will do that one of these days.

51-059 O-86-33 (Pt. 8)

Let me suggest that to the extent you put $61 billion in new taxes in the name of reducing the deficit, you cannot use it also to reduce rates for the poor. If you use it to reduce the deficit or to pay for programs, and then you must find more to eliminate the poor from taxation. There can be no double counting. You cannot use tax dollars to take people off the tax rolls and use the same money to pay for programs that are not needed.

There are many reasons to vote against the proposal of the distinguished minority leader. But I am going to vote against it because I believe we ought to send the message that we have reduced spending as much as we can. And I do not think we are at that point yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that, we could utilize a minute or two.

Mr. DOMENICI. I withhold my request.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield me just a minute for a comment?

Mr. BYRD. I yield a minute to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. I thank the Senator for yielding. I just want to make the observation that, as we offer packages from this side of the aisle, we on this side of the aisle have 47 seats in a body of 100 Members. So by ourselves we cannot pass anything. To be successful, we need not only all the votes on this side, but a minimum of four votes on that side to be in a position to be able to pass a bill.

So we do not have quite the luxury that the majority party has, where they have an automatic majority going in. We start as a minority and by offering one alternative and then another, we hope to be able to attract some crossover votes. But if we do not, we cannot prevail. There is no way to turn 47 Democratic votes into 51 Democratic votes. We need some Republican help. I hope perhaps we will get some on this package.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I believe we had six Republicans that voted for the proposal of the distinguished Senators CHILES and HOLLINGS.

How much time does the distinguished majority leader desire?

Mr. DOLE. Just a couple of minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield as much time as the majority leader desires.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will repeat pretty much what I said before the earlier vote. Again, I will indicate, as the distinguished manager just has, that six Republicans voted for the last package. I would point out that in the first vote on the first Republican package not a single Democrat voted for it. As I said earlier, I understand that. We were sort of testing and it was symbolic in a sense to sort of set the parameters.

But I think the more we look at the first vote, the more important it becomes because I see Members on both sides, Democrats and Republicans, both shooting for the $300 billion deficit reduction package over the next 3 years. I think that is very significant.

I have also indicated that I do not think all the wisdom on how to reduce the deficit is on this side of the aisle but I can indicate also to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that we have not said you cannot vote for the Democratic package. I also hope that the majority was automatic as you indicated. I have not found that to be the case since January. We have a majority in numbers but every Senator has his or her own idea. Senators vote independently.

But I indicate again that I certainly want to commend the distinguished minority leader and others who have joined in this package. I find I am troubled with the package because of the revenues. Again, I will not go through all of my experience in raising revenues. But it has been fairly broad. Some would say it was too broad. I am not afraid of revenues. But I hope that in this first effort, in the first resolution we send to the House, we send one over without revenues—just spending reductions. I am not certain we have reached that last resort that we have heard a lot about in the last year. I doubt that we have.

But I do not quarrel with anybody who is willing to offer a package and make tough decisions on how to reduce the deficit. It is not easy. I again cite the Gallop Poll as of Sunday showing that 81 percent of the American people say two things: 58 percent say the deficit is very serious, 23 percent say it is fairly serious. Only 5 percent say it does not make any difference. Fourteen percent have not heard of it yet. So put them down as undecided. [Laughter.]

But it will come. They will hear of it. They will either lose a job, a farm, or something because the deficit is going to catch up with everyone unless we take action in the Senate. So while I cannot support the distinguished minority leader's package, I hope that he can support our No. 2 if there is a No. 2. It will be without taxes. You will see some modifications in many of the programs that people were concerned about in the so-called No. 1 package. It has been put together largely through the hours and hours of work of the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator DOMENICI.

So I hope following this vote we can then go to the so-called KGB plan. I agree with the distinguished minority leader. If we can finish tomorrow, we ought to finish. When I say finish, I mean that we win. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes off the resolution.

I think the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished chairman have made very pertinent statements, and I think they are conscientious in dealing with this matter as they have done. I have respect for them. We on this side also believe that there has to be a reduction in the budget deficits. We must make some hard choices in order to do that, but we also believe that there are certain priorities in the White House-Republican leadership plan that do not properly take into consideration the future of this country. We believe the priorities contained in our amendment are so important to our Nation and its people that we must see them reflected in the budget, yet the seriousness of the deficit crisis compels us to pay the cost of our amendment by insisting that corporations pay their fair share of taxes.

So we are all on the same track. We want to see this budget deficit cut back. And we want to see the downward trend in that curve begin now. Our package does that. It does restore funding for some critical programs but we pay for them in ways that the American people view as fair such as a minimum tax on corporations and closing tax loopholes. I believe that the average taxpayer will agree that neither the enforcement of the Tax Code nor the Tax Code itself is fair.

If we do not restore fairness in the Tax Code now, we will have to do it sooner or later.

I believe that compliance with the Tax Code will be improved if we enact this package. Americans do not mind paying their share if they feel that everybody else is paying their fair share.

So I think all Senators who have participated in the debate. I am ready to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield back all of his time?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back whatever time I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute and 9 seconds.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back all of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the other side has expired. All time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr.

EAST] and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are absent due to illness.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 54, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 52 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—3

East	Exon	Wilson

So the amendment (No. 64) was rejected.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SUPPORTING A FREEZE IN FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR MASS TRANSIT AND AMTRAK

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I strongly support the maintenance of current funding levels for urban mass transit and Amtrak. There is a clear need to maintain funding for these programs.

Amtrak provides passenger service for some 20 million passengers a year, making it the sixth largest carrier of passengers by any mode of transportation, ranking behind only Greyhound, United, Delta, Eastern, and American Airlines. Between the cities in the New York-Washington corridor, Amtrak carries 17,500 passengers a day—46 percent more than all the airlines combined. Amtrak annually carries 833 passengers per route mile operated, more than any other mode of transportation. Per departure, Amtrak also loads more passengers at major terminals than either air or bus.

Amtrak is also a real and important factor in the national economy: Amtrak employs over 25,000 persons with an annual payroll of $254 million, and last year purchased $549 million more in goods and other services. In New York alone, Amtrak employs 2,344 men and women with an annual payroll of about $56 million. Amtrak further contributed, in addition, $18 million to New York's economy through the purchase of goods and other services.

Yet, the administration-Dole proposal would terminate all Federal support for Amtrak, thereby leaving its 20 million passengers to search for other means of transportation. Aside from the clear need for Amtrak service, terminating support for Amtrak would prove costly to the Federal Government. The statute that created Amtrak in 1971 required Amtrak and other railroads to provide contractual guarantees, that employees who are laid off when rail service is discontinued will receive "labor protection"—payments representing a portion of prior salary that can run for up to 6 years. Amtrak estimates that these labor protection costs would run $2.1 billion, if all service ended. The first year's cost is estimated at between $600 and $800 million—and thus could be as high as $116 million more than Amtrak's current appropriation.

Millions of Americans depend on mass transit to get to work, attend school, go to church, purchase groceries, deliver goods, and go about all our other essential daily activities. Without sound and reliable mass transit, many Americans simply would not be able to carry on their day-to-day lives. In 1984, about 2.8 million trips were taken each day on the New York City transit system alone—more than twice the number of farmers who receive support—deficiency payments, crop loans, or target price payments—from the Federal Government in the entire year. In the course of 1984, over 1 billion trips were taken on the New York City transit system.

A Federal commitment to maintain and improve our Nation's mass transit is essential if our transportation system is to be sound and healthy. The Republican budget package does not contain such a commitment. Rather, it would completely phase out urban mass transit operating assistance over the next 5 years. Formula capital grants would also be eliminated over the next 5 years, leaving only the Discretionary Capital Grant Program currently funded by 1 penny of the Federal gasoline tax. These mass transit cuts would have a devastating impact.

According to the American Public Transit Association, using Department of Commerce data and models, each $100 million in reduced operating support costs 9,600 jobs and $305 million in business revenues. Each $100 million of capital funding lost costs 7,600 jobs and $327 million in business revenues. The aggregate impact of the proposed cuts would be a loss of 49,100 jobs and over $1.9 million in business revenues—in 1986 alone! Over the next 3 years, some 124,500 jobs would be lost, along with $4.8 billion in business revenues.

Moreover, these statistics do not reflect cutbacks in service and fare hikes that would necessarily follow. There are approximately 28 million daily transit trips in America; more than 8 billion a year. Nearly every American and every city would be affected by these cuts, but mainly poor and moderate income people who rely on transit most.

Mr. President, I might also note that during the Senate Budget Committee's consideration of transportation programs, I offered an amendment that would have maintained support for mass transit at existing levels—as the Byrd plan does—but would also have reduced Federal outlays $5.6 billion over the next 3 years by adoption of an innovative financing mechanism for mass transit capital projects. The Byrd plan does not adopt this new financing mechanism, but it makes such good sense that I feel confident that it will ultimately be adopted by the Congress.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me also indicate that this is the last rollcall vote tonight. Under the announcement yesterday, the next amendment, we had hoped, would be the so-called KBG package. But I understand they are not quite prepared to offer that, so the first amendment will be the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER], followed by an amendment by the Senator from California [Mr. CRANSTON].

Mr. FORD. Will the majority leader yield? I have one amendment I would like to bring up sometime before the time expires. I will not need a great deal of time on it. Sometime tomorrow, if I may. How do we get in line to be the next amendment up?

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will indicate to the distinguished minority leader what he has, we will try to rotate. I think there is a chance we can finish this bill tomorrow but not if we have every amendment offered that is printed. There are 70-some amendments printed. If we had 70-some rollcalls, it would take quite a while. We are down to about 6 hours and 25 minutes. I would guess we will commence fairly early tomorrow, maybe be on the bill by 10 o'clock, so Members should be on notice. I hope that somewhere along the line we can put together a bipartisan package and have enough votes to pass. That might eliminate a lot of amendments. But that would still be up to the membership.

Mr. BIDEN. If the Senator will yield, we have one.

Mr. DOLE. Does the Senator want to lay his down?

Mr. BIDEN. No; I will wait until tomorrow to get the Senator on it.

Mr. DOLE. I will be all over it. [Laughter.]

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Many of us who have had amendments want to call them up. We want to debate them at least for a short period of time. I wonder if it is possible for the leader to attempt to work out some arrangement where, instead of every amendment having 1 hour and one-half hour on each side, that period might be shortened so that we not be calling up amendments without any time available for debate.

Mr. DOLE. Again, I think it would help if we know precisely how many amendments there were on each side. Frankly, I am not trying to encourage any on this side. I think the Democrats have been more restrained on budget busters than we have on our side. I hope they continue that pattern. We commended it highly to our colleagues but not with much success. So if Senator BYRD had the amendments and I had our amendments, we could probably sequence them and see how much time was left.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Let me say to the distinguished majority leader and all of our colleagues on both sides of the aisle, I will be very happy to see what I can do, working with Mr. CHILES and other Senators on this side, in an attempt to be able to lay our amendments and the sequence in which they will come and, if possible, get the time down under what is specified in the act itself. We will be happy to do that.

May I ask a question now? Does the distinguished majority leader intend to finish action on this resolution tomorrow evening if all the time has run?

Mr. DOLE. I am not certain I can answer that question at this point. I may know by early morning. I know some Senators have commitments tomorrow evening and they need to know, I assume, by noon or shortly thereafter. My inclination would be to finish, but "finish" means having enough votes to pass it, and I am not certain of that.

Mr. BYRD. The distinguished majority leader has responded realistically to my question.

Mr. DOLE. I might suggest that Members give their amendments to the managers on each side and they can get some idea of how many remain. But again I think the minority leader has expressed to me that we are not encouraging amendments on either side.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

RECEPTION HONORING WORLD WAR II VETERANS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there is a reception honoring World War II veterans, starting at 5 o'clock. There are 34 in this Chamber, 17 on each side. It is right down the hall at room 230, sponsored by myself and the distinguished minority leader. We are also honoring Vietnam veterans, Korean war veterans, and anyone else who drops in.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, today is, I believe, V-E Day, a very significant day. I passed by the leader's office to celebrate.

UNITED STATES BECOMES NET DEBTOR

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, today, I was told by somebody who ought to know that this is the day the United States becomes a net debtor to the other nations of the world for the first time in 71 years. Our trade deficit last year ran $130 billion. This year it is expected to run about $160 billion. So by this time next year we can anticipate that the United States will be a larger debtor on a net basis than Brazil or any other nation in the world. And at this rate, a few years down the road, in about 1990, we can expect to be a debtor larger than all the rest of the world put together. I hope that the distinguished majority leader will join me in helping to find out if this is officially the day when the United States became a net debtor, or when exactly that day is or will be.

Such a date serves notice on us that the United States is going to have to change its trade policies. We cannot continue to run up debts to the rest of the world—and I am not talking about the Federal debt now; I am talking about the debt that we owe to other nations of the world—at the rate of $160 billion a year.

It will be years before we are able to feel the effects of turning this policy around, such that we become less of a debtor. Hopefully sometime within 10 years or so, with a major change in policy, we will see the day when other nations will owe us more than we owe them.

Mr. President, I do not expect to be a Senator when that day occurs. I hope I will live long enough to see it. But I hope we will dedicate ourselves, on the day we find we are a net debtor, to work toward the day when we again look upon ourselves as one who lends money to the rest of the world rather than having to borrow it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will make that inquiry to try to determine that for the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, there will be no more votes today.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 6:30 with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ASIAN-PACIFIC AMERICAN HERITAGE WEEK

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, Saturday, May 4, 1985 marked the beginning of Asian-Pacific American Heritage Week. First observed in 1979, Asian-Pacific American Heritage Week has become an annual tradition in numerous schools, government offices, and libraries throughout the country. It is a volunteer affair which, I am happy to point out, does not cost the Federal Government a penny. Nonetheless, its contribution to our Nation's understanding of Americans of Asian and Pacific Island ancestry has been priceless.

Although Asian-Pacific Americans are the Nation's second fastest growing minority group and number well over 4 million, most Americans are not aware of their history and their contributions to our national heritage. Native Hawaiians, defined by Federal law as Native Americans, established the first constitutional monarchy in the Pacific Islands. Chinese Americans, arriving in the mid-nineteenth century, helped build the Nation's transcontinental railroad and made major contributions to the growth of farming and agriculture. The Japanese Americans, whose forebears arrived in this country in the latter part of the 19th century, helped establish Hawaii's sugar industry through their labor in the fields. During World War II, the 100th Infantry Battalion from Hawaii and the 442d Regimental Combat Team, composed of Japanese American volunteers, became the most decorated combat units in American military history. Filipino immigrants, arriving in this country early in the 20th century, helped establish fisheries and canneries on the west coast and in Alaska.

As individuals, Pacific and Asian Americans have brought honor and distinction to the United States, excelling in science, politics, and the arts among other fields. In 1957, Chinese Americans Tsung Dao Lee and Chem Ning Yang received international recognition as recipients of the Nobel Prize in physics. In the arts, both Minoru Yamasaki and I.M. Pei have won international acclaim. In politics, four Asian Americans have been elected to the U.S. Senate—former Senators Hiram Fong and Samuel Hayakawa as well as the two incumbents, Senator DANIEL K. INOUYE and myself. In the House, Congressman DANIEL K. AKAKA, a Native Hawaiian, represents Hawaii's second congressional district and Congressman NORMAN MINETA and ROBERT T. MATSUI presently serve as Representatives from California. George Ariyoshi of Hawaii is the Nation's first State Governor of Asian-Pacific ancestry.

Mr. President, while the observance of Asian-Pacific American Heritage Month has helped foster a new sense of pride among Asian-Pacific Americans during the last 6 years, its major achievement has been the awakening of a national awareness of their contributions and achievements. In that sense, Asian-Pacific American Heritage Week is for all Americans. It fosters unity among Americans and provides hope for the Asian immigrants who continue to come to this country in search of peace and a democratic way of life. I urge my colleagues to join me in saluting all Asian-Pacific Americans as we observe Asian-Pacific Heritage Week.

ARMS NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am concerned about testimony presented yesterday to the Senate Armed Services Committee by Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle.

In his testimony, Mr. Perle said that in his personal view, the United States should break out of the SALT II agreement rather than retire nuclear forces to conform to its limits, and that the United States should not continue to abide by a treaty the Soviets—in Mr. Perle's view—continually violate.

While Mr. Perle says this is his personal view, if it should become U.S. policy we would not only be abandoning SALT II but the arms negotiations currently underway in Geneva. Break out, by the United States of the SALT II agreement would send a direct message to the Soviet Union that all limits on nuclear forces have been cast aside.

I am deeply concerned that Mr. Perle would interject his personal views on so important an issue when they are out of touch with the officially stated policy of this administration that the United States will abide by SALT II constraints as long as the Soviet Union does likewise.

President Reagan further stated that the United States will not do anything to undercut the negotiations that are going on in Geneva. As recently as his speech to the European Parliament this morning in Strasbourg, he stated "the U.S. will take no unilateral advantages" and that we will do everything in our power to "reenforce all possible confidence building measures".

The resumption of arms talks between the United States and the Soviet Union is cause for cautious optimism about the prospects for a new agreement limiting and reducing nuclear weapons. In the interim, it is important that both sides demonstrate restraint in order to ensure that the negotiations will not be undermined by the acceleration of a new round in the arms race.

The framework for mutual restraint exists. Last year the Senate passed, by a vote of 82 to 17, a resolution to maintain the policy not to undercut existing strategic arms agreements on a reciprocal basis at least until December, 1985. This was included in the Defense Authorization Act signed by the President.

This year a similar resolution has been introduced by myself and Senators LEAHY, BUMPERS, and HEINZ. It represents the President's stated policy which calls on the United States to continue the "no-undercut" policy on a mutual basis with the Soviet Union through December, 1986 or until a new strategic arms agreement is concluded.

A decision on whether or not to continue the present no-undercut policy will be required soon. This summer, when the seventh Trident submarine, the U.S.S. Alaska, begins sea trials, the United States will surpass the SALT II 1,200 MIRV'd missile subceiling unless the launchers of either a poseidon submarine or 14 minuteman III's are dismantled.

I believe that a decision not to take compensating action for the deployment of the Alaska would be adverse to U.S. security interests and would undermine the prospect for the renewed arms control negotiations in Geneva.

I call on my colleagues to continue their support of the no-undercut or interim restraint resolution, which was overwhelmingly passed last year and most definitely endorsed by the President.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 1 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 2148. An act to authorize appropriations for the Bureau of the Mint for fiscal year 1986; and

H.R. 2268. An act to approve and implement the Free Trade Area Agreement between the United States and Israel.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

At 5:22 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolutions:

S.J. Res. 53. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the month of June 1985 as "Youth Suicide Prevention Month";

S.J. Res. 60. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 12, 1985, through May 18, 1985, as "Senior Center Week";

S.J. Res. 64. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning May 5, 1985, as "National Correctional Officers Week";

S.J. Res. 65. Joint resolution designating the month of November 1985 as "National Alzheimer's Disease Month";

S.J. Res. 83. Joint resolution designating the week beginning on May 5, 1985, as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week"; and

S.J. Res. 94. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning May 12, 1985, as "National Digestive Diseases Awareness Week".

The enrolled joint resolutions were subsequently signed by the President pro termpore [Mr. THURMOND].

H.R. 2148. An act to authorize appropriations for the Bureau of the Mint for fiscal year 1986; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

H.R. 2268. An act to approve and implement the Free Trade Area Agreement between the United States and Israel.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. LUGAR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, without amendment:

S. Res. 158. An original resolution authorizing the printing of background information on the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate" (sixth revised edition), as a Senate document; referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. GARN, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

Paul A. Adams, of Maryland, to be Inspector General, Department of Housing and Urban Development.

(The above nomination was reported from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs with the recommendation that it be confirmed, subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 1095. A bill to restrict the travel and activities of foreign nations on secondment to the United Nations Secretariat; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 1096. A bill to require that the Secretary of Health and Human Services implement the revised prospective payment wage index; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. RIEGEL, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. FORD, and Mr. SPECTER):

S. 1097. A bill to amend the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act to provide for the appropriate treatment of methanol; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 1098. A bill to provide for the orderly transition to interstate banking; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

By Mr. FORD:

S. 1099. A bill for the relief of Dr. Samuel Blancaflor Gregorio and his wife, Raquel Luga Gregorio; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. GLENN and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 1100. A bill to authorize appropriations for research, education, and training in geriatrics; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1101. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment of fringe benefits provided to the parents of employees; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 1102. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to impose a tax on the net business receipts of taxpayers, to credit the amount of such tax against the liability of such taxpayer under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. GORTON:

S. 1103. A bill to authorize certain atmospheric and satellite programs and functions of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. WEICKER (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY):

S. 1104. A bill to revise the provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to health planning; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG (for himself, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. EAST, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. HELMS, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. TRIBLE, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DOLE, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. GARN, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. DENTON, Mr. LONG, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. GORTON, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S. 1105. A bill entitled the "Federal Contractor Flextime Act"; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 1106. A bill to provide for the use and distribution of funds appropriated in satisfaction of judgments awarded to the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan in dockets numbered 57, 59, 13E of the Indian Claims Commission and docket numbered 13F of the U.S. Claims Court, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. NUNN:

S. 1107. A bill to authorize the Society of the Third Infantry Division to erect a memorial in the District of Columbia or its environs; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. LEAHY and Mr. D'AMATO):

S. 1108. A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide for the temporary admission to the United States of the operators of motor common carriers of passengers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MATSUNAGA (for himself, Mr. INOUYE):

S. 1109. A bill to authorize the Department of Energy to initiate a cooperative research program in ocean energy and technology with the Pacific International Center for High Technology Research; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. HOLLINGS:

S. 1110. A bill to provide for the award of grants to the Washington Metropolitan Airports for certain capital expenditures; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. CHILES (for himself, Mrs. HAWKINS):

S. 1111. A bill to establish equal and equitable classification and duty rates for certain imported citrus products; to the Committee on Finance.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. LUGAR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. Res. 158. An original resolution authorizing the printing of "Background Information on the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate" (sixth revised edition), as a Senate document; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ROTH:

S 1095. A bill to restrict the travel and activities of foreign nations on secondment to the United Nations Secretariat; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ESPIONAGE PREVENTION ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, this morning I am introducing a bill which will curtail espionage activities in this country by Eastern bloc nationals working in the United Nations Secretariat. This bill directs the Secretary of State to apply the restrictions of the Foreign Missions Act to those U.N. employees who are "seconded" to the U.N. Secretariat.

Employees of the Secretariat are, supposedly, international civil servants, owing their primary loyalties to the United Nations, not to their country of origin. In reality, several Eastern bloc governments refuse to permit this practice, allowing their personnel to work in the Secretariat only on temporary assignment, or "secondment". Under such circumstances, the primary allegiance of these personnel remains with their governments.

Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, in testimony before the Senate Government Affairs Committee on Wednesday, May 7, 1985, revealed that in her opinion, many of these personnel are deeply engaged in espionage activities. Since their current status and international civil servants permits them to move freely around this country, the FBI encounters major difficulties in monitoring their travel and activities.

This bill will apply the restrictions of the Foreign Missions Act to foreign personnel who are on "secondment" to the U.N. Secretariat. In other words, a Soviet civil servant on temporary assignment to the U.N. Secretariat will be treated by the U.S. Government, and its law enforcement agencies, in the same manner as if he or she were an official of the Soviet Embassy in Washington, DC or the Soviet mission to the U.N.●

By Mr. EXON:

S. 1096. A bill to require that the Secretary of Health and Human Services implement the revised prospective payment wage index; to the Committee on Finance.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE REVISED PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT WAGE INDEX

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation which is of critical importance to rural hospitals across this Nation. Several years ago the Congress approved a new prospective payment system for hospitals under Medicare. In establishing that system, the Congress recognized that reimbursement rates must be adjusted to account for differences between labor costs in urban and rural areas.

Unfortunately, the Health Care Financing Administration adopted regulations implementing this new reimbursement system which penalize many smaller and rural hospitals. The problem is with the wage index, one of the factors used to compute reimbursement rates for hospitals. The current wage index does not accurately account for regional variations in the employment of part-time hospital workers. Many small, rural hospitals use large numbers of part-time employees as a way to control health care costs. By developing a wage index which fails to consider the use of part-time workers, the Health Care Financing Administration effectively penalizes these hospitals.

Mr. President, this Senator and others first brought this problem to the attention of the Health Care Financing Administration in the fall of 1983. HCFA acknowledged the need to devise a new wage index and established a task force to work on the matter. Unfortunately, HCFA did not address the problem as quickly as they acknowledged its existence. Indeed, when month after month passed with no action from HCFA, it was necessary to pass legislation specifically directing the Agency to study the matter and develop a new wage index.

Section 2316 of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 directed HCFA to develop a revised index which specifically considered the use of part-time employees. It directed that the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services report to the Congress on the matter within 30 days of the date of enactment, which was July 18, 1984. Over 7 months later, the report was finally presented to the Congress.

The HCFA report acknowledged the defects with the current wage index and presented two alternative indexes. Both take account of variations in the use of part-time employees because they are based on paid hours worked, rather than on numbers of employees. One index is derived from total gross hospital wages while the other index is based on adjusted gross hospital salaries. While the HCFA report makes no specific recommendation as to which of the two alternatives should be implemented, it concludes that "the adjusted gross index is likely not as accurate as the gross measure for direct wages * * *."

Mr. President, my legislation will do two important things. First, it provides that the "total gross hospital wages" index will be implemented by the Secretary of Health and Human Services on October 1, 1985. Second, it reemphasizes and mandates the intent of Congress that this new wage index be applied retroactively to October 1, 1983. Let me remind my colleagues that retroactive application of this new wage index is nothing new. That section of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 which required the wage index study also explicitly provided that the new wage index be applied retroactively to October 1, 1983.

Retroactive application of the new wage index means that those hospitals which were underpaid under the current index must be compensated while those hospitals which were overpaid under the current index must repay the amount of their overpayment. I recognize the hardship this may impose on some hospitals which have been overpaid since October 1, 1983. If the Secretary of Health and Human Services had complied with the law and reported to the Congress last August, the impact of retroactive application would be much less drastic. I would point out, however, that the rural hospitals in many parts of the Nation have been shortchanged for that same amount of time and have been forced to operate on the reduced rates. It is simply not fair or equitable to allow the overpaid hospitals to keep their windfall payments while forcing the underpaid hospitals to absorb the losses.

To soften the impact of retroactive adjustments for those hospitals which have been overpaid, my legislation provides that the adjustments be made over the course of 2 years, commencing with the cost period beginning October 1, 1985.

Mr. President, it is critical that the Congress act on this matter as soon as possible. Let me make it very clear that we cannot permit the Secretary of Health and Human Services to delay the implementation of this new index in the same way that the study and report were delayed. The rural hospitals across the Nation have been waiting for over 1½ years for some action. It is also imperative that the new wage index be applied retroactively, and my bill will reemphasize that clear congressional intent as expressed last summer.

By Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. FORD, and Mr. SPECTER):

S. 1097. A bill to amend the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act to provide for the appropriate treatment of methanol; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

METHANOL VEHICLE INCENTIVES ACT

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the oil shortages of the 1970's grow more distant every day. Discounting for inflation, gasoline prices have been as low this year as they were in the 1950's—the golden age of the gas guzzler. But in many ways the Nation remains as vulnerable to an oil shortage today as it was 10 years ago. The simple fact is that our domestic oil reserves are in permanent decline.

Our need for imported oil remains so great that our economic well-being and national security have become linked to the stability of the Persian Gulf. This has been called an energy crisis. But we do not face a shortage of energy; our ability to produce electricity domestically has virtually no long-term limits. Instead, we face a shortage of liquid fuels, primarily for transportation. Transportation uses consume more than 60 percent of the oil used in this country.

One response has been the strategic petroleum reserve—an enormous, expensive stockpile designed to carry the Nation through an emergency. I have been a supporter of the SPR; I believe it is important short-term insurance. At the same time, however, we must ask ourselves whether there is not a better answer—one that can satisfy our tremendous demand for liquid transportation fuel on a permanent basis with less danger of disruption than we face today.

A liquid fuel now exists that is available in excess supply, that could be produced domestically in nearly inexhaustible quantities, that is a proven transportation fuel, that can be used in ordinary automobiles, and that can be delivered through our existing distribution network with only minor modifications. That fuel is methanol.

Methanol burns so efficiently that race cars use it at the Indianapolis 500. Methanol burns more cleanly than gasoline, producing less of the nitrogen oxide emissions that are believed to contribute to acid rain. And methanol can be delivered at a price that is competitive with gasoline.

In my judgment, we need to begin an effort to convert a portion of our automotive fleet to methanol. Such an effort would have positive consequences for our national security, for our domestic economy, and for our environment. It is for these reasons that today, along with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. FORD], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER], I am introducing the Methanol Vehicles Incentives Act of 1985.

The intent of the act is simple: To encourage the production and sale of cars that can run on methanol by providing an appropriate treatment for such cars under the corporate average fuel economy [CAFE] standards.

Some background might be useful at this point. Methanol should not be confused with ethanol, even though both are alcohols. Ethanol is made from corn or agricultural wastes, is drinkable, and is known as grain alcohol. Methanol is poisonous and is known as wood alcohol; it can be made from biomass, but currently is made from natural gas and coal.

Both ethanol and methanol are used as octane enhancers with gasoline, but only large commodity subsidies and tax incentives keep ethanol economically viable. Methanol is currently available for about 40 cents a gallon and has a raw material base large enough to enable it to displace gasoline altogether.

At the present time, methanol is primarily used as a chemical feedstock; it is an important source of formaldehyde for use in plywood and other building materials. Virtually all of it is produced from natural gas, with one notable exception—the output of a coal-to-methanol plant opened in 1983 by Tennessee Eastman.

A major expansion of the methanol market would lead to increased use of coal as a source; however, natural gas is likely to meet the demand for methanol for the foreseeable future. Indeed, an enormous amount of excess methanol capacity exists in the world today; Du Pont recently halted production at a major facility in Beaumont, TX, because of the glut.

Many countries have excess natural gas, often produced in conjuction with oil. Because natural gas requires an enormous pipeline distribution network—or expensive liquefaction—in order to be transported, it often goes to waste in developing countries. Yet it can be cheaply and easily converted to methanol.

Adoption of methanol by the immense American auto market, however, would quickly exhaust excess natural gas supplies and require conversion of coal, at a slightly higher cost—the energy equivalent of less than $2 a gallon of gasoline. Domestic coal supplies would be sufficient to meet the demand for centuries. High-sulfur coal could be used without damage to the environment because the coal must be gasified and the sulfur removed in the conversion process. Indeed, it is for this reason that I am particularly pleased to have as cosponsors of this legislation the Senators from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] and Kentucky [Mr. FORD], who are, respectively, the chairman and vice chairman of the Senate coal caucus.

As a transportation fuel, methanol has only about half the energy per gallon of gasoline, but burns more efficiently. As a result, cars designed to run on methanol are expected to go about 60 to 80 percent as far per gallon as comparable gasoline-powered cars.

The California Energy Commission and the Bank of America each are conducting major fleet tests of methanol cars, with excellent results to date. The major remaining question methanol cars must face is their ability to start in cold weather. The results are not satisfactory for cars using pure methanol, and the methanol car of the future will run on a blend of about 85 percent methanol, combined with gasoline and other additives to improve lubrication and cold-start performance.

Methanol-powered cars have been shown to operate significantly more cleanly than gasoline-powered cars. Emissions of nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons are reduced substantially. Computer modeling has projected ozone reductions of 15 to 25 percent in Los Angeles if methanol were substituted for gasoline and diesel fuels. Emissions of formaldehyde would increase but can be controlled by a catalytic converter or similar device.

Mass production of methanol vehicles would not pose significant problems for American automakers. Some rubber parts and metal coatings must be replaced, the carburetor must be adjusted, and larger gas tanks may be desirable. However, the cost impact would be minor to nonexistent.

What, then, is preventing more widespread use of methanol? Inertia. For very good reason, automakers are unwilling to produce cars for which there is no current demand. Consumers are unwilling to purchase cars for which there is no readily available fuel supply. And service stations are unwilling to provide fuel for cars that are not on the road. This extremely difficult marketing problem could be overcome by the introduction of a flexible-fuel vehicle, which could run on any combination of methanol and gasoline. Ford has an operating prototype of such a car.

Fuel economy standards were enacted to reduce our dependence on petroleum, not on fuel generally, and should encourage, not discourage, the use of methanol. The Methanol Vehicles Incentives Act would offer an incentive to auto manufacturers to produce methanol-powered cars by the simple device of basing fuel economy ratings on the amount of gasoline consumed.

For the purpose of computing a corporate average fuel economy rating, a methanol-powered automobile would be deemed to operate on a blend that is 85-percent methanol and 15-percent gasoline.

To illustrate, suppose a particular gasoline-powered car gets 25 miles a gallon. When converted to methanol, it might get only 15 miles per gallon of the blend. But for every gallon of gasoline in the blend, the car would travel 100 miles. The last figure is the significant one for CAFE purposes, and that is how the car would be rated. Consumer labels would continue to show the actual fuel economy of the vehicle.

Such a change would allow Detroit to produce big cars and high-performance cars—its historic niche of dominance, but one that has been eroded by the need to meet fuel economy standards.

Flexible-fuel vehicles—capable of running on 85 percent methanol—could get the high CAFE rating, yet still run on gasoline—an apparent loophole for automakers. But conversion of even a segment of the American auto market to methanol capability would have a profound impact on our vulnerability to an oil cutoff, even if those vehicles continued to use gasoline.

Furthermore, methanol's cheaper per-gallon cost would allow it to gain market penetration—in a 75-cent, 50-50 blend with gasoline, for example—even if it was not competitive with gasoline on an energy-equivalent basis. This in turn would prepare the distribution network to handle increased volumes of methanol in the event of an oil cutoff or price spike. Additional production of methanol from natural gas could be quickly brought on line in such an emergency.

OPEC could deliberately underprice methanol and try to force it out of the market. This is unlikely because of the inherent price advantage of methanol on a per-gallon basis, and also because OPEC itself is likely to become a major producer of methanol. But the cost of producing methanol from coal means that the real price of transportation fuel will never go above $2 a gallon. Conversion to methanol, in short, means that the energy crisis would be over—for generations.

Finally, development of a major automotive market for methanol would stimulate the Nation's coal industry in an environmentally acceptable way. In my own State of Missouri, we have an abundance of coal. But most of it has such a high-sulfur content, it is unacceptable for utility use. Since sulfur extraction is a necessary part of the coal-to-methanol process, such coal could be used to meet our energy needs without contributing to excess sulfur loadings in the atmosphere.

Mr. President, methanol can be produced inexpensively and burned efficiently. It can reduce our dependence on foreign suppliers of oil to the vanishing point, with important economic and strategic consequences. It can reduce the pollution of our skies and stimulate our domestic economy. I believe we should move forward quickly to stimulate the development and growth of an automotive market for methanol.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1097

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Methanol Vehicle Incentives Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) transportation uses account for more than 60 percent of the oil consumption of the Nation;

(2) continued reliance on imported oil is detrimental to the economy and security of the United States;

(3) methanol is a proven transportation fuel that burns more cleanly and efficiently than gasoline; and

(4) conversion of a portion of the transportation fleet of the Nation to methanol would stimulate development of a domestic coal-to-methanol industry, create jobs, reduce air pollution, and enhance national security.

PURPOSES

SEC. 3. The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) provide for the appropriate application of fuel economy standards to methanol powered automobiles; and

(2) increase the availability of methanol and methanol powered vehicles to consumers.

MANUFACTURING INCENTIVES FOR METHANOL POWERED AUTOMOBILES

SEC. 4. The Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act (15 U.S.C. 1901 et seq.) is amended—

(1) in section 501 (15 U.S.C. 2001) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(15) The term 'methanol mixture' means the mixture of methanol with other fuel, if any, used to operate a methanol powered automobile.

"(16) The term 'methanol powered automobile' means an automobile capable of operating on not less than 85 per centum methanol."; and

(2) in section 503(d) (15 U.S.C. 2003(d)) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(4) If a manufacturer manufactures methanol powered automobiles, the fuel economy shall be based on the fuel content of the methanol mixture used to operate such automobiles. For purposes of this section, a gallon of the methanol mixture used to operate such automobiles shall be considered to contain 15 one-hundredths of a gallon of fuel.

"(5) For the purpose of labeling under section 506 (15 U.S.C. 2006), the Environmental Protection Agency Administrator shall determine for fuel economy of a methanol powered automobile to be 15 per centum of the fuel economy of such automobile as calculated under this subsection.".●

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 1098. A bill to provide for the orderly transition to interstate banking; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

ORDERLY TRANSITION TO INTERSTATE BANKING

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the Congress is being asked to enact legislation, sponsored by a group of large regional banks which would authorize States to adopt laws creating regional banking compacts. These State compact laws permit banks within a compact's region to merge or branch across State lines, but exclude banks in States not included in the compact. Some 14 States now permit reciprocal banking within selective areas and dozens of State legislatures are considering such arrangements. These laws authorizing interstate regional compacts have been challenged on constitutional grounds, and the Supreme Court has recently agreed to rule on the case. The regional banking group however is once again asking Congress to moot the constitutional issues in the case before the Supreme Court's decision in Northwest Bancorp versus The Federal Reserve Board by endorsing the ability of States to form regional banking compacts. Similar legislation passed the Senate last year as part of S. 2851 with no hearings on the geography question.

The compact phenomenon has grown rapidly since compact legislation was first introduced at the Federal level. It is not hard to imagine that within a year or so the majority of States will be members of four or five compacts which cover the country, except for a few isolated States purposely left out—California, New York, and possibly Texas and Illinois. Within the compact areas a rash of intraregional mergers will have taken place, without congressional input, which will permanently change the nature of the banking industry.

Proponents of this Federal legislation make several arguments in its favor. These arguments include: First, promoting States' rights; second, providing an experiment in interstate banking; and third, promoting regional economies. None of these arguments are supported by the facts. Congress never specifically gave States the right to have compacts including some States but not others; they simply have the right to permit or not permit interstate banking. Second, the argument in favor of providing an experiment in interstate banking unfortunately misreads the permanent nature of these regional compacts. These compacts would constitute a fundamental policy change which Congress would not be able to undo in the future if it decided to approach interstate banking in a different manner. Finally, the regions which are being created do not appear to be selected with natural market areas in mind, but for economic protectionist interest alone. For instance, Utah has adopted a law creating a region of 11 Western States—including Alaska and Hawaii, but excluding California. Two regions are being set up which in effect surround, but exclude, New York State. The New England zone includes Connecticut, where 40,000 residents who work in New York far exceed those commuting to Massachusetts, much less to Maine. A proposed Middle Atlantic zone would match New Jersey with Maryland but ignore the more than 200,000 commuters from New York and New Jersey. These proposed regions not only ignore natural markets but they demonstrate little concern for the convenience of consumers.

We in Congress cannot stand by and watch the balkanization of the banking industry, the natural result of compact legislation. Compact legislation that does not provide for a date certain when full interstate banking will occur will most certainly lead to the development of a few giant regional banks protected by law from direct competition outside their regions. There is no evidence that such protection is needed; for example, the banking systems in California and New York are highly competitive ones in which small- and medium-size banks have competed effectively with money center banks. Also in California, interstate banking has been a reality for some time, we have large money center banks, large aggressive foreign banks, medium-size banks that serve middle market customers as well as hundreds of independent neighborhood banks. All of these natural competitors have been able to thrive and find their own niche in this diverse environment.

The empirical evidence compiled by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City in its study on the benefits of interstate banking suggest that interstate banking would likely result in a more competitive banking system "and that removal of prohibitions against interstate banking would bring cheaper and better banking services to both the consumer and businessmen." Chairman Volker, of the Federal Reserve Board, noted recently in testimony before the House Banking Committee:

> The competitive environment (in California) appears healthy, with the consumer and businessman able to choose between some of the largest banking institutions in the world and small locally owned banks. Should banks be permitted to expand interstate more freely, we would anticipate similar patterns to prevail.

In the interest of establishing a balanced and reasonable policy on interstate banking, I am introducing legislation that calls for an orderly transition to interstate banking. Let me briefly outline what the bill calls for:

First, effective upon enactment congressional sanction should be given to State legislation authorizing regional interstate banking arrangements.

Second, effective 2 years after enactment, a bank holding company would be permitted to acquire other bank holding companies: in any contiguous State; in any State within the same Federal Reserve Bank district as the acquiring bank holding company; if the home State of the acquiring company is a part of two Federal Reserve Bank districts, in any State within both districts; and leapfrogging would be prohibited.

Third, effective 4 years after enactment, a bank holding company would be permitted to acquire other bank holding companies anywhere in the country.

I believe this approach to be reasonable because it addresses the concerns of small and independent banks that they will be swallowed up by large competitors. The bill is a blend of regional and nationwide banking. It recognizes the need for local institutions to position themselves for new competition and give them time to adjust to future opportunities.

If small- and medium-size banks choose to protect themselves from acquisition they may do so by rejecting the holding company structure and they will have 2 years to position themselves and a full 4 years before nationwide interstate banking becomes a reality. Most importantly the 4-year trigger to full interstate banking will preserve the diversity and dynamic environment in our economy and the banking system.

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. GLENN, and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 1100. A bill to authorize appropriations for research, education, and training in geriatrics; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

GERIATRIC RESEARCH, EDUCATION, AND TRAINING ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce the Geriatric Research, Education, and Training Act of 1985 [GREAT]—a modified version of the bill introduced by myself and Senator Randolph at the end of the 98th Congress. GREAT authorizes more than a doubling of funds over a 3-year period for geriatric education and training. It would improve substantially the level of Federal support for existing programs within the National Institute on Aging, the National Institute of Mental Health, the Administration on Aging, and the Health Resources and Services Administration.

Mr. President, I recognize that this bill might appear anomalous at this time, given my colleagues' and my own commitment to deficit reduction. However, I firmly believe that the goal of adequate support for geriatric education and training is perfectly consistent and compatible with a drive for a balanced Federal budget. Support for geriatric education will not result in more doctors, but rather more appropriately trained doctors. It will not increase the total number of providers being trained, but rather will redirect the training to better prepare them for proper treatment of elderly patients. I have no doubt that the bill that I am introducing today is a cost-saving approach of the most fundamental and important kind; as such, it deserves your serious consideration and support.

GREAT would target about $200 million over the next 3 years to educate and train the health personnel who care for this Nation's senior citizens. When you balance this amount against the $237 billion that will be spent under Medicare in this period, GREAT becomes a truly conservative approach. GREAT will increase the quality of care while controlling costs. Mr. President, the fact is that huge amounts of money are spent each year under Medicare to buy health services for the elderly.

As we heard at a Senate Aging Committee hearing about 2 years ago, too often, the individuals responsible for prescribing or performing health services are inadequately trained in geriatric medicine. A recent survey in my home State of Pennsylvania illustrates this point all too clearly. Three out of five physicians interviewed had little or no understanding of the specific effects of prescription drugs on their elderly patients. Their incompetence, I'm sorry to say, results in drug misuse, misdiagnosis, and even death. This survey has one unavoidable conclusion: Physicians seem to be ill-prepared to provide the kind of specialized care needed by the "Graying of America."

Unfortunately, the same holds true for nonphysician health and support professionals. And, as a result, huge amounts of money are being expended and will be spent by Medicare and other health purchasers to buy services for the elderly from persons with inadequate preparation and skill.

The "Report on Education and Training in Geriatrics and Gerontology" issued by the National Institute on Aging [NIA] in 1984 summarized several studies which estimate the faculty needed today to provide essential services to older persons. For example, the NIA report notes a need for the following:

At least a fivefold increase in geriatric physician faculty in the Nation's medical schools, with special emphasis on family practice doctors, and specialists in internal medicine and psychiatry.

A substantial increase in nurse faculty with adequate preparation in gerontological nursing in all types of nursing schools.

At least a fivefold increase in geriatric dentistry teachers in dental schools.

A substantial increase in faculty with geriatric expertise in schools of social work and allied health and clinical psychology programs.

A doubling of biomedical, behavioral, and social scientists by 1990.

An enormous increase in social gerontologists and gerontological aides.

As you can see, Mr. President, there is a critically short supply of personnel needed to care for our aging population. Right now, we do not have the faculty needed within health professional schools either to teach professionals or to prepare researchers on aging and the aged. We don't even have enough established programs, courses, and curricula to extend knowledge and skills concerning the aging process and the delivery of services for the aged.

Based on these documented deficiencies, I have developed this bill, GREAT, to bring training and education allotments to a level which will take us a long way toward filling these gaps. My bill will authorize a modest increase in appropriations over a 3-year period to get this major Federal initiative underway.

This bill recognizes that there are two essential conditions to be met in order to realize maximum benefits from the increasing outlays for the health care of the elderly. First, there must be available a well-trained cadre of personnel to ensure that the services which are being financed are provided in a high quality manner and in the most efficient and effective ways possible.

Second, the knowledge available to prevent and treat disease and disability among the elderly must be advanced. The proposed bill, the Geriatric Research, Education, and Training Act of 1985 addresses both to these conditions. Therefore, it is a cost-saving approach of the most fundamental and important kind. It can help prevent the great waste that results from preventable disease. It can help prevent the extra costs that are experienced when care is inadequate and inappropriate. It can help achieve the substantial savings that are possible when research opportunities and gains are utilized in a well-planned and realistic manner.

This bill will increase the number of faculty leaders in health professional schools. Faculty members of health professional schools are responsible for guiding the preparation of students at various levels—that is, in basic, graduate, and continuing education programs. Faculty members also provide critical leadership in planning and conducting research in various fields related to aging, including the biomedical, behavioral, clinical, and social sciences.

However, the number of faculty members in health professional schools with specialized expertise in aging is very scarce indeed. For example, a recent survey of medical schools found an average of just over two full-time equivalent faculty responsible for geriatric education; many of these personnel are only concentrating in geriatrics on a part-time basis and many had not completed intensive study in geriatrics. Similarly, it is estimated that there are less than 20 faculty members in some 60 dental schools with special preparation in geriatric dentistry.

Clearly, therefore, we must give the highest priority to the preparation of additional faculty members in aging issues. None of the needed geriatric professionals can be trained without first establishing a core of faculty with geriatric expertise—in other words, the teachers who will teach the future teachers. GREAT seeks to broaden the nucleus of faculty members with expertise in geriatrics and gerontology in a variety of health professionals and related schools, including those preparing physicians, dentists, nursing allied health workers, and social services personnel.

This bill also calls for the development of an up-to-date comprehensive research plan in aging. This plan will identify priority opportunities and needs in aging research. The Research on Aging Act of 1974 mandated the preparation of a research plan as one of the initial responsibilities of the new National Institute on Aging. It is high time this plan was updated to reflect new research approaches and potentials to guide investments over the next few decades.

GREAT recognizes that a number of Federal agencies are currently administering programs that are important to the objectives highlighted in the preamble of the bill. Four agencies have major responsibilities: the Administration on Aging, the Institute on Aging, the National Institute on Mental Health, and the Health Resources and Services Administration. Each of these agencies can make important contributions to enhance the overall effort; but individual activities must be well coordinated to achieve maximum impact. Accordingly, the bill requires the Secretary of DHHS to establish an interdepartmental committee to ensure this essential coordination of these programs.

Specifically, GREAT would authorize funds to enhance the following programs:

National Institute on Aging: NIA would expand Research Career Awards to support a variety of education and training approaches. For example, there are the Research Career Development Awards to aid scientists, the NIA Academic Awards to recruit and prepare future academic investigators, Clinical Investigator Awards to develop independent biomedical investigators, Special Emphasis Research Career Awards to enhance interdisciplinary research training, and Physician Scientist Awards to prepare additional medical scientists in aging research.

National Institute on Mental Health: NIMH would expand support for both research and clinically oriented training in the mental health aspects of geriatrics and gerontology. Assistance is given to personnel in four disciplines—including psychiatry, psychology, nursing, and social work. The largest programs are the Geriatric Mental Health Academic Award Program to develop research-oriented persons in geriatric mental health, the Faculty Development Awards to prepare teachers on geriatric mental health in clinical training centers, and Postgraduate Specialty Training Awards to enhance existing mental health facilities in geriatrics.

Health Resources and Services Administration: A number of HRSA programs would be strengthened to further the preparation of faculty members and health practitioners in geriatrics. Funds will be targeted toward: One, Geriatric Education Centers for the multidisciplinary training of health professionals in geriatric care and other special projects; two, family medicine and internal medicine residency training grants; three, general dentistry grants; four, Area Health Education Center grants to enhance the knowledge and skills of current and future health care personnel working in local communities; five, advanced nurse education awards to help prepare future nursing leaders in the care of the elderly; six, nurse practitioner grants; and seven, home health training grants to train home health workers in the delivery of services to the elderly.

Administration on Aging: The AOA would receive additional funds to support education and training programs for the professional development and training of individuals providing service to the elderly and the development of educational programs and materials for older Americans.

Mr. President, I am acutely aware of the very real pressure felt by this Congress to decrease Federal expenditures, but my judgment in this case dictates that action is required now, before it is too late. Everything we know today tells us that there will be a greatly increased demand for persons trained and prepared to care for the growing elderly population. We want that care to be good. This bill would more than double the amount currently expended for the purpose of education and training and it reflects the amounts needed to meet the health care needs of present and future generations of older Americans. I urge my colleagues to join me in this endeavor.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1100

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Geriatric Research, Education, and Training Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that:

(1) The portion of the population aged 65 or older is growing faster than any other age group. The number of elderly individuals in the United States is likely to increase by 10,000,000 between 1980 and 2000, with the largest increase among individuals aged 85 or older.

(2) Personal health care expenditures for elderly individuals in 1985 are likely to exceed $90,000,000,000 (computed in 1980 dollars), which is an increase of $25,000,000,000 over the amount of such expenditures in 1980.

(3) Substantial cost savings and improved care in the expenditure of funds for the care of elderly individuals can be achieved through advances in research and the adequate preparation of personnel providing services to elderly individuals, especially personnel providing services in geriatic evaluation units, in health maintenance organizations, and in the homes and communities of elderly individuals.

(4) The growth in the number of elderly individuals will place heavy demands on hospital services, long-term care services, and community services. Unless Congress acts, the problems that the United States experiences now in providing appropriate and high quality care for older Americans will reach crisis proportions in the future.

(5) All persons providing health services and related human services to elderly individuals should have adequate preparation in dealing with the strengths and needs of such individuals.

(6) There is an enormous shortage of faculty members with adequate preparation in geriatrics and gerontology to educate and train current and future personnel to provide health services and human services. The "Report on Education and Training in Geriatrics and Gerontology" prepared by the Department of Health and Human Services emphasizes that all schools which provide education and training for such personnel should have faculty who are competent to expand and integrate geriatrics and gerontology into basic, graduate, and continuing education programs. Studies summarized in the report project the following personnel needs:

(A) The need for at least a five hundred percent increase in the number of medical school faculty members who are physicians with expertise in geriatrics, to a minimum of 1,300 such faculty members, with special emphasis on faculty members to train physicians in family medicine, general internal medicine, and psychiatry.

(B) The need for at least 1,300 medical school faculty members (in addition to the faculty members described in clause (A)) with principal concentration and adequate preparation in geriatrics.

(C) The need for a substantial increase in the number of nursing faculty members in order to insure that at least 2,000 such faculty members have preparation in gerontological nursing and at least 450 such faculty members have preparation in psychiatric nursing with a specialty in gerontology.

(D) The need for at least a five hundred percent increase in the number of geriatric dentistry faculty members, from approximately 20 such faculty members to 120 such faculty members.

(E) The need for a substantial increase in the number of social work faculty members concentrating on issues concerning elderly individuals, to a minimum of 1,000 such faculty members with expertise in aging and 450 such faculty members with expertise in mental health problems of elderly individuals.

(F) The need for at least a nine hundred percent increase in the number of occupational therapist faculty members to train therapists to work with elderly individuals, from approximately 10 such faculty members to 100 such faculty members.

(G) The need for at least a two hundred percent increase in the number of research scientists concentrating on the biomedical, behavioral, and social problems of elderly individuals, to a minimum of between 1,700 and 2,600 such scientists.

(7) If more resources for research, education, and training in geriatrics and gerontology are provided, the diagnosis, treatment, and care of older Americans can be improved, and more effective and economical uses of the increasing expenditures for the care of elderly individuals can be ensured.

(b) Therefore, it is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) authorize an increase in appropriations for a three-year period for education and training in geriatrics and gerontology in order to supplement existing programs carried out by the Administration on Aging, the Health Resources and Services Administration, the National Institute on Aging, and the National Institute of Mental Health, of the Department of Health and Human Services;

(2) provide for the development of a plan for a comprehensive research program on aging which identifies high priority opportunities and needs in various fields of research concerning the aging process, diseases and conditions of special importance to elderly individuals, health promotion, the delivery of services to healthy and ill elderly individuals, and related issues; and

(3) ensure coordination of education and training programs and activities within the Department of Health and Human Services and with other concerned Federal agencies.

INTERNAL MEDICINE

SEC. 3. Section 784(b) of the Public Health Service Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" after "1983,";

(2) by inserting before the period a comma and "$22,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $23,000,000, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $24,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentences:

"Of the amounts appropriated to carry out this section—

"(1) $1,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986,

"(2) $1,700,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and

"(3) $2,700,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, shall be available for grants and contracts for programs, traineeships, and fellowships which provide specialized education and training in geriatric medicine. In making grants and entering into contracts under the preceding sentence, the Secretary shall give priority to grants and contracts for programs, traineeships, and fellowships under paragraphs (3) and (4) of subsection (a) which provide specialized education and training in geriatric medicine.".

FAMILY MEDICINE AND GENERAL DENTISTRY

SEC. 4. Section 786(c) of the Public Health Service Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" after "1983," in the first sentence;

(2) by inserting before the period in the first sentence a comma and "$41,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $42,300,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $43,400,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Of the amounts appropriated to carry out this section—

"(1) $4,400,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986,

"(2) $5,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and

"(3) $6,600,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, shall be available for grants and contracts under subsections (a) and (b) for programs, traineeships, and fellowships which provide specialized education and training in geriatric medicine and geriatric dentistry.".

AREA HEALTH EDUCATION CENTERS

SEC. 5. Section 781(g) of the Public Health Service Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" after "1983," in the first sentence;

(2) by inserting before the period in such sentence a comma and "$21,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $23,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $25,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following sentence:

"Of the amounts appropriated to carry out this section—

"(1) $4,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986,

"(2) $5,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and

"(3) $6,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, shall be available for grants and contracts to schools of medicine and osteopathy to provide, as a part of their area health education programs, specialized education and training in geriatrics to faculty members, health professions students, and other health care personnel who participate in such programs.".

SPECIAL PROJECTS

SEC. 6. (a) Section 788(d) of the Public Health Service Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d) The Secretary may make grants to and enter into contracts with schools of medicine, dentistry, osteopathy, pharmacy, optometry, podiatry, public health, chiropractic, and allied health, graduate programs in health administration and clinical psychology, programs for the training of physician assistants, and other appropriate public or private nonprofit entities to assist in meeting the costs of such schools, programs, or entities in providing projects to—

"(1) improve the training of health professionals and allied health professionals in geriatrics;

"(2) develop and disseminate curricula relating to the treatment of health problems of elderly individuals;

"(3) expand and strengthen instruction in methods of such treatment;

"(4) support the training and retraining of faculty to provide such instruction;

"(5) support continuing education for health professionals and allied health professionals who provide such treatment; and

"(6) establish new affiliations with nursing homes, chronic and acute disease hospitals, ambulatory care centers, and senior centers in order to provide students with clinical training in geriatric medicine.".

(b) Section 788(f) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" after "1983;";

(2) by inserting before the period a semicolon and "$12,600,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986; $13,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987; and $14,700,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Of the amounts appropriated to carry out this section—

"(1) $7,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986,

"(2) $7,600,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and

"(3) $8,300,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, shall be available for grants and contracts under subsection (d).".

(c)(1) Section 701(4) of such Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "and" after " 'school of veterinary medicine',";

(B) by inserting a comma and "and 'school of chiropractic' " after " 'school of public health' ";

(C) by striking out "and" after "a degree of doctor of veterinary medicine or an equivalent degree,"; and

(D) by inserting "and a degree of doctor of chiropractic or an equivalent degree," before "and including advanced training related to".

(2) Section 701(5) of such Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "or" after "pharmacy,"; and

(B) by inserting "or chiropractic," after "public health,".

(3) Section 737 of such Act is amended by striking out paragraph (2) and by redesignating paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) as paragraphs (2), (3), and (4), respectively.

(d) Section 701(8) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(8)(A) The term 'program for the training of physician assistants' means an educational program which (i) has as its objective the education of individuals who will, upon completion of their studies in the program, be qualified to provide primary health care under the supervision of a physician, and (ii) meets regulations prescribed by the Secretary in accordance with subparagraph (B).

"(B) After consultation with appropriate organizations, the Secretary shall, not later than May 1, 1986, prescribe regulations for programs for the training of physician assistants. Such regulations shall, as a minimum, require that such a program—

"(i) extend for at least one academic year and consist of—

"(I) supervised clinical practice, and

"(II) at least four months (in the aggregate) of classroom instruction, directed toward preparing students to deliver health care;

"(ii) have an enrollment of not less than eight students; and

"(iii) train students in primary care, disease prevention, health promotion, geriatric medicine, and home health care.".

(e)(1) Section 701(10) of such Act is amended—

(A) by inserting "college," before "junior college,"; and

(B) by striking out "in a discipline of allied health leading to a baccalaureate or associate degree (or an equivalent of either) or to a more advanced degree" in subparagraph (A) and inserting in lieu thereof "to enable individuals to become allied health professionals or to provide additional training for allied health professionals".

(2) Section 701 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(13) The term 'allied health professional' means an individual—

"(A) who has received a certificate, an associate's degree, a bachelor's degree, a masters' degree, a doctoral degree, or postbaccalaureate training, in a science relating to health care;

"(B) who shares in the responsibility for the delivery of health care services or related services, including—

"(i) services relating to the identification, evaluation, and prevention of diseases and disorders;

"(ii) dietary and nutrition services;

"(iii) health promotion services;

"(iv) rehabilitation services; or

"(v) health systems management services; and

"(C) who is not a graduate of a school of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, veterinary medicine, optometry, podiatry, pharmacy, public health, or chiropractic, or a graduate program in health administration or clinical psychology.".

(f)(1) Section 701 (as amended by subsection (e)(2) of this section) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(14) The term 'graduate program in clinical psychology' means an accredited graduate program in a public or nonprofit private institution in a State which provides training leading to a doctoral degree in clinical psychology or an equivalent degree.".

(2) Section 701(5) (as amended by subsection (c)(2) of this section) is further amended—

(1) by striking out "or" after "chiropractic,"; and

(2) by inserting "or a graduate program in clinical psychology," after "health administration,".

(3) Section 737 (as amended by subsection (c)(3) of this section) is further amended by striking out paragraph (2) (as redesignated by subsection (c)(3) of this section) and by redesignating paragraphs (3) and (4) (as redesignated by subsection (c)(3) of this section) as paragraphs (2) and (3), respectively.

ADVANCED NURSE TRAINING PROGRAMS

SEC. 7. Section 821(b) of the Public Health Service Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" after "1983,";

(2) by inserting before the period a comma and "$20,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $22,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $24,300,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Of the amounts appropriated to carry out this section—

"(1) $2,600,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986,

"(2) $3,200,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and

"(3) $3,900,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, shall be available for grants and contracts which provide specialized advanced education and training in geriatrics for professional nurses.".

NURSE PRACTITIONER PROGRAMS

SEC. 8. (a) Section 822(e) of the Public Health Service Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" after "1983,";

(2) by inserting before the period a comma and "$19,300,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $21,300,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $23,400,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Of the amounts appropriated to carry out this section—

"(1) $3,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986,

"(2) $3,700,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and

"(3) $4,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, shall be available for grants and contracts under subsections (a) and (b) for the training of nurse practitioners in geriatrics and for the training of geriatric nurse practitioners.".

(b) Section 822(b)(3) of such Act is amended by inserting "or in a public health care facility or a nursing home or other facility primarily serving geriatric patients or groups," before "for a period".

HOME HEALTH CARE TRAINING

SEC. 9. Section 339(b)(5) of the Public Health Service Act is amended to read as follows:

"(5) There are authorized to be appropriated for grants and contracts under this subsection $3,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, September 30, 1987, and September 30, 1988.".

NATIONAL INSTITUTE ON AGING

SEC. 10. (a) Section 464 of the Public Health Service Act is amended to read as follows:

"COMPREHENSIVE RESEARCH PLAN

"SEC. 464. (a) Within one year after the date of enactment of this section, the Secretary, in consultation with the National Advisory Council on Aging, shall develop a plan for a comprehensive research program on aging. The plan shall identify high priority opportunities and needs in various fields of research relating to aging, including opportunities and needs for research designed to—

"(1) develop an improved understanding of the aging process;

"(2) develop information concerning conditions, diseases, and disabilities of special importance to elderly individuals (such as Alzheimer's disease, osteoarthritis, hip fractures, and incontinence);

"(3) improve methods of health promotion and disease prevention for elderly individuals; and

"(4) improve methods for the delivery of services needed by both healthy and ill elderly individuals.

"(b) The plan required by subsection (a) shall—

"(1) specify the activities required to implement the plan; and

"(2) give special attention to research on issues relating to individuals aged 85 and older.".

(b) Part H of title IV of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"PREPARATION OF INVESTIGATORS

"SEC. 465. To carry out education and training activities and to support traineeships and fellowships under this part, there are authorized to be appropriated $16,800,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $18,800,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $20,800,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988.".

MENTAL HEALTH

SEC. 11. Section 303 of the Public Health Service Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) For training, instruction, and traineeships under subsection (a)(1) relating to mental health conditions, problems, and illnesses of the elderly and the care, treatment, and rehabilitation of elderly individuals with mental health problems, there are authorized to be appropriated $8,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, and $12,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988.".

ADMINISTRATION ON AGING

SEC. 12. Section 431(a) of the Older Americans Act of 1965 is amended—

(1) by striking out "$29,800,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $31,400,000 for fiscal year 1987" and inserting in lieu thereof "$34,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, $37,900,000 for fiscal year 1987, and $39,800,000 for fiscal year 1988"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Of the amounts appropriated under this section—

"(1) $12,600,000 for fiscal year 1986,

"(2) $14,700,000 for fiscal year 1987, and

"(3) $16,800,000 for fiscal year 1988,

shall be available for training and instruction activities under parts A and B of this title.".

COORDINATION OF EDUCATION AND TRAINING ACTIVITIES

SEC. 13. The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall establish an interdepartmental committee to ensure that the planning, development, and evaluation of education and training activities in geriatrics and gerontology are conducted in a coordinated manner. The committee shall include representatives of the Administration on Aging, the Office of the Assistant Secretary for Health, the Health Resources and Services Administration, the National Institute on Aging, the National Institute on Mental Health, and other offices of the Department of Health and Human Services with major interests and responsibilities concerning programs for elderly individuals. The Secretary shall submit a report to Congress within one year after the date of enactment of this Act which describes the activities of the committee established under this section.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 14. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the provisions of this Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1985.

(b)(1) Section 13 shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) The provisions of section 464 of the Public Health Service Act (as amended by section 10(a) of this Act) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, as the senior Democrat on the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I am pleased to join Senator HEINZ and Senator MATSUNAGA in introducing the Geriatric Research, Education and Training Act of 1985 [GREAT], which would supplement programs within the Administration on Aging, the Health Resources and Services Administration, the National Institute on Aging, and the National Institute of Mental Health to provide support for training in geriatrics and gerontology. This important legislation addresses the health care needs of our Nation's elderly; not just those who are elderly today, but tomorrow's elderly as well.

The fastest growing segment of our society is our elderly population, especially those who are 85 years of age and older. Currently, the elderly comprise over 11 percent of our population. By the year 2025, this percentage is expected to increase to 20 percent of our population. As we grow older, our chance of developing one or more chronic illnesses increases; and the largest percentage of the U.S. health care dollar is spent on the health care needs of older Americans.

Recently, I chaired an Aging Committee hearing in Toledo, OH, to explore how we can help make growing older with good health a reality for American citizens. We discussed the importance of health promotion measures which can significantly reduce the chance of developing chronic illness, the ways in which our lives and health can be enhanced through advances in biomedical research and technology, and the need for physicians and other health professionals who are trained to meet the special needs of our growing elderly population. Unless steps are taken now to address the severe shortage of health professionals trained in geriatrics and gerontology, we may face a crisis in care for the elderly that will require a massive infusion of funds in the future.

This critical shortage of trained health care professionals is fully documented in a 1984 report issued by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Published by the National Institute on Aging [NIA], the "Report on Education and Training in Geriatrics and Gerontology" provides graphic evidence of these critical shortages. The report speaks to the growing demand for hospital, long-term care and community services which will clearly accompany the demographic changes in the elderly population. According to health care specialists and experts in aging, these services can be more effective and economical if better trained personnel and additional knowledge on prevention and treatment are available. Some of the shortages cited in the report, as they looked ahead 5 years to 1990, include a need for:

At least a 500-percent increase in the number of medical school faculty with expertise in geriatrics; a substantial increase in the number of nursing faculty members ensure that at least 2,000 such faculty members have preparation in gerontological nursing; a 600-percent increase in the number of geriatric dentistry faculty members, to bring the national total from the current approximately 20 such faculty members to at least 120; and a 900-percent increase in the number of occupational therapist faculty members to train therapists to work with elderly patients—there are currently 10 such faculty members.

Further, the report cites shortages of professionals adequately trained in geriatrics and gerontology in other related and critical fields, such as optometrists, pharmacists, podiatrists, respiratory therapists, social work faculty, and research scientists concentrating on the biomedical, behavioral, and social problems of the elderly.

The GREAT Act of 1985 is aimed at preparing both active and future practitioners to adequately meet the health care needs of older Americans. We need to train the teachers so that they can in turn prepare their students and colleagues to either specialize in geriatrics or to be better equipped to diagnose, educate, and treat their elderly patients and clients. Dr. T. Franklin Williams, Director of the NIA, cited a recent survey of the Association of American Medical Colleges which found that less than 5 percent of graduating medical students had completed a course specifically focused on geriatrics. Of our country's 127 medical schools, only 15 require their students to study geriatric medicine. A 1981 survey of physicians revealed that out of 480,000 physicians, fewer than 700 claimed to have any expertise in geriatric medicine. That is just over one-tenth of 1 percent. Yet, with the exception of pediatricians, most health professionals will increasingly see elderly patients as our population ages and people live longer.

Preparing now to have adequately trained personnel in the health care field is good public policy, not only because it is humane, but because it will also prove to be cost effective in terms of diagnosis, treatment, and prevention. Without adequate research and trained practitioners we cannot expect the medical and technological breakthroughs needed to combat the various diseases and conditions that particularly affect the elderly, such as Alzheimer's disease and other dementias, arthritis, incontinence, osteoporosis, coronary heart disease, hypertension, and cancer. Not only are these devastating to the affected individual and his or her family and friends, but these conditions are also costly to all of us.

At a hearing I held in Ohio on April 15, I heard testimony from the Arthritis Foundation which estimates that $5 billion is spent annually on medical care for arthritis. A recent column in the Washington Post reported estimates of an annual cost by 1990 of $30 billion to institutionalize the victims of Alzheimer's disease. Early and accurate diagnosis of such conditions may reduce or delay hospitalization and institutionalization of the elderly. Research and technological development will continue to lead to new and improved adaptive and assistive devices enabling older persons with disabling conditions to remain at home longer on a more independent basis.

Ohio, I am proud to say, was the first State to provide financial support to each of its seven medical schools to establish an office of geriatric medicine. In 1977, the Ohio General Assembly enacted legislation which established a separate line item in the higher education budget to do this. Funding has risen from $350,000 in fiscal year 1979 to approximately $1.2 million in fiscal year 1985. This experience has provided us with numerous innovative approaches to educating medical students and practitioners about the needs of elderly patients and has stimulated exciting new research. Ohio remains the only State with a comprehensive State-supported geriatric medicine program for all of its medical schools.

The Congress can provide the leadership to ensure that Ohio's innovation in geriatric education are possible nationally. This experience needs to be replicated throughout the country if we hope to overcome the well-documented shortages of adequately prepared health care professionals to meet the challenge of our rapidly growing and aging elderly population. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to join me in supporting this important legislation.●

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 1101. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment of fringe benefits provided to the parents of employees; to the Committee on Finance.

TREATMENT OF FRINGE BENEFITS TO PARENTS OF EMPLOYEES

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today that will restore for parents of airline employees their privilege of flying on a tax-free basis. Last year the Congress enacted the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 and among its many provisions was one that eliminated parents from what had been a long tradition where airlines had considered parents to be within the immediate family of an airline employee and therefore provided them with air travel privileges on a seat available basis.

The consequence of this small change in tax law, of "negligible" revenue impact as reported by the Joint Tax Committee, is larger than it may appear. Some airlines have ended their reciprocal agreements that established the basis of interline air travel by parents of airline employees. This small change in law has, in combination with the withholding requirements of the temporary IRS regulation, contributed to the reduction or elimination of this fringe benefit that airlines voluntarily provided and from all my information, would like to be able to continue.

Employees of airlines and the air carriers themselves have been through some difficult times and the availability of fringe benefits for employees and their families is an important benefit and attraction to current and potential employees. For some employees who can do little else for their parents except being able to provide them with free or reduced cost air travel on a space available basis, the congressional actions of last year were an unwelcome change. The change was unnecessary, in my opinion, and achieves little except to disrupt the beneficial practices of the commercial airline industry.

To make matters worse, the IRS issued temporary regulations on January 7 that impute the value of parental travel on airlines to be 50 percent of the regular coach fare on the day of travel. That imputed value is added to the employee's income and taxed. Employees in the 50 percent tax bracket that are taxed on 50 percent of the value of the coach fare consequently pay a tax that amounts to 25 percent of the regular coach fare. This valuation is too high. The cost of traveling from New York to Los Angeles for the period from February 18, 1985, to March 30, 1985, shows that all major airlines provided an ultra super save fare that is just 28 percent of coach fare. For many there is no fringe benefit left due to the tax implications.

The legislation that I am introducing would again place parents on the same basis as the spouse or dependents of an employee when air travel is provided as a fringe benefit by the airline. As with the employee, this service must be a "No additional cost service" to the air carrier in order for it to remain tax free. This means that the employee, spouse, parent, or dependent children can fly only if the seats were otherwise going to remain unused on the flight.

In treating the parent on an equal basis with other dependents of the employee, this bill does not interfere with reciprocal agreements and the airlines can, if they so choose, enter into reciprocal agreements with regard to parental air travel where the employers bear no substantial cost and the airline does lose revenue as a result.

In concluding Mr. President, this bill corrects legislation that was unnecessary, which raised essentially no revenue, which has had unintended affects that have disrupted a legitimate fringe benefit offered to parents of airline employees.●

By Mr. ROTH:

S. 1102. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to impose a tax on the net business receipts of taxpayers, to credit the amount of such tax against the liability of such taxpayer under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX ACT

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, the Senate Finance Committee and House Ways and Means Committee are now hard at work considering various proposals to reform the current Tax Code. I commend those panels for their interest, because I think most Americans have come to the conclusion that the current system—rife with problems of fairness, complexity, and disincentives for savings and growth—needs overhaul this year.

But the proposals now on the table do not do the whole job. In my judgment, a good tax reform plan must do several things. It must substantially lower individual marginal tax rates and include major personal savings initiatives to eliminate the double taxation of individual saving. It must not increase the cost of capital to American business which would decrease our competitiveness. It must make the Tax Code simpler and more fair and it must raise the same amount of revenue as current law so as not to increase the deficit. In short, tax reform must establish an environment of economic growth.

Some of the current proposals meet some of these objectives. But because none—including my own Roth-Moore plan—meet all those objectives, I am introducing today a new and exciting addition to the tax debate which, when coupled with proposals to simplify the law, lower marginal rates and increase savings, will give us a more rational and more pro-growth tax law.

Specifically, I propose the creation of a business transfer tax [BTT], the proceeds of which can be used as a credit against the employer portion of Social Security taxes (FICA). Each business would add up its total receipts and subtract from it total purchases including physical capital and raw materials. The remainder, the firm's net receipts would be the tax base and would be taxable at the rate of 5 percent. This tax liability could then be credited against the firm's FICA liability. All credited amounts would be transferred to the Social Security trust fund. Under GATT, export receipts could be excluded from the tax base and all imports would be subject to a 5-percent tax. In addition to roughly offsetting the cost of FICA, the BTT would raise $20 billion to be used to lower marginal rates. Only about $3 billion additional would be collected from domestic sources and over 90 percent of existing firms would not have any net tax increase. On the other hand, a 5-percent BTT would raise about $17 billion in 1986 from imports in a GATT-legal manner.

Let me also make clear that, although I will introduce this measure with a 5-percent tax rate, I am also considering the effects of a higher tax rate, in order to provide revenue for reductions in the marginal tax rates for individuals and further savings incentives. Although any tax reform must be in the aggregate revenue neutral, I continue to believe that lower individual rates will encourage productive investment and more economic growth.

Each 5-percent reduction in marginal tax rates costs about $25 billion in revenue. At a 7-percent rate, the BTT will raise about $45 billion, about $20 billion from domestic sources and the rest from foreign sources. A 10-percent BTT raises about $75 billion a year and a 20-percent BTT raises about $235 billion.

Substantial rate reduction could be purchased with a higher BTT but there is one thing I will absolutely insist on—BTT revenues should only be raised in the context of a revenue neutral tax reform and not to raise overall taxes.

The BTT will have major implications for our trade problems. Our horrendous trade deficits are caused in part by a tax induced bias in favor of foreign goods imported in this country and against American exports. Under the GATT there is an artificial distinction made between so-called indirect and direct taxes. Indirect taxes are things like sales taxes or general consumption taxes, while direct taxes are income taxes. Many times the lines are blurred and the method of collection becomes more important to the GATT than does the tax base. Under GATT, indirect taxes on exports are rebatable and imports can be taxed. The theory is that commodities should be taxed in the country in which they are consumed. There are no border tax adjustments allowed for direct taxes.

Our trading partners raise a much greater proportion of their tax revenues through indirect consumption taxes than we do. In fact we raise very little revenue this way. When foreign goods leave other countries the exporters receive a rebate. When the goods reach this country no indirect tax is assessed at our border. These goods almost entirely escape taxation which is a major incentive to foreign firms exporting to this country.

On the other hand our exporters do not enjoy a rebate on taxes they paid. And when the goods reach a foreign shore, they are taxed again at high rates. Foreign exporters essentially enjoy a tax holiday while our exporters are double taxed. This bias almost certainly has contributed to our trade problems.

The BTT would help to reverse this problem. It is considered an indirect tax under the GATT and therefore could be assessed on imports as they enter the country. At the same time export receipts would be excluded from the BTT base. This is not a protectionist move. It is simply a more to harmonize our tax system with that of our major trading partners in accordance with international trade treaties. We are striving to remove an artificial bias against our exports and it is inconceivable that any country would try to retaliate. What could they do? Increase their VAT?

It is essential that we take this move to remove artificial obstacles to trade and remove the barriers that prevent our companies from selling goods overseas.

There is another reason to support this legislation. It will create jobs. The current law FICA tax is a direct tax on labor services. Each time a firm hires a worker it has to pay this tax, which discourages hiring additional workers. By allowing the BTT to be credited against this payroll tax, the FICA is replaced by a more neutral tax that does not directly increase labor costs. Since the BTT lowers direct labor costs firms will be more likely to hire additional workers. This is especially important to the small business sector which tends to be labor intensive and has the greatest potential for job creation.

Mr. President, in this year when we are to seriously consider tax reform, and when we face such serious trade problems this proposal takes on special importance. In order to lower marginal tax rates for individuals, to increase savings incentives, to lower the cost of capital to business, to remove the barriers to trade and to create jobs, I urge my colleagues to seriously consider this proposal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill, as well as a section-by-section description of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1102

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Business Transfer Tax Act of 1985".

(b) AMENDMENT OF 1954 CODE.—Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

SEC. 2. IMPOSITION OF BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subtitle D (relating to miscellaneous excise taxes) is amended by inserting before chapter 31 the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 30—BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX

"Subchapter A. Imposition of tax.
"Subchapter B. Taxable net business receipts.
"Subchapter C. Exempt taxpayers.
"Subchapter D. Administration.
"Subchapter E. Definitions and special rules.

"Subchapter A—Imposition of Tax

"Sec. 4001. Imposition of tax.

"SEC. 4001. IMPOSITION OF TAX.

"There is hereby imposed a tax equal to 5 percent of the sum of—

"(a) the taxable net business receipts of the taxpayer for the taxable year, plus

"(b) in the case of any property imported into the United States by the taxpayer during the taxable year—

"(1) the customs value plus customs duties and any other duties which may be imposed, or

"(2) if there is no such customs value, the fair market value (determined as if the importer had sold the property).

"Subchapter B—Taxable Net Business Receipts

"Sec. 4003. Taxable net business receipts.
"Sec. 4004. Business receipts.
"Sec. 4005. Business expenses.
"Sec. 4006. Special rules.

"SEC. 4003. TAXABLE NET BUSINESS RECEIPTS.

"For purposes of this chapter, the term 'taxable net business receipts' means the excess, if any, of—

"(1) the business receipts of the taxpayer for the taxable year, over

"(2) the business expenses of the taxpayer for the taxable year.

"SEC. 4004. BUSINESS RECEIPTS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'business receipts' means the aggregate of amounts received by a corporation, or any person (other than a corporation) in connection with a business, during the taxable year from—

"(1) the sale of property in the United States, or

"(2) the performance of services in the United States.

"(b) CERTAIN RECEIPTS EXEMPTED.—For purposes of this section, the term 'business receipts' shall not include any amount received with respect to the following:

"(1) FOOD.—The retail sale of food and nonalcoholic beverages for human consumption other than on the premises where such food is sold.

"(2) HOUSING.—The sale or renting of—

"(A) residential real property, and

"(B) a mobile or floating home.

"(3) MEDICAL CARE.—The performance of any service, or the retail sale or renting of any property, payment for which by the purchaser or renter would constitute medical care within the meaning of section 213 (relating to an itemized deduction for medical and dental expenses).

"(4) LAND.—The sale of renting of land.

"(c) RECEIPTS FROM EXPORTS EXEMPTED.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'business receipts' shall not include any amount received from the sale of property which is for use, consumption or disposition outside the United States.

"(d) CERTAIN RECEIPTS NOT TREATED AS RECEIVED IN CONNECTION WITH TRADE OR BUSINESS.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'business receipts' shall not include any amount received by the taxpayer—

"(1) as dividends,

"(2) as interest, or

"(3) from the sale of any capital asset (as defined in section 1221) not used in the active conduct of a business by the taxpayer.

"SEC. 4005. BUSINESS EXPENSES.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this chapter, the term 'business expenses' shall include expense carryforwards to the taxable year (as determined under subsection (c)) plus any amount paid or incurred by the taxpayer during the taxable year with respect to a business of the taxpayer—

"(1) for the purchase or use of tangible property including (but not limited to)—

"(A) materials and components,

"(B) inventory, and

"(C) property subject to a deduction for depreciation, amortization or depletion under subtitle A,

"(2) for the purchase or use of other property including (but not limited to)—

"(A) trademarks and trade names,

"(B) copyrights,

"(C) patents, and

"(D) mineral, oil and gas properties,

"(3) for the purchase of services including (but not limited to)—

"(A) communications, transportation and utilities,

"(B) security, insurance, maintenance and repairs,

"(C) research and experimentation,

"(D) product development, packaging, advertising and marketing, and

"(E) accounting, financial planning, and legal representation,

"(4) for all other ordinary and necessary expenses (as determined under section 162, relating to trade or business expenses) except as provided under subsection (d).

"(b) TAX ATTRIBUTABLE TO CUSTOMS VALUE OF PROPERTY.—For purposes of paragraph (1) of subsection (a), the tax imposed on the amount determined under subsection (b) of section 4001 shall be treated as an amount paid or incurred for the purchase of tangible property during the taxable year.

"(c) EXPENSE CARRYFORWARDS.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—If the sum of—

"(A) the expense carryforwards to the taxable year, plus

"(B) the amount of business expenses determined under subsection (a) for the taxable year without regard to expense carryforwards exceeds the amount of business receipts determined under section 4004 for such taxable year (hereinafter in this section referred as the 'net expense year'), such excess (to the extent attributable to the amount of determined under subparagraph (B)) shall be an expense carryforward to each of the 15 taxable years following the net expense year.

"(2) AMOUNT CARRIED TO EACH YEAR.—

"(A) ENTIRE AMOUNT CARRIED TO FIRST SUCCEEDING YEAR.—The entire amount of unused expenses for a net expense year shall be carried to the following taxable year.

"(B) AMOUNT CARRIED TO OTHER 14 YEARS.—The amount of unused expenses for the net expense year shall be carried to each of the succeeding 14 taxable years to the extent that such unused expenses may not be taken into account under subsection (a) for a prior taxable year because of the limitation of paragraph (3).

"(3) LIMITATIONS ON CARRYFORWARDS.—The amount of unused expenses which may be taken into account under subsection (a) for any taxable year succeeding the net expense year shall not exceed the amount by which the taxable net business receipts determined under section 4004 for such taxable year exceeds the sum or the amounts which, by reason of this section, are carried to such taxable year and are attributable to taxable years preceeding the net expense year.

"(d) CERTAIN EXPENSES NOT TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) SPECIFIC EXPENSES.—The term 'business expenses' shall not include any amount paid or incurred by the taxpayer for—

"(A) compensation of an employee including (but not limited to)—

"(i) wages and salaries,

"(ii) deferred compensation, including amounts contributed to plans described in subchapter D of chapter 1 (relating to pension, profit-sharing, stock bonus and stock option plans),

"(iii) life, health, accident and disability insurance plans,

"(iv) meals, lodging and travel expenses,

"(v) scholarships, fellowships and other educational assistance payments, and

"(vi) other amounts excludable from an employee's gross income under subtitle A,

"(B) interest and dividends,

"(C) taxes,

"(D) charitable contributions, and

"(E) items described in subsection (b) of section 4004 (relating to certain receipts which are exempt from the business transfer tax).

"(2) CERTAIN EXPENSES ALLOCABLE TO EXEMPT RECEIPTS.—The term 'business expenses' shall not include any amount which is—

"(A) directly allocable to any receipts which are exempt under subsections (b) and (d) of section 4004, or

"(B) that portion of any business expenses not directly allocable to any receipts in an amount which bears the same ratio to the total amount of such expenses as—

"(i) the aggregate amount of receipts exempt under subsections (b) and (d) of section 4004, bears to

"(ii) all receipts of the taxpayer.

"(3) AMOUNTS PAID TO EXEMPT ENTITIES.—The term 'business expenses' shall not include any amount which is paid to an exempt taxpayer described in section 4011 (relating to exempt taxpayers), except to the extent that such amount is included in taxable net business receipts under subsection (b) thereof (relating to exempt organizations).

"SEC. 4006. SPECIAL RULES FOR DETERMINING BUSINESS RECEIPTS.

For purposes of section 4004(a)—

"(a) SALES OF PROPERTY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), the sale of property shall be treated as occurring where delivery takes place.

"(2) REAL PROPERTY.—The sale of real property shall be treated as occurring where the real property is located.

"(b) PERFORMANCE OF SERVICE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, a service shall be treated as occurring where it is performed.

"(2) SERVICES PERFORMED INSIDE AND OUTSIDE UNITED STATES.—If a service is performed both inside and outside the United States, such service shall be treated as performed—

"(A) inside the United States, if 50 percent or more of such service is performed inside the United States, and

"(B) outside the United States, if less than 50 percent of such service is performed inside the United States.

"(c) EXCHANGES TREATED AS SALES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2)—

"(A) an exchange of property for property or for services shall be treated as a sale of property, and

"(B) an exchange of services for property or for services shall be treated as the performance of services.

"(2) EXCEPTION FOR REORGANIZATIONS.—An exchange of property which is described in section 368 (relating to definitions of corporate reorganizations) shall not be treated as a sale of property.

"(3) AMOUNT TREATED AS RECEIVED.—The amount included in business receipts with respect to exchanges described in paragraph (1) shall be the fair market value of the property or services treated as being sold.

"(d) PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES.—

"(1) CERTAIN ACTIVITIES TREATED AS PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES.—Activities treated as performance of services shall include (but shall not be limited to)—

"(A) permitting the use of property,

"(B) the granting of a right to the performance of services or to reimbursement (including the granting of warranties, insurance, and similar items), and

"(C) the making of a covenant not to compete (or similar agreement to refrain from doing something).

"(2) EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES.—

"(A) SERVICES FOR EMPLOYER.—An employee's services for his employer shall not be treated as the performance of services.

"(B) SERVICES FOR EMPLOYEE.—An employer's services for his employee shall not be treated as the performance of services.

"Subchapter C—Exempt Taxpayers

"Sec. 4011. Exempt taxpayers.

"SEC. 4011. EXEMPT TAXPAYERS.

"(a) GOVERNMENTAL ENTITY.—No tax shall be imposed under section 4001 on the United States, any State or political subdivision thereof, the District of Columbia, a Commonwealth or possession of the United States, or any agency or instrumentality of any of the foregoing.

"(b) EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS.—No tax shall be imposed under section 4001 on any organization which is exempt from tax under chapter 1 (relating to income taxes) except that such tax shall be imposed on any taxable net business receipts of such organization which are allocable to an unrelated business of such organization (determined under the rules of section 513).

"Subchapter D—Administration

"Sec. 4021. Time for filing return; estimated tax payments; overpayments.

"Sec. 4022. Partnerships.

"Sec. 4023. S Corporations.

"SEC. 4021. TIME FOR FILING RETURN; ESTIMATED TAX PAYMENTS; OVERPAYMENTS.

"(a) TIME FOR FILING RETURN.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Each person on whom a tax is imposed by section 4001 for any taxable year shall file a return of such tax no later than the time for filing the return of tax imposed by chapter 1 for such taxable year.

"(2) TAXABLE YEAR.—For purposes of this chapter, the taxable year of any person shall be—

"(A) such person's taxable year for purposes of chapter 1, or

"(B) if there is no taxable year for purposes of chapter 1, the calendar year.

"(b) ESTIMATED TAX PAYMENTS.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—For purposes of sections 6154, 6654, and 6655, any tax imposed by section 4001 shall be treated as a tax imposed by section 1 or 11, whichever is appropriate.

"(2) MORE FREQUENT PAYMENTS.—At the election of the taxpayer, the payments of any tax imposed by section 4001 shall be made on such dates as are required for the deposits by the taxpayer of any tax imposed by section 3111 (relating to Federal Insurance Contribution Act taxes).

"(c) OVERPAYMENT.—If the taxpayer has paid an amount which exceeds the amount determined to be the correct amount of the tax imposed by section 4001, the overpayment shall be credited against any liability on the part of the taxpayer in respect of any tax imposed by section 4001 in the following taxable year.

"SEC. 4022. PARTNERSHIPS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this chapter, in the case of a partnership, the tax imposed by section 4001 shall be imposed on the partnership (and not on any partner).

"(b) TAXABLE NET BUSINESS RECEIPTS.—No portion of any distribution by a partnership to a partner on account of such partner's interest in such partnership shall be taken into account in determining the taxable net business receipt of such partner.

"SEC. 4023. S CORPORATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this chapter, in the case of an S corporation (as defined in section 1361), the tax imposed by section 4001 shall be imposed on the corporation (and not on any shareholder).

"(b) TAXABLE NET BUSINESS RECEIPTS.—No portion of any distribution by an S corporation to a shareholder on account of such shareholder's ownership of stock in such corporation shall be taken into account in determining the taxable net business receipts of such shareholder.

"Subchapter E—Definitions and Special Rules

"Sec. 4031. Definitions and special rules.

"Sec. 4032. Cross reference to rules and definitions under the income tax.

"SEC. 4031. DEFINITIONS AND SPECIAL RULES.

For purposes of this chapter—

"(a) BUSINESS.—The term 'business' includes—

"(1) a trade, and

"(2) an activity regularly carried on for profit.

"(b) EMPLOYEE.—The term 'employee' has the meaning such term has for purposes of chapter 24 (relating to withholding).

"(c) UNITED STATES.—The term 'United States', when used in a geographical sense, includes a Commonwealth and any possession of the United States.

"(d) SPECIAL RULE WHERE SALE OF PROPERTY INCLUDES INCIDENTAL PERFORMANCE OF SERVICE.—If in connection with the sale of any property there is an incidental performance of services, such performance of services shall be treated as part of the sale of such property.

"(e) SPECIAL RULE WHERE PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES INCLUDES INCIDENTAL TRANSFER OF PROPERTY.—If in connection with the performance of any services there is an incidental transfer of property, such transfer shall be treated as part of the performance of such services.

"SEC. 4032. CROSS REFERENCE TO RULES AND DEFINITIONS UNDER THE INCOME TAX.

Except as otherwise expressly provided in this chapter—

"(a) RULES AND ELECTIONS.—Rules and elections under subtitle A (relating to income taxes) shall be applied for purposes of this chapter, including (but not limited to) for purposes of determining the taxpayer's—

"(1) method of accounting, and

"(2) filing a consolidated return.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—Terms used in this chapter shall have the meanings given to them for purposes of subtitle A."

"(b) TAX TO BE DEDUCTIBLE.—Section 164(a) (relating to deduction for taxes) is amended by inserting after paragraph (5) the following new paragraph:

"(6) To the extent of the sum of the credits determined under sections 3126(a) and 1401(d) (relating to credits against tax of business transfer tax) for the taxable year, the business transfer tax imposed by section 4001.".

"(c) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents for subtitle D is amended by inserting before the items relating to chapter 31 the following:

"CHAPTER 30—BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX".

SEC. 3. CREDIT AGAINST LIABILITY UNDER FEDERAL INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS ACT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter C of chapter 21 (relating to Federal Insurance Contributions Act) is amended by redesignating section 3126 as section 3127 and by inserting after section 3125 the following new section:

"SEC. 3126. CREDIT AGAINST TAX OF BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—There shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by section 3111 with respect to employees of a business of the employer an amount equal to the qualified business transfer tax of such employer.

"(b) QUALIFIED BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'qualified business transfer tax' means, as of any deposit date, the excess of—

"(A) the amount of any tax imposed by section 4001 paid by an employer as of such date (or the amount of any estimated tax paid under this title with respect to such tax as of such date), over

"(B) the sum of—

"(i) the amount of any tax described in subparagraph (A) previously taken into account under this section, plus

"(ii) the aggregate credits allowed under section 1401(d) (relating to self employment taxes) prior to the taxable year.

"(2) PORTION OF TAX NOT CREDITABLE.—For purposes of paragraph (1), no amount of tax imposed by section 4001 on amounts described in subsection (b) thereof shall be taken into account.

"(3) DEPOSIT DATE.—Term 'deposit date' means the date on which any employer is required to deposit the tax imposed by section 3111."

(b) SELF EMPLOYMENT TAX.—Section 1401 (relating to tax on self employment income) is amended by redesignating subsection (d) as subsection (e) and by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) CREDIT AGAINST TAX OF BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX.—There shall be allowed as a credit against the taxes imposed by this section for any taxable year an amount equal to the qualified business transfer tax (as determined under section 3126(b)) of the individual determined as of the end of the taxable year."

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for subchapter C of chapter 21 is amended by striking out the item relating to section 3126 and inserting in lieu thereof the following new items:

"Sec. 3126. Credit against tax of business transfer tax.
"Sec. 3127 Short title.".

SEC. 4. TRANSFER TO TRUST FUNDS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—There are hereby appropriated to each applicable fund amounts equivalent to the amounts which would have been transferred to such fund but for the credit against tax under sections 3126(a) and 1401(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(b) TRANSFERS.—The amounts appropriated by subsection (a) to any applicable fund shall be transferred from time to time (but not less frequently than quarterly) from the general fund of the Treasury on the basis of estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Any such quarterly payment shall be made on the first day of such quarter and shall take into account amounts estimated to be credited under sections 3126(a) and 1401(d) of such Code during such quarter. Proper adjustments shall be made in the amounts subsequently transferred to the extent prior estimates were in excess of or less than the amounts required to be transferred.

(c) APPLICABLE FUND.—For purposes of this section, the term "applicable fund" means any fund or account to which the taxes imposed by section 1401 or 3111 are transferred.

SEC. 5. EFFECTIVE DATES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b), the amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1985.

(b) CREDITS.—The amendments made by section 3 shall apply to taxable periods ending after December 31, 1985.

SEC. 6. SENSE OF THE SENATE CONCERNING USE OF BTT REVENUES.

Whereas individual taxpayers would benefit from reductions in marginal tax rates;

Whereas the enactment or continuation of incentives for individuals to save and invest will continue to be important following a reduction in marginal tax rates; and

Whereas the enactment of the business transfer tax will otherwise increase revenues to the Federal government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the net revenues arising from enactment of the business transfer tax shall be offset by reductions in individual marginal tax rates and incentives for individuals to save and invest.

SECTION-BY-SECTION DESCRIPTION OF S. 1102, THE BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX ACT OF 1985

The bill would enact a 5% tax on the net business receipts realized by businesses which sell goods and services in the United States. This business transfer tax, or "BTT," would be creditable by the business against its employer's FICA tax liability.

The following is a section-by-section description of the proposed new tax and FICA credit mechanisms.

A. THE BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX

The bill would create the BTT in a new chapter 30 of the Internal Revenue Code.

1. Sec. 4001—Tax Base—

New sec. 4001 would impose a 5% tax on the sum of taxable net business receipts for the taxable year plus the aggregate customs values and duties of the taxpayer's imports during the taxable year. If there were no customs values for imports, the fair market values would be used.

2. Sec. 4003—Taxable Net Business Receipts—

"Taxable net business receipts," which would be the BTT base under new sec. 4001, would be the excess of the taxpayer's business receipts over business expenses for the taxable year.

3. Sec. 4004(a)—Business Receipts—

In general, "business receipts" used to determine the BTT base under new sec. 4003 would include the aggregate amount of receipts by a corporation (or by any unincorporated person in connection with a business) from the sale of property or the performance of services in the United States.

4. Sec. 4004(b), (c), (d), (e)—Exempt Receipts—

Certain categories of receipts would be specifically excluded from the general definition of "business receipts" under new sec. 4004(a). The eight categories would be: (i) receipts from retail sales of food and non-alcoholic beverages for offpremises consumption; (ii) sales or rentals of housing; (iii) sales of services and sales or rentals of property for medical care (within the meaning of Sec. 213); (iv) sales or rentals of lands; (v) sales of property for export; (vi) dividends; (vii) interest; or (viii) sales of sec. 1221 capital assets which are not used in the active conduct of the taxpayer's business.

5. Sec. 4005(a), (b)—Deductible Business Expenses—

The deductible "business expenses" used to determine the BTT base under new sec. 4003 would generally include all amounts paid or incurred during the taxable year by the taxpayer to purchase or to use goods or services in the conduct of the taxpayer's business. Specifically included items would be: (i) purchased or leased tangible property such as materials, components, inventory, depreciable/amortizable/depletable property; (ii) other purchased or leased property such as trademarks, trade names, copyrights, patents, mineral/oil/gas properties; and (iii) purchased services such as communications, transportation, utilities, security, insurance, maintenance, repairs, research and experimentation, product development, packaging, advertising, marketing, accounting, financial planning, and legal representation. "Business expenses" would also include all other ordinary and necessary expenses (as determined for purposes of section 162), except those under new sec. 4005(d). The 5% tax on customs values of imports under new sec. 4001(b) for the taxable year would also be treated as an amount paid for the purchase of tangible property during the taxable year.

6. Sec. 4005(c)—Net Business Expense Carryforwards—

In any taxable year, "business expenses" under new sec. 4003 would include expense carryforwards to that year. An expense carryforward would be the amount, if any, by which business expenses exceed business receipts for a taxable year. The carryforward of such net expense would be allowed to the succeeding 15 taxable years on a first-in-first-out (FIFO) basis. (No carryback would be allowed.) Thus, in any taxable year, business receipts would be computed under new sec. 4004. All carryforwards plus current year expenses would be computed under new sec. 4005. To the extend such total expenses exceed receipts, the excess would be attributed first to current year's expenses and then to preceding years' carryforwards in reverse order. These amounts would then be carried to the next year.

7. Sec. 4005(d)—Nondeductible Business Expenses—

Expenses for certain listed items would not treated as deductible business expenses for purposes of computing the BTT base under new sec. 4003. These include amounts paid or incurred for: (i) direct labor costs such as wages, salaries, deferred compensation, insurance premiums, meals, lodging, travel, educational assistance, and other items excludable from an employee's gross income; (ii) interest and dividends; (iii) taxes; (iv) charitable contributions; and (v) items excluded from business receipts under new sec. 4004(b) (i.e., retail food for home use, housing, medical care, and land).

Business expenses also would not include any amount: (i) directly allocable to exempt receipts under new sec. 4004(b) or (d); (ii) equal to the proportionate amount of nonallocable expenses in a ratio of receipts which are exempt under sec. 4004 (b) and (d) over total receipts; and (iii) paid to an entity which is non-taxable under new sec. 4011, except to the extent such amounts would be included in the entity's taxable net business receipts attributable to unrelated business income.

8. Sec. 4006—Special Rules For Determining Business Receipts

A series of special rules would clarify the treatment of certain transactions. A sale of property would occur where delivery takes place, except that a sale of real property would occur where the property is located. Performance of services would occur where the service is performed, with a "50 percent or more" test used to place within the U.S. the performance of a service which is performed both inside and outside the U.S.

Exchanges of property or services for one or the other (or both) would be treated as a sale of property or the performance of services, thereby creating business receipts under new sec. 4004. The amount received would be the fair market value of property or services sold. An exchange of property described in sec. 368 would not be treated as a sale of such property.

Performance of services would specifically include: (i) permitting use of property; (ii) granting a right to performance of services or to reimbursement (e.g., warranties and insurance); and (iii) providing a covenant not to compete or take other action. Neither an employer's services for an employee nor an employee's services for an employer would be treated as "performance of services" for purposes of new sec. 4004.

9. Sec. 4011—Exempt Entities—

The BTT would not be imposed on the United States, any state or political subdivision of a state, the District of Columbia, a commonwealth or possession of the United States, or any agency or instrumentality of any such entity.

The BTT generally would not be imposed on any organization which is tax exempt under the income tax. However, any such organization which had an unrelated business (determined using the rules of sec. 513) would be subject to the BTT on taxable net business receipts which were allocable to such business.

10. Sec. 4021—Administrative Matters—

A BTT return would be required to be filed by each taxpayer not later than the time for filing of the taxpayer's income tax return. The taxable year would be the taxpayer's income tax year. If there were no such year established, the calendar year would be used.

The BTT would be payable by the taxpayer in installments of estimated payments under income tax rules in sections 6154 and 6654. The taxpayer would also be allowed to elect to make estimated payments on the deposit dates for FICA payments. Underpayments of BTT would be subject to the penalties in sections 6654 and 6655.

Overpayments of BTT would be credited against the following year's BTT liability.

11. Sections 4022 and 4023—Partnerships and S Corporations—

The BTT would be imposed on a partnership and on an S Corporation, rather than on a partner or a shareholder. Subsequent distributions by the taxpayer to a partner/shareholder would not be treated as business receipts for such person under new sec. 4004.

12. Sec. 4031—Definitions and Special Rules—

For purposes of the new BTT chapter: (i) "business" would include a trade and an activity regularly carried on for profit; (ii) "employee" would be given its meaning within chapter 24 on withholding; and (iii) "United States", in a geographic sense, would include a commonwealth and possession.

Incidental performance of services in connection with a sale of property would be treated as a part of the sale. An incidental transfer of property in connection with the performance of services would be treated as a part of such services.

13. Sec. 4032—Cross References to the Income Tax—

Except as otherwise provided by the new BTT sections, the rules, elections and definitions under the income tax would govern the BTT. For example, a taxpayer which files a consolidated income tax return would be required to file a consolidated BTT return.

14. BTT as a Deductible Tax—

Code section 164(a) would be amended to allow a deduction for BTT for income tax purposes to the extent that BTT is credited against FICA and self-employment taxes for the taxable year (see part B below). Any excess BTT would not be deductible.

B. CREDIT AGAINST EMPLOYER'S FICA LIABILITY

1. Sec. 3126(a)—FICA Credit—

The bill would redesignate sec. 3126 as 3127 and enact a new sec. 3126 to allow as a credit against the employer's FICA tax under sec. 3111 an amount of the BTT imposed by new sec. 4001. The credit would be available only with respect to FICA taxes on a business employee of the taxpayer.

2. Sec. 3126(b)—Qualified Amount of BTT—

The credit allowed under new sec. 3126(a) would not exceed the "qualified business transfer tax." This would be the amount which, as of any date on which the employer is required to deposit its sec. 3111 FICA taxes, represents the excess of aggregate BTT paid, or estimates paid, since enactment over the sum of earlier credits taken under new sec. 3126(a) since enactment, plus credits taken against self-employment taxes under sec. 1401(d) for prior years. However, any BTT attributable to new sec. 4001(b) concerning customs value of imports would reduce the amount of otherwise qualified BTT.

3. Self-Employment Taxes—

For unincorporated taxpayers, the BTT would also be available as a credit against the self-employment tax. Section 1401 would be amended by adding a new subsection (d) to allow a credit against the self-employment tax of the proprietor/partner, but only to the extent that there is an amount of qualified business transfer tax (determined under new sec. 3126(b)) as of the end of the year after all FICA credits claimed for the year have been taken into account.

C. ALLOCATIONS TO TRUST FUNDS

Section 4 of the bill would appropriate to FICA trust funds the amounts of BTT which are taken as credits against FICA and self employment taxes.

D. EFFECTIVE DATES

Section 5 of the bill would enact the BTT as of January 1, 1986.

E. SENSE OF THE SENATE

Section 6 of the bill would express the sense of the Senate that the net revenues from the BTT would be used to reduce individual tax rates and to provide individual savings incentives.●

By Mr. GORTON:

S. 1103. A bill to authorize certain atmospheric and satellite programs and functions of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

NATIONAL OCEANIC AND ATMOSPHERIC ADMINISTRATION ATMOSPHERIC AND SATELLITE PROGRAM AUTHORIZATION ACT

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation to authorize fiscal year 1986 appropriations for the atmospheric and satellite programs of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration [NOAA]. These programs make up about 60 percent of NOAA's budget and are of critical importance to the safety and welfare of all Americans.

The atmospheric programs consist primarily of weather data collection, analysis, and dissemination by the National Weather Service. NOAA also conducts atmospheric and hydrological research to improve our understanding of processes which alter atmospheric and environmental conditions.

NOAA's satellite programs involve the management and operation of three satellite systems: The geostationary meteorological satellite system, the polar-orbiting meteorological satellite system, and the land remote sensing satellite system.

For budgetary purposes, these programs break down into five subactivities. The current subactivity funding levels, 1986 levels proposed by the administration, and levels proposed in this legislation are presented in the following table:

Subactivity	1985 appropriation	1986 request	1986 authorization
Public warning and forecast	287.6	264.5	287.6
Atmospheric and hydrological research	65.5	56.4	65.5
Satellite services	85.2	78.6	85.2
Satellite systems	202.8	229.0	276.8
Data and information services	25.1	23.0	25.1

The table shows that this bill freezes spending for four of the five subactivities. The exception is the satellite systems subactivity, which I propose to authorize at a level $74 million higher than the current budget.

The funding increase for satellite systems is needed to accommodate the administration's proposed $74 million increase for the geostationary, or GOES satellite system. NOAA's GOES satellites are the primary source of satellite data for weather forecasting. Satellite images shown on television weather forecasts come from GOES satellites, which provide data from fixed positions over the Western Hemisphere.

My colleagues may recall the premature failure of a GOES satellite last year, which reduced NOAA's ability to monitor developing weather conditions and created the possibility that NOAA's geostationary capability could be lost completely before a replacement satellite is launched in late 1985.

The increased funding for the GOES system will continue development of a new generation of GOES satellites and will accelerate GOES procurement to ensure that future gaps in GOES service are avoided. I am confident that my colleagues support this funding increase.

The difference between the administration's request for satellite systems and the level authorized by this bill is due to the administration's request for a $48 million cut to eliminate one of NOAA's two polar-orbiting satellites. Mr. President, this proposed cut has been rejected by the Congress several times in the past, and with good reason. The polar-orbiting satellites are the only U.S. civilian source of global weather data and represent an important complement to the GOES satellites for forecasting purposes. They also represent the U.S. contribution to the international search and rescue satellite, or SARSAT Program, for which both the United States and Soviet Union have committed the use of two spacecraft.

This bill restores the $48 million, to preserve the two-satellite system, and to develop the complementary advanced microwave sounding unit.

The third NOAA satellite system is the land remote sensing satellite, or Landsat system. Last year, I introduced legislation (Public Law 98-365) to authorize commercialization of the Landsat system. The administration is working to implement the requirements of Public Law 98-365, and I expect the administration to transmit a proposal to the Congress pursuant to the requirements of the law. Administration officials are aware that the Congress is prepared to consider such a proposal as soon as it is received. This legislation provides for the operation of the current Government-operated Landsat satellite only.

The Satellite Services and Data and Information Services subactivities provide respectively the operation and maintenance of NOAA satellites and the worldwide availability of NOAA satellite data. These programs can be preserved within the framework of a freeze, which is proposed in the authorization bill.

Funding for atmospheric programs is also frozen in this bill. The authorization level is intended to restore administration cuts proposed in personnel at National Weather Service offices, specialized forecast services such as the Agricultural Weather Program, the Fire Weather Program, and the Fruit Frost Program, and reductions in funding for the NOAA weather wire and NOAA weather radio.

The bill provides also for the continued development of the next generation weather radar [NEXRAD] system. The NEXRAD system is of great importance to NOAA, the Department of Defense, and the Federal Aviation Administration, and is needed to replace outdated Federal weather radar units. I am concerned that the administration wishes to reduce funding for NEXRAD development to study alternative technologies. I do not intend to instruct the administration whether to carry out such a study, but I believe that the original NEXRAD development schedule and technical requirements should be maintained.

The authorization level for atmospheric and hydrological research will restore funding for several research programs which contribute greatly to our understanding of the processes which cause atmospheric and environmental changes. The bill also reauthorizes the National Climate Program Act—$2 million—and the Weather Modification Reporting Act—$100,000.

Finally, Mr. President, this legislation contains sections pertaining to NOAA's authority to close and consolidate National Weather Service offices and to contract for private performance of NOAA activities. These sections direct NOAA to consider specific factors and issues in making such decisions, and to provide justification for any decision to close or consolidate a weather station or to contract out a NOAA activity pursuant to Office of Management and Budget circular memorandum A-76. Both provisions were approved by the Congress last year in response to questions about the merits of and motives for these administrative decisions.

These sections will not take away NOAA's authority to carry out these decisions, but will merely provide the Congress and other interested parties the opportunity to be fully informed about the decisions. I am aware that the administration does not believe that this review is appropriate, and I am willing to discuss this subject with administration officials. I think that we can establish procedures which will be satisfactory to all concerned parties.

I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting these important programs and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1103

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this act may be cited as the "National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Atmospheric and Satellite Program Authorization Act of 1985".

TITLE I—ATMOSPHERIC PROGRAMS

PUBLIC WARNING AND FORECAST SERVICES

SEC. 101. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce to enable the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to carry out its public warning and forecast service duties under law, $287,592,000 for fiscal year 1986. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall be used to fund those duties relating to public warning and forecast specified by the act entitled "An Act to increase the efficiency and reduce the expenses of the Signal Corps of the Army, and to transfer the Weather Service to the Department of Agriculture", approved October 1, 1890 (15 U.S.C. 311 et seq.), the Act entitled "An Act to define the functions and duties of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and for other purposes", approved August 6, 1947 (33 U.S.C. 883a et seq.), and any other law involving such duties. Such duties include meteorological, hydrological, and oceanographic public warnings and forecasts.

ATMOSPHERIC AND HYDROLOGICAL RESEARCH

SEC. 102. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce to enable the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to carry out its atmospheric and hydrological research duties under law, $65,531,000 for fiscal year 1986. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall be used to fund those duties relating to atmospheric and hydrological research specified by the Act entitled "An Act to increase the efficiency and reduce the expenses of the Signal Corps of the Army, and to transfer the Weather Service to the Department of Agriculture", approved October 1, 1890 (15 U.S.C. 311 et seq.,) and by any other law involving such duties. Such duties include research for developing improved prediction capabilities for atmospheric and hydrological processes.

(b) The authorization provided for under subsection (a) of this section shall be in addition to moneys authorized under the Act entitled "An Act to provide for the reporting of weather modification activities to the Federal Government", approved December 18, 1971 (15 U.S.C. 330 et seq.), and the National Climate Program Act (15 U.S.C. 2901 et seq.), for the purpose of carrying out such duties relating to atmospheric and hydrological research.

TITLE II—SATELLITE PROGRAMS

SATELLITE SERVICES

SEC. 201. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce to enable the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to carry out its satellite services duties under law, $85,208,000 for fiscal year 1986. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall be used to fund those duties relating to satellite services specified by the Act entitled "An Act to increase the efficiency and reduce the expenses of the Signal Corps of the Army, and to transfer the Weather Service to the Department of Agriculture", approved October 1, 1890 (15 U.S.C. 311 et seq.), the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Authorization Act, 1985, approved July 16, 1984 (Public Law 98-361; 98 Stat. 422), and any other law involving such duties. Such duties include satellite maintenance and operations and satellite data analysis.

SATELLITE SYSTEMS

SEC. 202. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce to enable the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to carry out its satellite systems duties under law, $276,779,000 for fiscal year 1986. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall be used to fund those duties relating to satellite systems specified by the Act entitled "An Act to increase the efficiency and reduce the expenses of the Signal Corps of the Army, and to transfer the Weather Service to the Department of Agriculture", approved October 1, 1890 (15 U.S.C. 311 et seq.), the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Authorization Act, 1985, approved July 16, 1984 (Public Law 97-361; 98 Stat. 422), and by any other law involving such duties. Such duties include spacecraft procurement, launch, and associated ground station system changes involving polar orbiting and geostationary meteorological satellites and land remote sensing satellites.

(b) The authorization provided for under subsection (a) of this section shall be in addition to moneys authorized under the Land Remote-Sensing Commercialization Act of 1984 (15 U.S.C. 4201 et seq.) for the purpose of carrying out such duties relating to satellite systems.

DATA AND INFORMATION SERVICES

SEC. 203. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce to enable the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to carry out its data and information services duties under law, $25,118,000 for fiscal year 1986. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall be used to fund those duties relating to data and information services specified by the Act entitled "An Act to increase the efficiency and reduce the expenses of the Signal Corps of the Army, and to transfer the Weather Service to the Department of Agriculture", approved October 1, 1890 (15 U.S.C. 311 et seq.), and any other law involving such duties. Such duties include environmental data and information products and services in the atmospheric, marine, solid earth, and solar-terrestrial sciences.

TITLE III—OTHER AUTHORIZATIONS

NATIONAL CLIMATE PROGRAM

SEC. 301. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce to enable the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to carry out its study of natural and man-induced climate processes under law, $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1986. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall be used to fund those duties relating to climate information services specified by the National Climate Program Act (15 U.S.C. 2901 et seq.), and any other law involving such duties.

WEATHER MODIFICATION REPORTING ACT

SEC. 302. Section 6 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide for the reporting of weather modification activities to the Federal Government", approved December 18, 1971 (15 U.S.C. 330e) is amended—

(1) by striking "and"; and

(2) by striking all after "1981," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and $100,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, to carry out the provisions of this Act.".

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS

WEATHER SERVICE OFFICES

SEC. 401. (a) No weather service office or weather service forecast office of the National Weather Service shall be closed or consolidated until the Secretary of Commerce establishes appropriate standards, principles, and procedures (including formal hearings, comment periods, public notice, and other appropriate means of presenting evidence, views, and opinions) relating to any proposed closure or consolidation of such an office.

(b) The Secretary, in deciding whether to carry out such a closing or consolidation, shall take fully into account any views expressed by persons served by any affected office, and shall consider specifically—

(1) the effect of such closing or consolidation on the community served by such office;

(2) the economic savings to the Federal Government resulting from such closing or consolidation; and

(3) such other factors as the National Weather Service determines are appropriate.

(c) Any decision of the Secretary to carry out such a closing or consolidation shall be in writing and shall set forth the findings of the Secretary with respect to the matters set forth in subsection (b) of this section, together with a statement of the reasons for such findings and of the basis on which such decision was made. Any such decision shall be made available to persons served by the affected office.

(d) The Secretary shall take no action to carry out such a closing or consolidation until 60 days after the Secretary's decision is made available to persons served by the affected office, as required by subsection (c) of this section.

AWARDING OF CONTRACTS

SEC. 402. No funds authorized by this Act may be used either to issue a request for proposals, or (in those cases for which a request for proposals has been issued before the date of enactment of this Act) to award any contract, for the performance of any function or activity performed by any employee of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, unless—

(1) the Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration has transmitted, in writing, to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate, and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and Committee on Science and Technology of the House of Representatives, a complete statement (including relevant findings and studies) concerning the proposed issuance or award and the reasons for such issuance or awards; and

(2) a period of 30 days on which either the Senate or the House of Representatives is in session has expired after the date upon which such a statement is transmitted.●

By Mr. WEICKER (for himself and Mr. KENNEDY):

S. 1104. A bill to revise the provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to health planning; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HEALTH PLANNING AND RESOURCE ALLOCATION ACT

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the cost of health care in this country continues as a major issue. Over the past several years there has been a sharp increase in the numbers of people and organizations that are expressing significant concern about the seemingly uncontrollable upward spiral of these costs.

Congress has responded in several ways: Requiring a new prospective payment system for Medicare and intensifying efforts to assess technology and practice patterns, for example.

However, a system of health planning is an essential piece of the cost-controlling mechanism. It also is good public policy from the standpoint of continuing access to quality health care services. Last year I offered health planning legislation citing the importance of planning in controlling the rapid increase in health care costs, and I outlined the dangers of leaving the Nation without this essential element of intelligent health care cost controls.

This legislation will allow the States, who have become much more sophisticated about the problems of health care delivery, more flexibility in creating State planning mechanisms. While there is no requirement that a State have local planning organizations, funding is available for those locals wishing to continue to participate in the planning process.

By centralizing all planning functions in one designated State agency, this legislation further enhances the ability of Governors to create health planning programs designed to meet the individual needs of the various States.

In addition, a modest attempt is made in this legislation to encourage the strengthening of market forces within the health care system. Advisory councils, dominated by employers and other purchasers who actually pay the major portion of the health care bill, are established. These councils will insure that those who have a vested interest in controlling costs have a say in the way it is done.

Matching grant funds are also incorporated as a further incentive for local planning organizations to involve major purchasers of health care in the planning process.

Mr. President, in the present regulatory climate where each major payer of health services, including the Federal and State governments, is aggressively pursuing cost control, it is essential that the distribution of health services not become a function of formula regulation. The explosion in total revenues spent for health care has not resulted in equal availability. Medically underserved areas continue to exist in our cities and rural communities.

We have all witnessed the effects of this maldistribution, be it increased infant mortality in a segment of our society, or the misery of living with an ailment for which there is no available, or affordable, cure.

Health planning has two major purposes: To prevent unnecessary and duplicative expansion of health services and facilities and to encourage the availability of these services and facilities in areas lacking them. Thoughtful prospective planning based on need, coupled with certificate of need regulation, are the essential means to these ends. One without the other will not succeed.

Likewise, linking planning and the regulatory authority necessary to implement it in a single agency assures that neither function is impotent. The work of health planners must be the basis for certificate of need decisions and certificate of need decisions must be grounded in solid planning.

Mr. President, we are presently spending almost 12 percent of our gross national product on health care while millions of Americans are still medically underserved. Health planning is one of the necessary tools to ensure that this expenditure is made most wisely and for the benefit of all our citizens.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure.●

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague, Senator WEICKER, in introducing a bill to reauthorize the health planning program.

This bill makes several changes to improve the program, including a more flexible and less detailed specification of the characteristics of local health planning agencies; establishment of higher, more realistic thresholds for certificate of need review; a closer relationship between State and local planning agencies; and a new matching requirement to assure that local agencies secure broad community support.

The need for health planning is great. While establishment of Medicare prospective payment has introduced some constraints on the increase in inpatient hospital costs, inflationary pressures in health remain strong. As long as investment in health facilities and major medical equipment remain unconstrained, it will be difficult for reimbursement controls alone—particularly those applying to only one payor and one segment of the health care industry—to permanently control health care cost inflation. Moreover, the lack of constraints on capital investment means continued unnecessary duplication of facilities and waste of resources that could better be used in improvement of health services.

The new Medicare Prospective Payment System and enhanced competition in the health care market make the necessity for health planning greater than ever in some respects. Market forces can make an important contribution to restraining health care costs, but they cannot guarantee a health system that is responsive to health care needs. Health planning can make a vital contribution to providing the data base and public input necessary to shape a health care system that is truly responsive to local and national needs and desires.

Reauthorization of health planning is supported by a broad coalition of health care purchasers, consumers, health care policy analysts, and health care providers, including the American Health Planning Association, the AFL-CIO, the National Association of Counties, the Washington Business Group on Health, American Medical Peer Review Organization, American Nurses Association, Catholic Health Association, Group Health Association of America, National Association of Rehabilitation Facilities, Health Insurance Association of America, Blue Cross/Blue Shield Association, American Public Health Association, Kaiser Health Plan, and the American College of Physicians.

I hope that it will be possible to move this bill promptly to passage so that this important program can be put on a stable basis.●

S. 1105. A bill entitled the "Federal Contractor Employees Flextime Act;" to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FEDERAL CONTRACTOR EMPLOYEES FLEXTIME ACT

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, not often does Congress have the opportunity to enact legislation that will save taxpayers at least $1 billion in this decade and at the same time increase industry's productivity, improve employee morale, reduce labor costs, save energy, and modernize the workplace. Today I am introducing reform legislation which will accomplish all this and more. This legislation reforms the Walsh-Healey Act to allow Federal contractors in the private sector to work flextime hours.

Under current law, Federal agencies allow Federal employees to work flextime work schedules. This legislation was enacted by Congress 3 years ago but Congress failed to allow the same benefits to Federal contractors in the private sector. In essence, Federal contractors in the private sector must pay their employees overtime pay for hours worked after an 8-hour workday. This prevents employers and employees from benefiting from flexible work schedules such as 4 days a week, 10 hours a day workweek.

The legislation I am introducing today will create permanent statutory authority for alternative work schedules for Federal contractors in the private sector. The Senate passed this exact legislation once before but it was dropped in conference. It is time that we provide these Federal contractors in the private sector the same benefits other Government contractors and other workers in the private sector receive.

A year ago the Grace Commission reported that the current Walsh-Healey Act drives up Federal contract costs by reducing competition and artificially inflating labor costs. The Commission estimated that this outdated law costs the Federal Government between $673 million and $1.3 billion annually, reports the Grace Commission. The Congressional Budget Office—in a just released study—estimates that once Walsh-Healey reform is fully implemented that annual savings to the Government will exceed $550 million.

The Commission specifically recommended that the current law be amended to eliminate the now required 8-hour a day threshold from the overtime pay requirement, while retaining the 40-hour-per-week requirement.

The Commission stated that the 8-hour-per-day overtime provision in this act "is out of step with times" and serves only to increase costs to the Government for work performed by these contractors. "Changes in the composition of the work force, particularly the influx of women and working mothers, have substantially altered the needs and characteristics of the average American worker. The patterns of working the 40-hour workweek have also shifted so that flexibility has replaced tradition as the basis of work schedules."

In addition to the advantages to the Federal Government, the Grace Commission listed a number of advantages that Walsh-Healey reform would have on the private economy:

More jobs.—Experience at the corporate level with compressed workweeks has resulted in an increase in the total number of jobs. Increase in productivity, competitiveness, and the number of shifts employed translates into more jobs opportunities.

Benefits to employees.—The compressed workweek shows that employee morale and job satisfaction increases as a result of the increased flexibility of a compressed workweek. This is a result of reduced commuting costs and actual time spent computing, allowing for increased blocks of leisure time for family commitments, education opportunities, and personal fitness.

Benefits to employers.—Compressed workweeks provide benefits and more flexibility for employers including decreased overtime costs more efficient use of plant and office facilities, and increased employee productivity due to better employee morale.

Benefits to the community at large.—In addition to creating more jobs, the Commission's report stated that studies on the compressed workweek provide benefits to the community due to reduction in traffic congestion, air pollution, energy consumption, and also better service to the public as a result of increased hours of operation.

Mr. President, this legislation has one objective and one aim: To allow Federal contractors the option of alternate work schedules. The benefits of flexitime, however, go far beyond less Government interference in the private sector. There are distinct advantages for companies who have chosen to implement the alternative schedule that should be noted. In addition to the Grace Commission, numerous other studies have been conducted on the optional "compressed workweek." These studies, including those done by the Comptroller General, the Bureau of Labor Statistics (The Revised Workweek: Results of a Pilot Study of 16 firms), and the National Center for Energy Management and Power (Feasibility Study of a System of Staggered Industry Hours), point out many of the same conclusions found by the Grace Commission, such as: First, greater productivity—higher weekly output, improved use of plant equipment, and improved employee moral; second, improved working conditions—reduced employee working costs, increased job satisfaction, and ease in recruitment; and three, energy conservation—reduction in fuel costs associated with commuting, and reduction in energy usage for heating and cooling plants or offices.

One possible advantage of particular interest to me deals with the problem of air pollution. We now have evidence as a result of a study released by the Denver Regional Council of Governments in cooperation with the Denver Federal Executive Board, examining the travel habits of some 7,000 Federal employees on the compressed workweek schedule in the Denver area. The study concludes that the compressed workweek is one of the most effective transportation management actions that Denver's Federal agencies can take in addressing the concern of air pollution and traffic congestion.

It has been estimated that neither providing free transit service at peak periods for everyone in the area, nor an extensive and complicated program of carpool matching would even equal the impact on air pollution that resulted from only 7,000 employees on a compressed workweek. Imagine what could result if all employees of Federal contractors in the area, which easily number twice that of the Federal employees in the study, were allowed to shift to a 4-day workweek.

A change in the Walsh-Healey Act would not in any way affect the Fair Labor Standard Act, which governs all workers and provides that overtime premiums be paid whenever employees work more that 40 hours a week. The proposal would not impact the collective bargaining process, nor would it conflict with any of the Federal labor laws. Nothing in this amendment shall be construed to cover employees specified in the Walsh-Healey Act and the Contract Work Hours and Safety Standards Act. Finally, the bill does not mandate a compressed workweek, it only restores to American business and workers serving the Federal Government the basic freedom of choice.

Mr. President, in the past, we have heard many unions and workers testify that Government employees are eager to see the Federal Employee Flexible Work Schedules Act become permanent. The same is true for the employee in the private sector working on a Federal contract. Many private sector collective bargaining agreements across the Nation encompass the 4-day, 40-hour workweek. Many labor contracts in my own State of Colorado include provisions for a compressed workweek—and are merely waiting for Congress to update the archaic law.

In my opinion, it is only fair for Federal contractors to have the same advantages that private sector and Government employees do. If that is ever to be accomplished, we must seize the opportunity for the permanent statutory authority for alternative work schedules for Federal contractors. The Senate passed this proposal once before and it was dropped in conference. Therefore, it is necessary that we again pass this important legislation and follow it carefully through conference.●

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 1106. A bill to provide for the use and distribution of funds appropriated in satisfaction of judgments awarded to the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan in dockets numbered 57, 59, and 13E of the Indian Claims Commission and docket numbered 13F of the United States Claims Court, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

SAGINAW CHIPPEWA INDIAN TRIBE OF MICHIGAN DISTRIBUTION OF JUDGMENT FUNDS ACT

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today creates a special distribution for land judgment awards to the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe. This bill is similar to legislation that I introduced in the 98th Congress and that was reported favorably by the Select Committee on Indian Affairs last September.

In the past the Bureau of Indian Affairs has distributed land judgment awards on a descendancy and per capita basis. Yet, descendants could participate without regard to the degree of Indian blood or whether or not the descendant was an enrolled member of the tribe. There is no legal requirement that such awards be distributed in this manner. Rather, distribution is discretionary with the Bureau of Indian Affairs or the Congress (Delaware Tribal Business Committee against Weeks, 430 U.S. 73, 1977). In recent years many tribes have sought special legislation from the Congress to award judgment claims. Some of these bills restrict the judgment award to tribal members and descendants with a minimum degree of Indian blood—usually one-fourth.

According to the Michigan Agency of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, tribes in the State of Michigan will receive over $50 million in judgments during the next 2 to 4 years. These awards are compensation to tribes for instances where treaty reserved lands were taken without adequate compensation.

In January 1984, the Tribal Council of the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe voted to seek judgment fund legislation from the Congress. Rather than to dissipate the funds from dockets 59, 13E, and 13F through small, one time per capita payments, the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe is seeking to use the funds to establish an investment and economic development fund for the tribe. In cooperation with this effort, the Stewart Mott Foundation has agreed to fund a series of investment and economic development seminars for the tribe and its leadership.

Mr. President, I believe that the legislation sought by the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe will afford them the opportunity to utilize their judgment funds in a manner that will lead to greater economic and social development for all tribal members. I introduced similar legislation, S. 2823, in the 98th Congress. After a public hearing, the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs favorably reported it with the understanding that the tribe would amend its constitution to include all eligible quarter-blood Chippewas as tribal members. I am happy to report to my colleagues that even though this legislation did not pass the 98th Congress, the tribe has prepared amendments to its constitution including a provision to expand tribal membership to quarter-blood Chippewas living off the reservation.

The legislation I am introducing today is virtually identical to the bill reported out by the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs and I hope that my colleagues in the Senate will support it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1106

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE; DEFINITIONS

SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the "Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe of Michigan Distribution of Judgment Funds Act".

(b) For purposes of this Act—

(1) The term "tribe" means the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe of Michigan.

(2) The term "Tribal Council" means the Saginaw Chippewa Tribal Council.

(3) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior.

ABROGATION OF PRIOR PLAN

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding Public Law 93-134 (25 U.S.C. 1401 et seq.) or any plan prepared or regulation promulgated by the Secretary pursuant to such law—

(1) the funds appropriated in satisfaction of judgments awarded the tribe in dockets numbered 59 and 13E of the Indian Claims Commission, and

(2) the balance of any undistributed funds appropriated in satisfaction of the judgments awarded the tribe in docket numbered 57 of the Indian Claims Commission and docket numbered 13F of the United States Claims Court, and any interest or investment income accrued on the amount of such funds on or before the date of any transfer made pursuant to section 5 or 8 (less any attorneys' fees and court costs), shall be distributed and used in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

INVESTMENT FUND

SEC. 3. (a)(1) The tribe, through the Tribal Council, is hereby authorized to establish a trust fund for the benefit of the tribe which shall be known as the "Investment Fund". The principal of the Investment Fund shall consist of—

(A) the funds transferred by the Secretary to the Tribal Council pursuant to section 5(a),

(B) the amounts required to be included in principal under subsection (c) or section 8(c),

(C) such portion of the funds paid to the Tribal Council under section 8(a) as the Tribal Council may elect to add to the principal, and

(D) such other amounts of the income of the Investment Fund which the Tribal Council may elect to retain and add to the principal.

(2) The Tribal Council shall be the trustee of the Investment Fund and shall administer the Investment Fund in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(b)(1) The principal of the Investment Fund shall be used exclusively for—

(A) investments (including loans to enrolled members of the tribe), or

(B) expenditures which the Tribal Council determines are reasonably related to—

(i) economic development beneficial to the tribe or enrolled members of the tribe, or

(ii) the development of tribal resources.

(2) Under no circumstances shall any part of the principal of the Investment Fund be distributed in the form of per capita payments to the members of the tribe or used or expended for purposes other than investment or economic development projects and programs.

(c) At least 10 percent of the income earned on the Investment Fund during each of the first ten fiscal years of the Investment Fund beginning after such Investment Fund is established shall be retained in the Investment Fund and become part of the principal of the Investment Fund.

(d)(1) The Investement Fund shall be maintained as a separate book account.

(2) The books and records of the Investment Fund shall be audited at least once during each fiscal year of the Investment Fund (or before the end of the 3-month period beginning on the last day of such fiscal year) by an independent certified public accounting firm which shall prepare a report on the results of such audit. Such report shall be treated as a public document of the tribe and a copy of the report shall be available for inspection by any enrolled member of the tribe.

TRIBAL CONSTITUTION

SEC. 4. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the tribe may, without the approval of the Secretary, adopt any amendments to the constitution of the tribe which were approved by the Tribal Council on April 15, 1985, in resolution L and 0-03-85.

(b) Any amendments to the constitution of the tribe other than the amendments referred to in subsection (a) may only be adopted in accordance with the provisions of such constitution and applicable Federal law.

(c) The adoption of any amendment referred to in subsection (a) to the constitution of the tribe shall take effect when such amendment is ratified by the qualified voting members of the tribe (within the meaning of such constitution).

(d) The tribe shall submit to the Secretary a copy of any amendment to the constitution of the tribe referred to in subsection (a) within 10 days after the date on which such amendment is ratified by the qualified voting members of the tribe (within the meaning of such constitution).

TRANSFER OF FUNDS BY THE SECRETARY

SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary shall transfer the funds described in section 2 (which have not previously been transferred to the Tribal Council under section 8(a)) to the Tribal Council by not later than the date that is 60 days after the date on which the Secretary receives written notice of the adoption by the Tribal Council (in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of the tribe) of a resolution requesting the Secretary to make the transfer under this subsection if the amendments to the constitution of the tribe referred to in section 4(a) are adopted and ratified by the qualified voting members of the tribe (within the meaning of such constitution).

(b)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the approval of the Secretary for any payment or distribution from the principal or income of the Investment Fund, after the transfer of funds pursuant to subsection (a), shall not be required and the Secretary shall have no trust responsibility for the investment, supervision, administration, or expenditure of the principal or income of the Investment Fund.

(2) The Secretary may take such action as the Secretary may determine to be necessary and appropriate to enforce the requirements of this Act.

TREATMENT OF AMOUNTS PAID OR DISTRIBUTED FROM THE INVESTMENT FUND

SEC. 6. (a) No amount of any payment or distribution—

(1) from the principal or income of the Investment Fund, or

(2) of any funds transferred to the Tribal Council under section 8(a), to any payee or distributee who is an enrolled member of the tribe shall be included in the gross income of the payee or distributee for purposes of any Federal, State, or local income tax.

(b) Any payments or distributions described in subsection (a), and the availability of any amount for such payments or distributions, shall not be considered as income or resources or otherwise used as the basis for denying or reducing—

(1) any financial assistance or other benefit under the Social Security Act—

(A) to which any enrolled member of the tribe, or the household of any such members, is otherwise entitled, or

(B) for which such member or household is otherwise eligible, or

(2) any other—

(A) Federal financial assistance,

(B) Federal benefit, or

(C) benefit under any program funded in whole or in part by the Federal Government, to which such member or household is otherwise entitled or for which such member or household is otherwise eligible.

WAIVERS OF SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the tribe may execute limited waivers of the sovereign immunity of the tribe and consent to the civil jurisdiction of the courts of the State of Michigan with regard to the use as security for indebtedness of—

(1) any amount of income of the Investment Fund which is not retained and added to the principal of the Investment Fund pursuant to subsection (a)(1) (D) or (c) of section 3,

(2) a portion of the principal of the Investment Fund equal to the total amount, if any, of the funds transfered to the Tribal Council under section 8(a) that are added to the principal of the Investment Fund,

(3) any funds transferred to the Tribal Council under section 8(a) that are not added to the principal of the Investment Fund and any interest or investment income accrued on such funds, or

(4) any asset acquired by the use of the income described in paragraph (1), or of the funds described in paragraph (3), which is not held in trust by the Secretary for the benefit of the tribe, if such waivers of sovereign immunity do not exceed individually or collectively the total amount or value of such security and such waivers specifically identify and limit the parties who have been granted the authority to bring an action against the tribe pursuant to such waiver.

OPTIONAL USE OF DOCKET 57 FUNDS

SEC. 8. (a) The Secretary shall transfer to the Tribal Council all or any portion of the undistributed funds appropriated in satisfaction of the judgment awarded the tribe in docket 57 of the Indian Claims Commission (including all interest and investment income accrued on such funds) which the tribe requests the Secretary to transfer under this subsection. Such transfer shall be made by no later than the date that is 60 days after the date on which the Secretary receives written notice of the adoption of a resolution by the Tribal Council (in accordance with the Constitution and bylaws of the tribe) requesting a transfer of funds under this subsection.

(b) Any funds transferred to the Tribal Council under subsection (a) shall be subject to the same accounting and auditing requirements applicable to the Investment Fund under section 3(d).

(c) At least 10 percent of the interest or investment income, if any, that accrues during each year of the 10-year period beginning on the date any transfer is made under subsection (a) on any funds held by, or on behalf of, the tribe which were transferred to the Tribal Council under subsection (a) shall be transferred to the Investment Fund and became part of the principal of the Investment Fund.●

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator RIEGLE today as a cosponsor of legislation to provide for the distribution of funds awarded to the Saginaw, Swan Creek, and Black River Bands of the Chippewa Indians under dockets 59, 13E, and 13F. Pursuant to a 1977 distribution plan, $16.7 million in funds awarded to the Chippewa Indians from docket No. 57—one of the four original dockets—has already been distributed on a per capita basis to descendants and to members of the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe. Of the total $16.7 million award, only $723,605 was made available to the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe for tribal program purposes.

The thrust of this legislation is to allow for a distribution plan which will establish a principal investment fund consisting of the remaining funds, totaling approximately $7.3 million. The fund will be held in trust by the tribal counsel for the benefit of the tribe and is to be used exclusively for investments or economic development.

Mr. President, Senator RIEGLE and I introduced similar legislation during the 98th Congress. After hearings on the bill, the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs reported it favorably with important amendments designed to ensure that nonmember descendants of the tribe will have an opportunity to benefit from the programs made possible as a result of the trust. The Saginaw Chippewa Tribe has agreed to adopt a constitutional amendment which will allow persons meeting the blood quantum requirement for tribal membership to become enrolled members of the tribe regardless of whether they are residents of the tribe's reservation.

Mr. President, this bill is needed in order to allow the tribal counsel to use the remaining docket funds for economic development programs which will address serious problems facing the tribe, such as unemployment and insufficient housing. I am hopeful that the bill will promptly be enacted by the Congress.●

By Mr. NUNN:

S. 1107. A bill to authorize the Society of the Third Infantry Division to erect a memorial in the District of Columbia or its environs; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

THIRD INFANTRY DIVISION MEMORIAL

● Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, today we mark and celebrate the 40th anniversary of V-E Day. I cannot think of a more fitting occasion to offer this bill which would allow the Society of the Third Infantry Division to erect a monument to honor the members of the division.

The 3d Infantry Division was organized on November 21, 1917, and arrived in France in April 1918. In July of that year on the Marne River the division won its nickname, "Rock of the Marne," by holding a 12-kilometer line against heavy German attacks. During World War I the division won six battle streamers.

Mr. President, in May 1942, the division entered World War II. The division was awarded the Presidential Unit Citation and the French Croix de Guerre with Palm for its actions clearing the Colmar Pocket. In all, the division is credited with 10 campaigns for World War II service.

The "Rock of the Marne" arrived in Korea in November 1950, was engaged in eight more campaigns, and was awarded two Republic of Korea Presidential Unit citations.

Mr. President, the division was reorganized as mechanized infantry in 1963 and is now stationed in Wuerzburg, West Germany, where it serves as a part of the frontline shield of NATO.

This bill gives the Society of the Third Infantry Division the necessary congressional approval to begin the procedure for erecting a memorial in the District of Columbia or its environs. The memorial will be erected at no cost to the Federal Government, and the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the National Commission of Fine Arts and the National Capital Planning Commission, will select a suitable site and approve the design and plans for such a memorial.

Mr. President, memorials honoring the 1st and 2d Infantry Divisions have for some time existed in the District of Columbia, and I take pride in offering this measure calling for a 3d Infantry Division Memorial honoring this very deserving unit.

I would like to thank Brig. Gen. Eugene Phillips, USA-retired, for his assistance in providing me with information on the "Rock of the Marne" division and for his efforts on behalf of the society.●

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. D'AMATO):

S. 1108. A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide for the temporary admission to the United States of the operators of motor common carriers of passengers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TEMPORARY ADMISSION TO THE UNITED STATES OF OPERATORS OF MOTOR COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which will facilitate trade and commerce between the United States and Canada by making it possible for busdrivers from Canada to enter the United States on appropriate visas. In past years, there has been a problem obtaining visas for Canadian citizens who are employed by Greyhound Bus Corp., and who drive on routes which service points in both Canada and the United States.

First one solution and then another have been tried to extend the interpretation of current visa categories to include these busdrivers. However, a strict reading of the immigration law indicates there is no appropriate visa classification for busdrivers who are transporting passengers across international boundaries on regularly scheduled routes. This bill would amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to allow busdrivers to come under the same provision of the immigration law as commercial airline pilots and ship captains and crew.

Without this legislation the Greyhound Corp. will be forced to suspend operation of its service between Canada and parts of Northeastern United States, including New York and Vermont, because it will no longer be able to hire Canadian busdrivers. Not only will Greyhound not be able to use Canadian drivers on these routes, but the Canadian Government will no longer permit American drivers to drive these routes in Canada. This decision of the Canadian Government was taken recently when it became clear that no administrative remedy was possible which would enable the Canadian busdrivers to obtain the necessary visas. Therefore, not only will passengers suffer from lack of bus service in the area, but American busdrivers will lose jobs as service is cut back. On the other hand, if Canadian busdrivers can obtain the necessary visas, they would in no way deprive the resident labor force of employment opportunities, wages or working conditions since American-based employees would continue to enjoy privileges of working into Canada.

I had hoped that this legislation, which is offered as a bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act, could be included in any immigration reform package which may be introduced in the Senate at a later date. However, the urgency of this matter will not allow any delay in taking action to remedy the situation. I hope the Senate will act quickly to approve this legislation so that we can avoid disruption of commercial bus service between Canada and the United States. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1108

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 101(a)(10) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(10)) is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "or, for the purposes of paragraph (15)(D) of this section and sections 245, 252, and 257, a person serving as an operator of a motor common carrier of passengers".

(b) Section 101(a)(15)(D) of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(15)(D)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(i)" after "as such"; and

(2) by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof the following: ", or (ii) as an operator of a motor common carrier of passengers engaged in regular route transport across an international boundary who intends (I) to travel to his destination in the United States with intermittent stops as prescribed by the schedule established by the carrier, (II) to remain in the United States temporarily and solely in pursuit of his employment as an operator of such a carrier, and (III) to depart from the United States with the carrier on which he arrived or some other motor common carrier of passengers".

(c)(1) Section 252 of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1282) is amended by inserting "or stay" after "to land" each place it appears.

(2) Section 252 of such Act is further amended—

(A) in subsection (a)(1), by inserting after "port" the folliwing: "and the period of time during which the motor common carrier of passengers remains in the United States in accordance with the schedule established by the carrier"; and

(b) in subsection (a)(2) and in subsection (b), by striking out "or aircraft" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof ", aircraft, or motor common carrier".

(d) Section 257 of such Act (8 U.S.C. 1287) is amended by striking out "or aircraft" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof ", aircraft, or motor common carrier".

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joining my good friend Senator DECONCINI today in introducing a bill that will end a needless threat to continued bus service between the United States and Canada.

Because of the unfortunate and unintended application of our immigration laws, Canadian busdrivers serving the United States from points originating in Canada will no longer be granted visas.

In fact their status has been under a cloud for many years, and at present they are permitted to work on emergency temporary parole status only, and that status is not going to be continued by the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

The implications of this termination for Vermont are serious. Vermont Transit, which is affiliated with the Greyhound Lines, has served Vermont very well, and Vermonters have come to count on it, both for long-distance service to Montreal, Boston, and New York, but for point-to-point service within Vermont as well.

Indirectly, Vermont Transit benefits small business throughout the State. It serves commuters, vacationers, and shoppers, just to name some of its users. It would be sad if that traffic were either eliminated or shifted to some less convenient mode of transportation.

Without the present drivers it appears clear that Vermont Transit will not continue its present routes and schedules in Vermont and other States in a similar situation.

It is clear to me that there is no economic or policy reason for this impending threat to Vermont Transit and other Greyhound routes. Our immigration laws permit airline pilots to come and go without a hassle, and there is no reason why the same principles should not apply to the drivers of common carrier buses.

Our bill would do just that—apply the rules governing airline pilots to these busdrivers.

It is simple. It will not take jobs from Americans. It is supported by the union representing the drivers as well as the Greyhound lines. It is supported by business leaders on both sides of the border.

Mr. President, we should continue to promote mass transit wherever we can, and especially successful mass transit efforts in the private sector.

Letting Greyhound and Vermont Transit suffer the loss of continued full service with Canada is allowing us to hurt ourselves—and for no good reason.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill and to aid us in its swift passage. Because of the precarious status of the drivers, time is of the essence.

This is good and simple legislation, and I thank my colleagues in advance for their swift attention to its passage.

By Mr. MATSUNAGA (for himself and Mr. INOUYE):

S. 1109. A bill to authorize the Department of Energy to initiate a cooperative research program in ocean energy and technology with the Pacific International Center for High Technology Research to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

COOPERATIVE RESEARCH PROGRAM IN OCEAN ENERGY AND TECHNOLOGY

● Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, today I am introducing with my colleague from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], as co-sponsor a bill, S. 1109, to authorize the Department of Energy to initiate a cooperative research program in ocean energy and technology with the Pacific International Center for High Technology Research in Hawaii.

This bill would empower the Secretary of Energy to establish a jointly funded cooperative research program with this Hawaii State-sponsored center to pursue the development of a 200-kilowatt integrated open cycle ocean thermal energy conversion experimental project. Such a project, which is expected to draw international partners, will demonstrate an energy technology with enormous promise for island economies, not only in terms of an indigenous power source but in prospects for alternative water supplies and tropical aquaculture as well.

The initial authorization for the program would be for $500,000 with a total authorization over 5 years of $10 million, to be matched dollar for dollar by the State of Hawaii, the private sector, and other possible partners. Any funds not used in any particular fiscal year may be carried over for expenditure to subsequent fiscal years.

Mr. President, this measure supports critical technological experimentation. The oceans of the Earth occupy 70 percent of its surface and are its largest natural resource. These oceans have the potential to meet society's needs for water, food, energy, and many minerals for centuries into the future. Diverse research activities have developed a technology base which brings that potential closer to reality.

The extraction, conversion, and utilization of ocean resources is an idea which is both needed and timely. It is needed because society is living near the edge of crisis in food, potable water, and environmentally acceptable production of energy. It is timely because research during the past 20 to 30 years has provided the basis for developing systems which can meet all of these needs in a synergistic fashion. These systems may be most relevant in the short term to island communities in tropic and semitropic areas where the need and the potential for success are the greatest.

The Pacific Ocean alone covers more of the Earth's surface than all the land areas of the world and touches the boundaries of two-thirds of its population. Island communities are the norm in the Pacific, and Hawaii, located at the center, is an ideal site for a natural laboratory for the study of ocean resources.

Among such resources is energy, Mr. President. Ocean temperature differences are a potential source of energy, and ocean thermal energy conversion [OTEC] has been proposed as a new and renewable source of electric power for the United States and many developing nations of the Third World. Estimates of OTEC's contribution to future U.S. mainland and island energy supply are forecast as ranging from a practically achievable 3,000 to 10,000 megawatts of electrical capacity or energy product equivalent by the year 2000 and from 20,000 to 40,000 megawatts of electrical capacity/energy product equivalent by 2025. The overall market potential for export sale of OTEC technology internationally in more than 60 developing nations and U.S. territories is represented by the projected addition of more than 500,000 megawatts of new baseload electric power-generating facilities for the period 1990–2010.

The Department of Energy has shown in its research that an ocean thermal energy conversion system operating in an open cycle mode has the potential to produce electrical power economically in plant sizes which are small enough to be useful for island communities. These plants can produce also, as byproducts to the power generation, potable water, and nutrient-rich cold seawater which can support community drinking water and aquaculture requirements. This ocean resource utilization system can supply human needs with only benign impacts on the island environment and quality of life.

Open cycle OTEC is a new technology which has the potential to be the basis for an ocean resources extraction and conversion system which could contribute strongly to the future industrial and economic growth of the Pacific. The development of an ocean robot will help in the installation and maintenance of the cold and warm water OTEC pipes and should be pursued also. Since the cold water brought up from depths of 2,000 feet contains nutrients in a sterile environment, marine biotechnology methods could easily be applied to determine ways of producing food crops by using this resource.

Mr. President, the purpose of the legislation I am introducing is to facilitate technology transfer from the ongoing Department of Energy program in open cycle OTEC—a program built upon the work of the mini-OTEC and OTEC-I projects undertaken in Hawaii—to the Pacific Island user community. This project would be directed at applying the data and design methods developed in the DOE program to development of a 200 kilowatt integrated open cycle OTEC experimental system at the Natural Energy Laboratory of Hawaii, which has been designated by the Department as the centerpiece of ocean energy research and development for the U.S. Supplemental programs should involve ocean robotics, where Japan is the world leader, and marine biotechnology projects to interface with the OTEC pilot plant.

The Pacific International Center for High Technology Research [PICHTR], as it has come to be known, was established by the Hawaii State Legislature on the recommendation of the State administration and myself in order to promote educational, scientific, technological, and literary pursuits in high technology. Through the center, Hawaii can serve as a high technology catalyst for the Pacific islands and a bridge between Asian and Pacific Island nations and the United States. The strategic geographical location of Hawaii and the human resources available at the University of Hawaii are two major reasons for establishing the center in my home State; similarly, these conditions provide the impetus for the involvement of the nations of Asia and the Pacific in the center's programs and activities.

The need for research, development, education, and training in high technology has been expressed by Pacific island heads of government, and the commitment to these developing countries toward meeting this need has been emphasized by Hawaii's governmental and educational leaders.

The merits of this bill are many and I would hope my colleagues will join me in its sponsorship so that it may be given early favorable consideration by Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill S. 1109 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1109

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Energy shall establish a jointly funded cooperative research program in ocean energy and technology with the Pacific International Center for High Technology Research in Hawaii (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Center").

SEC. 2. The purpose of the program shall be to apply data and design methods developed by the Department of Energy and other international research organizations to the development of a 200 kilowatt integrated open cycle OTEC experimental system at the Natural Energy Laboratory of Hawaii.

SEC. 3. (a) Subject to the provisions of subsections (b) and (c), there are authorized to be appropriated as the Federal share of the research program authorized by this Act—

(1) $500,000 for fiscal year 1986;
(2) $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1987;
(3) $3,500,000 for fiscal year 1988;
(4) $3,000,000 for fiscal year 1989; and
(5) $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1990.

(b) For each fiscal year, the Center shall be entitled to Federal funds up to the limits authorized in subsection (a) in an amount equal to the total amount provided for such fiscal year by the State of Hawaii, the private sector, and other partners.

(c) Any funds not used in any particular fiscal year may be carried over for expenditure to subsequent fiscal years.●

By Mr. HOLLINGS:

S. 1110. A bill to provide for the award of grants to the Washington Metropolitan Airports for certain capital expenditures; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN AIRPORTS IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation that would authorize $250 million for capital improvements at the two airports that serve as gateways to our Nation's Capital—Washington National and Washington Dulles International Airports. These two airports, the 13th and 30th largest in the Nation, are in need of substantial rehabilitation and development. This bill would take the necessary steps to provide money for ensuring their continued viability.

I think every Member of Congress will agree that both National and Dulles Airports play enormously important roles in ensuring adequate and efficient access to the Nation's seat of Government. Millions of people come to Washington, DC, each year and use these facilities. By authorizing these moneys, which are available now in a trust fund dedicated for expenditures on airport and airways improvement, we will be improving the physical infrastructure at the airports, which will help attract improved airline service.

This bill is designed to authorize funds to National and Dulles on a one-time basis. It would not be a continuing requirement, but would allow the two airports to make the capital improvements that are needed for long-term passenger and air-cargo service.

Understanding the funding mechanisms used for National and Dulles will clarify why this legislation is needed. The Washington Metropolitan Airports are owned and operated by the Federal Aviation Administration. Money is annually requested by the President and appropriated from the general revenue fund by Congress for operations and maintenance and capital development at the two airports. In fiscal year 1985, this amount totaled $49 million. All moneys appropriated for National and Dulles, however, are recovered through airline fees and concessionaire contracts and reimbursed, with an occasional surplus, to the Federal Treasury. These airports, therefore, do not increase the size of the Federal deficit.

Unlike other public airports, neither National nor Dulles are eligible for Airport Improvement Program [AIP] moneys, which are generated by aviation user fees and deposited into the airport and airways trust fund. This prohibition has meant that the President must annually request appropriations. Given our current budgetary problems, this has led to increased neglect and avoidance of needed capital improvement.

What Member of the Congress does not know either firsthand or from constituents the problems of National Airport? Each of us has experienced the chaotic road system and congested terminals there. The Metrorail system is blocks away from the nearest terminal and parking is always difficult. Estimates for making improvements run several hundreds of millions of dollars. However, the FAA has said that $100 million will make significant progress toward rehabilitating National, and I have used this mark for my bill.

Dulles, which until very recently was extremely underutilized, has experienced a strong surge of airline service. For example, Pan Am recently announced its intentions to make Dulles its newest hub for international service. This growth must be accommodated, in part to relieve the burden on National Airport. The airlines agree that a new midfield terminal is needed at Dulles to meet this increased demand. The midfield terminal, which is being considered to service up to 24 aircraft at a time, is estimated to cost upward of $150 million.

Mr. President, any delay in making these improvements will significantly hinder our objective of improved airline service for this region. It is with this in mind that I introduce this bill to authorize $250 million in AIP moneys.

For its part, the Department of Transportation has proposed legislation that would transfer the Metropolitan Washington airports to a local airport authority, ending Federal control and cutting the bonds that allow congressional oversight of these value assets.

DOT's proposal is actually aimed at getting the Secretary of Transportation out of the obligation of administering these airports. It was not prepared and transmitted with the goal of improving the physical condition of National and Dulles Airports. Rather, Secretary Dole is simply seeking a way to avoid future conflicts with the Congress over how these airports, in particular National Airport, are operated.

This approach is flawed, as is the logic behind it. Clearly, if there are problems that need addressing at these airports, let's deal with them directly. We should take the necessary steps to repair and develop these airports so that they continue to serve the needs of the region. We need not hand them over to State and local politicians simply because there are problems that DOT does not wish to confront.

There are also specific concerns I have with the DOT bill. The first is the undervalued price that the Federal Government would be asking for these airports. The DOT bill proposes that the local airport authority pay the Federal Government a mere $46 million.

This hardly seems to be even close to the real value of the property and equipment at either National or Dulles. Secretary Dole admits this, telling us that the $46 million only represents the hypothetical debt that the Metropolitan Washington airports have not yet repaid to the Treasury from past appropriations. When compared to the $342-million price tag put on by the Grace Commission, $46 million hardly seems like a fair amount for the land, terminals, runways, and other assets that would go to the new airport authority.

In place of direct appropriations for operational and capital expenses at the Metropolitan Washington airports, which are repaid in their entirety to the U.S. Treasury, DOT proposes to allow the airporissue tax-exempt revenue bonds. The argument used is that every other airport in the country uses these bonds to fund capital development.

Two wrongs do not make a right. In this case, allowing the issuance of additional tax-exempt bonds only increases the amount of backdoor spending that we must account for in the Federal budget. Projects funded by tax-exempt bonds are subsidized by the Federal Government through foregone revenues. And we in the Congress have no review whatsoever for this type of tax expenditure. Why should we agree to indirectly subsidize these airports through such tax expenditures when current law provides for an open review of the annual budget request for the Metropolitan Washington airports? And we cannot forget that these two airports are now repaying the Federal Government in full for the appropriations they receive.

Finally, Mr. President, we cannot ignore the fact that because Washington is the Nation's Capital and center for the greatest Nation in the world—it's unique. It must be accessible to the thousands of people who regularly come here from all over the Nation and the world. The airports that serve the seat of Government and the metropolitan region of nearly 4 million residents should not be left to the whims of the State government of Virginia or the State government of Maryland, or the State government of any State. That's a job for the National Congress.

The record of operation of the airports is clear and convincing. The Metropolitan Washington airports have an admirable record of successful administration. The need at hand is not to shift administration to other governmental entities, the challenge at hand and ahead is to meet the need for expansion and updating of the airports. We must not shunt aside the real and pressing needs of air transportation for this important region and think that by shifting responsibility to Richmond or Annapolis that we will somehow meet those needs. That burden is one for the Federal Government, from a Federal perspective, to bear and will be met by the legislation I introduce today which will authorize AIP moneys for the Washington Metropolitan airports.

This is not a stopgap measure. It is an attempt to resolve the very real problems at National and Dulles Airports. My legislation would ensure the development of facilities the airlines must have to continue growing at Dulles, and improve the flow of the nearly 15 million people a year who move through National.

I believe that with the legislation I am introducing today, we can resolve many of the problems at both National and Dulles International Airports. It provides a direct, open course toward assuring adequate airline service to the Washington metropolitan region.

Mr. President, I ask that this bill be printed in RECORD and I urge my colleagues to support it.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1110

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Transportation shall make grants to the Washington Metropolitan Airports during fiscal year 1986 in a total amount of $250,000,000, for the purposes specified in subsection (b) of this section. Funds for such grants shall be derived from the Airport and Airway Trust Fund established by section 9502 of title 26, United States Code. Such funds shall remain available until expended.

(b) Grants made under subsection (a) of this section shall be used for (1) development of a mid-field terminal at the Washington Dulles International Airport, and (2) improvements at the Washington National Airport, including a new road system, an improved connection to the Washington, District of Columbia metrorail system, additional parking, and additional terminal space.

(c) Funds made available by this Act are in addition to any grant made during fiscal year 1986 under section 505(a) of the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-248; 96 Stat. 676).

(d) As used in this Act, the term "Washington Metropolitan Airports" means the Washington National Airport and the Washington Dulles International Airport.

By Mr. CHILES (for himself and Mrs. HAWKINS):

S. 1111. A bill to establish equal and equitable classification and duty rates for certain imported citrus products; to the Committee on Finance.

CLASSIFICATION AND DUTY RATES FOR CERTAIN IMPORTED CITRUS PRODUCTS

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, it's a pleasure to join my colleague from Florida in introducing a bill of interest to Florida's citrus industry. This legislation seeks to prevent a possible situation regarding importation of blended, reconstituted grapefruit juice products.

We have a situation now where processors could hit upon a loophole in the tariff schedules of the United States in order to receive more favorable tariff treatment for blended, reconstituted products. The problem is that imports of highly concentrated grapefruit juices could be brought into U.S. foreign trade zones for processing and upon their entrance into U.S. Customs territory be dutiable at 20 cents per gallon, rather than the 35 cents per gallon that is applicable to imported concentrates. This situation has not yet occurred for grapefruit, but has already been a considerable problem for orange juice. In fact, we recently resolved the orange juice situation with similar legislation.

Why is this situation of concern? It is of concern because the sale of reconstituted product which is subject to considerably lower duty, has a severe price-depressing effect on U.S. production. Since citrus processing plants can handle either orange of grapefruit juice, we need to close the loophole for grapefruit juice so as to not encourage a shift in importation to this product. In short, little would be gained from closing the orange juice loophole without also closing the grapefruit loophole.

The bill Senator HAWKINS and I are offering today would correct the anomalous Customs treatment of the importation of grapefruit juice at the 20 cents per gallon rate. It would state the intention of Congress that this lower rate of duty be applied only to fresh, natural grapefruit juice, not concentrated grapefruit juice products or their derivatives. It would maintain the tariff schedules for concentrates and their derivatives at the 35 cents per gallon rate of duty.

This bill would specifically delineate grapefruit juice in our tariff schedule and would create a separate classification for unconcentrated grapefruit juice. It would not include in this classification juice made from concentrated products with a degree of concentration of 1.5 or greater. Juice with a concentration greater than 1.5 would be classified as "other" as would be imports of concentrated grapefruit juice.

This proposal would not affect the classification and duty status of any other fruit juice classified under part 12 and subpart A.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 84

At the request of Mr. INOUYE, the names of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] were added as cosponsors of S. 84, a bill to incorporate the Pearl Harbor Survivors Association.

S. 89

At the request of Mr. INOUYE, the name of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] was added as a cosponsor of S. 89, a bill to recognize the organization known as the National Academies of Practice.

S. 274

At the request of Mr. DENTON, the name of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. TRIBLE] was added as a cosponsor of S. 274, a bill to provide for the national security by allowing access to certain Federal criminal history records.

S. 320

At the request of Mr. DENTON, the name of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HECHT] was added as a cosponsor of S. 320, a bill to assure the first amendment rights of all citizens by establishing a uniform Federal policy prohibiting taxpayer financing of private political advocacy.

S. 431

At the request of Mr. WEICKER, the name of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ] was added as a cosponsor of S. 431, a bill to restore the broad scope of coverage and to clarify the application of title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, and title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

S. 729

At the request of Mr. DURENBERGER, the name of the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] was added as a cosponsor of S. 729, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make permanent the rules relating to imputed interest and assumption of loans, and for other purposes.

S. 778

At the request of Mr. GLENN, the name of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] was added as a cosponsor of S. 778, a bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to allow medicare coverage for home health services provided on a daily basis.

At the request of Mr. HEINZ, the name of the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] was added as a cosponsor of S. 778, supra.

S. 885

At the request of Mr. KERRY, the name of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN] was added as a cosponsor of S. 885 to establish a moratorium during the fiscal years 1985 and 1986 on the testing of anti-satellite weapons against objects in space.

S. 887

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the name of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] was added as a cosponsor of S. 887, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to extend the deduction for expenses incurred in connection with the elimination of architectural and transportation barriers for the handicapped and elderly.

S. 983

At the request of Mr. MCCLURE, the names of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] were added as cosponsors of S. 983, a bill to provide for limited extension of alternative means of providing assistance under the school lunch program and to provide for national commodity processing programs.

S. 1007

At the request of Mr. BOSCHWITZ, the name of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was added as a cosponsor of S. 1007, a bill to to amend title 38, United States Code, to direct the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to develop and carry out a pilot program to determine the most cost-effective methods of acquiring medical facilities to meet the needs of the Veterans' Administration and otherwise to promote additional health care for eligible veterans, and for other purposes.

S. 1033

At the request of Mr. KERRY, the name of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN] was added as a sponsor of S. 1033, a bill to amend the Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act of 1983 to establish a veterans' career development and training program; to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish a veterans' computerized job bank program, to enhance readjustment appointments of veterans to positions of employment in the Federal Government, and for other purposes.

S. 1047

At the request of Mr. CHILES, the name of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] was added as a cosponsor of S. 1047, a bill to reform the laws relating to former Presidents.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 40

At the request of Mr. LUGAR, the name of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 40, a joint resolution to designate the month of October 1985 as "National Down's Syndrome Month."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 73

At the request of Mr. GRASSLEY, the name of the Senator from Texas [Mr. GRAMM] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 73, a joint resolution to designate the week of September 15, 1985, through September 21, 1985, as "National Independent Free Papers Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 117

At the request of Mr. LEVIN, the names of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 117, a joint resolution designating the week beginning September 22, 1985, as "National Adult Day Care Center Week."

SENATE RESOLUTION 130

At the request of Mr. WALLOP, the name of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 130, a resolution relative to the Sport Fish Restoration Trust Fund.

SENATE RESOLUTION 154

At the request of Mr. LAUTENBERG, the names of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD] were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 154, a resolution to pay tribute to the American Veterans of World War II on the 40th anniversary of V-E Day.

SENATE RESOLUTION 158—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED AUTHORIZING THE PRINTING OF BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. LUGAR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following original resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. RES. 158

Resolved. That a compilation of materials entitled "Background Information on the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate" (sixth revised edition), shall be printed as a Senate document, and that there shall be printed one thousand five hundred additional copies of such document for the use of that committee.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET

KERRY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 61

Mr. KERRY (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. BYRD, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. RIEGLE) proposed an amendment to amendment No. 43 proposed by Mr. DOLE and Mr. DOMENICI to the motion to recommit with instructions the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the fiscal year 1985; as follows:

At the end of the pending amendment, add the following: It is the sense of the Congress that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that the Finance Committee will develop legislation to reduce the tax enforcement gap, estimated by the IRS at $92 billion in FY 1986. It is further assumed that such legislation should provide for increased and improved enforcement and collection, through audits, examinations, and other steps designed to identify and eliminate tax cheating and increase revenue collections from individuals and corporations currently evading federal taxes, and that the legislation should include steps designed to increase voluntary compliance with tax laws and that such steps may include increased staff for taxpayer assistance, speedier processing of returns, and provision of public information designed to build public trust and understanding of IRS enforcement efforts and that such legislation should also provide that the resources of the IRS shall be increased to accomplish full enforcement of U.S. tax laws, increasing voluntary compliance until such time as further marginal spending on IRS resources does not substantially increase tax yields and that such legislation is fully compatible with tax simplification, including but not limited to reductions in income tax rates or the deficit.

MATTINGLY AMENDMENT NO. 62

Mr. MATTINGLY submitted an amendment to amendment No. 43 proposed by Mr. DOLE and Mr. DOMENICI to the motion to recommit with instructions the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), supra; as follows:

At the end of the pending amendment, add the following:

It is the sense of the Congress that functional totals should be reduced to reflect a limitation on the amount of social security benefits paid to illegal and non-resident aliens. It is assumed that the Finance Committee will report legislation to accomplish the required charges in law. Such legislation may limit benefits to the amount of the wage-earner's contribution plus interest, unless the wage-earner is a citizen of a country with which the United States has a treaty or totalization agreement and that this provision would apply to individuals becoming eligible on or after January 1, 1986.

CHILES (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 63

Mr. CHILES (for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. DODD, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. EXON, Mr. NUNN, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. JOHNSTON, and Mr. STENNIS) proposed an amendment to amendment No. 43 proposed by Mr. DOLE and Mr. DOMENICI to the motion to recommit with instructions the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), supra; as follows:

In the language of Amendment 43 strike all after the word "That" and insert the following: the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986 is established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal year 1987 and 1988 are set forth.

A BUDGET FOR ECONOMIC GROWTH

It is the sense of Congress that in addition to reducing the deficit, which is a major barrier to economic growth, the Federal budget should invest in future economic growth by providing increased funds for:

1. Promoting U.S. exports of goods and services
2. Science and Technology
3. Labor and Force Development (skills and adaptability)
4. Resource & Infrastructure Development
5. Availability of Credit for growth sectors or industries faced with structural change.

These investments will determine whether the U.S. economy (U.S. industry) will develop and apply the technological advances necessary to compete in the changing world economy in the next decade and the next century; freezing or starving these programs is a false economy.

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, October 1, 1986, and October 1, 1987:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $736,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $807,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $892,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $990,500,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $0.
Fiscal year 1986: $15,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $28,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $38,000,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for hospital insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $44,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $50,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $56,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $61,200,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for old-age, survivors, and disability insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $186,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $200,400,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $216,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $248,000,000,000.

(2) The appropriate levels of total new budget authority are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $1,057,600,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $1,083,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,141,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $1,218,800,000,000.

(3) The appropriate levels of total budget outlays are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $951,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $977,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $1,026,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $1,077,600,000,000.

(4) The amounts of the deficits in the budget which are appropriate in the light of economic conditions and all other relevant factors are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $214,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $169,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $134,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $87,100,000,000.

(5) The appropriate levels of the public debt are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $1,851,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $2,082,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $2,290,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $2,473,900,000,000.

and the amounts by which the statutory limits on such debt should be accordingly increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $27,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $231,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $207,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $183,600,000,000.

(6) The appropriate levels of total Federal Credit activity for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, October 1, 1986, and October 1, 1987, are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $53,500,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $69,300,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

Fiscal year 1986:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $36,200,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $75,400,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

Fiscal year 1987:
(A) New direct loan obligations, $36,500,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $75,600,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

Fiscal year 1988:

(A) New direct loan obligations, $35,601,000,000.
(B) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $80,300,000,000.
(C) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $68,200,000,000.

(b) The Congress hereby determines and declares the appropriate levels of budget authority and budget outlays, and the appropriate levels of new direct loan obligations, new primary loan guarantee commitments, and new secondary loan guarantee commitments for fiscal years 1985 through 1988 for each major functional category are as specified below:

PROMOTING U.S. EXPORTS

It is the sense of Congress that federal economic policy must recognize the international basis of future prosperity, and in addition to reducing deficits, interest rates and the overvalued dollar, provide appropriate forms of assistance for U.S. firms seeking to compete in world markets, including:

A. Prompt enactment of legislation to reduce foreign barriers to U.S. goods and services, including a requirement for U.S. retaliation against foreign imports if foreign barriers are not lowered and the trade deficit substantially reduced;

B. Creation of a $1 billion "war chest" in the Export-Import Bank to be used by the special trade representative and the bank as a resource to counter predatory financing arrangements by foreign countries and meet the unique requirements of certain U.S. exporters.

C. Increasing funds for U.S. agencies providing technical assistance to U.S. exporters;

D. Increased funds for training in foreign languages and cultures to assist U.S. exporters in dealing abroad.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

It is the sense of Congress that enhanced federal support of scientific, technological and industrial innovation:

A. Strengthens the ability of U.S. industries to compete in domestic and international markets;

B. Stimulates productivity growth in U.S. manufacturing industries through the development of improved manufacturing technologies;

C. Addresses important unsolved problems of our society such as supplying safe and low-cost energy, controlling pollution, providing adequate housing, improving the quality of life, preventing disease and creating jobs;

D. Helps control inflation and contributes to economic growth through the adoption of more productive technologies; and

E. Enhances the standard of living for all Americans; That while the private sector should maintain responsibility for the commercial application of technological advances, scientific research and technological innovation that benefits the nation more than it benefits any individual or corporate entity, the public interest warrants direct and indirect federal encouragement of research and development; That the key areas of direct federal encouragement of scientific and technological applications include: basic mathematical, physical and biological research funded through the National Science Foundation and the Department of Energy; space and terrestrial sciences and applications developed through pursuit of a manned space station and manned and unmanned space and planetary exploration; energy supply and conservation, biomedical and biotechnical research to produce marketable products while maintaining our commitment to basic research into causes, prevention and cure of disease; and funding for state-of-the-art laboratory equipment for schools and universities; That joint business-university-governmental arrangements for applied research should be encouraged to ensure rapid dissemination and adoption of technological advances, and to assure that technological development is consistent with the needs of potential users.

LABOR FORCE DEVELOPMENT

It is the sense of Congress that continued economic growth requires a labor force with the education and job skills appropriate to rapidly changing technology in both industrial production and service occupations;

That meeting these needs requires adequate funding of such key programs as math and science education, compensatory education, and job training programs for youth and dislocated workers, re-training and employment opportunities for senior citizens; training of applied scientists and engineers;

That continual change in technology will require structures to recognize and facilitate changes in labor force requirements and labor-management relations; That such structures should include a joint labor-management-government commission on labor-force development and a national job bank;

That funding should be restored to the Bureau of Labor Statistics to allow adequate monitoring and analysis of changing employment needs.

(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $9,600,000,000.

(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT/ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

It is the sense of Congress that further economic growth will require a continued investment in programs to protect and develop our nation's physical resources—land, energy, water, timber, minerals;

It is the further sense of Congress that continued growth and development requires an increased investment in programs to protect the environment from any dangerous byproducts of industrial production, such as the superfund hazardous waste cleanup program, EPA enforcement programs, water supply and desalinization projects, hazardous waste and drinking water research and soil and water conservation programs. Because the benefits of research in these areas are primarily a public good, there is little incentive for private sector investment. Lack of prudent management of natural resources as has occurred over the past four years of budget reductions, will in the next century, represent the major limits to growth.

Natural Resources and Environment (300):

(D) New primary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

(E) New secondary loan guarantee commitments, $0.

COMPETITION AND CREDIT

It is the sense of Congress that robust economic growth requires the innovation and competition spawned by the creation and growth of small firms;

That such competition requires the vigorous enforcement of anti-trust laws;

That the revised enforcement guidelines of recent years have virtually eliminated anti-trust protection;

That this lax enforcement and changes in the corporate tax code have fostered an epidemic of merger and acquisitions exceeding $347 billion in the last four years which threatens the health of financial markets;

That this epidemic has diverted both capital and entrepreneurial energy away from the innovative development, efficient manufacture, and aggressive marketing of products and toward paper transactions which enhance short-run financial gains at the expense of long-term profitability of American enterprise;

That the Department of Justice should therefore modify its anti-trust guidelines to provide adequate protection for competition against horizontal mergers, and should return to vigorous enforcement of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act;

That the Federal Reserve Board should ensure that banks maintain prudent lending practices, and assure that adequate credit is avilable for real economic expansion rather than being tied up in unproductive takeovers; That the Securities and Exchange Commission should require full financial disclosure as a condition for issuing debt instruments which are below investment grade; should prohibit takeover practices which discriminate against classes of shareholders; That the Congressional Budget Office and Congressional Research Service shall undertake an analysis to determine which tax provisions create windfalls of cash which make takeovers and liquidation more profitable than reinvestment of capital for long-term growth, and report their findings no later than June 15, 1985.

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than June 15, 1985, the committees named in subsections (b) through (r) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the Committees on the Budget of their respective Houses. After receiving those recommendations, the Committees on the Budget shall report to the House and Senate a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

SENATE COMMITTEES

(b) The Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $134,000,000 in budget authority and $134,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $2,363,000,000 in budget authority and $2,363,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $4,151,000,000 in budget authority and $4,151,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(c) The Senate Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to achieve savings of $0 in budget authority and $387,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $588,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $627,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(d) It is the sense of Congress that in order to provide an innovative mechanism to promote the export of U.S. goods and services, and provide an effective deterrent to predatory financing practices by foreign competitors, direct loan subsidies for exports should be replaced by less costly interest reduction programs and a "war chest" allowing the use of up to $1 billion in support of these objectives.

(e) The Senate Committee on Finance shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $5,934,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $11,943,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $14,550,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(f) The Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $1,893,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $3,303,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $4,708,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(g) The Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $152,000,000 in budget authority and $142,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $209,000,000 in budget authority and $204,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $279,000,000 in budget authority and $269,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(h) The Senate Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $129,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $421,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $459,000,000 in budget authority and $457,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(i) The Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $157,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $228,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $223,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

HOUSE COMMITTEES

(j) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $134,000,000 in budget authority and $134,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $2,363,000,000 in budget authority and $2,363,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $4,151,000,000 in budget authority and $4,151,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(k) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to achieve savings of $0 in budget authority and $387,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $588,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $627,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(l) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $152,000,000 in budget authority and $142,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $209,000,000 in budget authority and $204,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $279,000,000 in budget authority and $269,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(m) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $2,680,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $4,067,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $5,403,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(n) The House Committee on Government Operations shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $0 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $4,785,000,000 in budget authority and $3,550,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $5,013,000,000 in budget authority and $4,956,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(o) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $1,893,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $3,303,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $0 in budget authority and $4,708,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

(p) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within its jurisdiction which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays, as follows: $0 in budget authority and $129,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986, $0 in budget authority and $421,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987, and $459,000,000 in budget authority and $457,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1988.

REVENUE RECONCILIATION

SEC. 3. (a) The Senate Committee on Finance shall report no later than July 1, 1985, a Reconciliation Resolution making changes in the Reconciliation Bill considered pursuant to Section 2 above, prior to the enrollment of that bill by the Secretary of the Senate.

Such changes will increase revenues by:

$12 billion in FY86,

$25 billion in FY87,

$35 billion in FY88;

(b) It is the sense of Congress that:

(1) These revenue changes shall not produce any increase in tax rates for individuals;

(2) These revenue changes shall reduce the rate of growth in tax expenditures in Fiscal Years 1986 through 1988;

(3) These revenue provisions shall not be considered in either House of Congress until the spending reduction provisions in Section 2 have been passed by that House;

(4) The Reconciliation bill providing spending reductions pursuant to Section 2 shall not be enrolled until the Reconciliation bill containing tax measures has been passed.

SEC. 4(a) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report no later than July 1, 1985, a Reconciliation Resolution making changes in the Reconciliation Bill considered pursuant to Section 2 above, prior to the enrollment of that bill by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Such changes will increase revenues by:

$12 billion in FY 86,

$25 billion in FY 87,

$30 billion in FY 88;

(b) It is the sense of Congress that:

(1) These revenue changes shall not produce any increase in tax rates for individuals;

(2) These revenue changes shall reduce the rate of growth in tax expenditures in Fiscal Years 1986 through 1988;

(3) These revenue provisions shall not be considered in either House of Congress until the spending reduction provisions in Section 2 have been passed by that House;

(4) The Reconciliation bill providing spending reductions pursuant to Section 2 shall not be enrolled until the Reconciliation bill containing tax measures has been passed.

SEC. 5. It is the sense of Congress that total Budget Authority available for appropriations for Budget Function 050 (National Defense) and for non-defense discretionary programs shall not exceed $455.7 billion for FY 1986; of which $303.2 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $152.5 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs; that for FY 1987, the Total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $473.8 billion, of which $324.1 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $149.6 billion for non-defense discretionary programs; and that for FY 1988, the total Budget Authority for these activities shall not exceed $499.8 billion, of which $347.6 billion is intended to be for National Defense and $152.2 billion is intended to be for non-defense discretionary programs.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 6. If the Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1985, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for fiscal year 1986, then, for purposes of section 311 of such Act, this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310 of such Act.

SEC. 7. It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives or the Senate during fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to consider any bill, resolution, or amendment, except proposed legislation reported in response to reconciliation instructions contained in this resolution, authorizing new direct loans obligations or new loan guarantee commitments unless that bill, resolution, or amendment also provides that the authority to make or guarantee such loans shall be effectively only to such extent and in such amounts as are contained in appropriation acts.

SEC. 8. It is the sense of the Congress that the previous distinction between "unified budget" and "off-budget" spending be ended, and that budget authority and outlays for the so-called "off-budget" agencies be included in the budget totals.

SEC. 9. (a) The Senate finds that—

(1) the existing tax structure of the United States distorts economic activity, leading to an inefficient use of national resources and a weakening of our domestic economic vitality and competitive posture in international markets;

(2) the relative tax burdens among various taxpayer categories are manifestly unfair insofar as they arise from differences in the capabilities of taxpayers to take advantage of complicated tax laws;

(3) the ability of the Federal Government to plan and conduct rational fiscal policy is frustrated by elaborate schemes to avoid taxation and the unintended effects of tax incentives and penalties;

(4) progressive erosion of voluntary compliance threatens the fiscal integrity of our public finances and the confidence of our citizens in the Federal Government's capacity to govern; and

(5) a number of plans, each designed to simplify and reform the Tax Code, have been before the Congress for a time sufficient to allow for extensive analysis and evaluation.

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Senate that tax reform should be adopted as soon as possible, and that it should incorporate the following principles and objectives:

(1) efficiency and responsiveness to market conditions in the economic activities of American businesses and consumers;

(2) simplicity of structure and lower marginal tax rates;

(3) a fair and equitable distribution of the tax burden among all taxpayers, with relief for those below the poverty level, and incentives to bring them into the work force;

(4) a broader tax base, with deductions essential to avoid genuine hardship or to protect the economic security of the American people; and

(5) increased incentives for work, saving, and investment.

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Senate that because the Senate requires timely reporting of legislative action on spending bills, and because the Senate requires continual control over the budget, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall issue a weekly report during periods when the Senate is in session detailing and tabulating the progress of congressional action on bills and resolutions providing new budget authority and changing revenues and the public debt for a fiscal year, including, but not limited to the requirements set forth in Public Law 93-344, section 308(b).

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF REA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in celebrating the 50th anniversary of the creation of the Rural Electric Administration.

This program has been enormously significant in my State of Illinois for two reasons.

First, the loans provided through REA helped bring electricity and telephone service to farms and small towns more quickly and at less cost than they would have been available otherwise. This has perhaps been the most important change in history in the quality of rural life and the strength and diversity of our rural economy. Electricity brought modern conveniences and security to our homes and power and mechanization to our work.

And second, these advances were made through the formation of cooperatives, neighbors working with each other for the good of all, joining in the planning and decisions that brought these utilities into being, forming utilities that are still owned and operated by the families they serve.

I am a strong supporter of REA, both for its past achievements and its continuing need. We should all be proud of this program's achievements, and I am pleased to join in this recognition of its first 50 years.●

THE HONEY PROGRAM

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, during Senate consideration of the 1985 farm bill, we will be examining many proposals of the various agricultural programs. One of these is the Honey Program. The administration's farm bill calls for the elimination of the Honey Program. If Congress were to adopt the administration's proposal, we would not only be jeopardizing the ability of beekeepers to provide American consumers with an adequate supply of honey, we would also be jeopardizing the production of many other important crops dependent upon the honey bee for pollination.

Over the past few months, several articles have been written about the importance of the honey bee. Garry L. Bales of the Wildlife Habitat Charitable Trust has written an article for the April issue of the American Bee Journal about the environmental role of the honey bee. William Lord, a beekeeper, has written an article for the May issue of the American Bee Journal. In his article, Lord points out that pollination fees cannot be increased to cover the loss of income beekeepers would face should the Honey Program be terminated. I commend these articles to my colleagues and ask that they be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

In April, Dr. Dale Pollet of the Extension Service of Louisiana State University wrote a letter discussing the importance of the honey bee to the economy of Louisiana. Also, Dr. Basil Furgala of the Department of Entomology at the University of Minnesota wrote a letter about the pollination value of honey bees economically, esthetically and environmentally. I ask that copies of these letters appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues' attention to this material outlining the importance of the beekeeping industry and the Honey Program. The cost of the Honey Program is not due to overproduction as is the case with many other commodities. In fact, the production of honey has remained relatively constant despite increases in the loan rate. The Honey Program has only become costly in recent years due to the influx of cheap imports. We cannot simply treat the Honey Program as we do other programs because the circumstances are different. I urge my colleagues to support a continuation of the Honey Loan Program.

The material follows:

THE HONEY BEE'S ENVIRONMENTAL ROLE

(By Garry L. Bales)

The role of honey bee pollinators in the production of about 100 economically important crops in the United States has been the primary justification for most of the support provided by the government agencies to the beekeeping industry. The concept has been widely accepted for years that an adequate population of honey bee pollinators can only be maintained within the framework of a thriving beekeeping industry. This industry obtains most of its income from the production and sale of honey and beeswax (Levin, 1984).

Data from the USDA in 1981 indicated that honey bee pollinating activities were worth 143 times more than the value of the products the honey bees produced (Levin, 1984). This amounted to some $18.9 billion from agricultural crops in 1981 (Levin, 1984).

Much could also be said for the undocumented contributions made by the pollinating activities of honey bees to thousands of wild plants that are integral parts of natural ecosystems and also of undocumented value to wildlife. It has been estimated that there are between 25 and 50 different forms of life dependent upon each key plant in the world. When key plants die out of ecosystems, that system goes into a decline and dozens of other life forms in the ecosystem also disappear (Raven, 1984).

Deforestation followed by overgrazing is a worldwide land use pattern. Deserts are really collapsed ecosystems. They are increasing everywhere in the world.

Collapsing ecosystems can often be saved. Desertification can be reversed.

In California, the productivity of unirrigated pastures has been increased fourfold by the presence of clovers in the pasture plant community (Murphy et. al., UC Cir. 564). In the Midwest, pasture clovers have been observed to spread and become abundant when there are abundant populations of honey bees. When the honey bee population is low the stands of clover tend to be sparse and dwindle (Barclay and Moffett, 1984). The benefits to soil fertility, to aquifer recharge and the improvement of the watershed hydrology are immeasurable.

Plants are the basic components of all ecosystems, honey bees are basic to many plants and plant communities, and wildlife appears to be dependent upon both. Almost 100 plants with exceptional value to wildlife have already been identified. Sixty-five percent of these important wildlife food plants are pollinated by honey bees. Eighty-six percent of the woody plants known to be valuable to wildlife are also pollinated by honey bees (Martin et al., 1951).

Genetic enrichment of native plants through cross pollination activities is essential for the adaptation of plants to accommodate an array of environmental variables existing on over 250 million acreas of degraded land in this country. Genetic enrichment of plants is essential to develop varieties that can change as the ecosystem (or habitat) itself evolves (Stutz, 1982 and 1983). These genetic enrichment activities are often facilitated by honey bees.

Plants are the essential components of all ecosystems. Honey bees are basic to many plants and plant communities and most wildlife appears to be dependent upon both. It may never be possible, or even necessary to identify the many and often complex interactions in these relationships, but their importance must be taken into consideration. It is in the best national interest to have a thriving beekeeping industry.

The Untold Pollination Story

(By William Lord, American Honey Producers Association, Louisburg, NC)

In the November 1984 American Bee Journal we told the story of a cucumber grower in North Carolina who rented 100 colonies of bees each year to pollinate his cucumber crops. This grower paid $4,500 each year to insure that his spring and fall crops were pollinated. In the final analysis, he realized that he was paying a fair price for a very specialized service. Now is the time to tell the beekeeper's side of the story.

CRISIS IN AMERICAN BEEKEEPING

1985 is a time of crisis for the American beekeeping industry. The combination of the strong performance of the U.S. dollar abroad and the lack of any realistic import restrictions has resulted in a wave of cheap foreign honey flooding the U.S. market. As a result, the federal government, through its price support program, has taken over large quantities of domestic honey that has been displaced from normal channels of trade by unfair competition from foreign honey.

The Reagan Administration, through Secretary of Agriculture John Block, has decided that the American beekeeper must now compete on the world market. The Secretary of Agriculture has tried to implement this agenda by canceling the honey loan program, which would effectively reduce the price of honey to the 30¢/pound range. The USDA has taken the position that the loss of income from honey prices dropping from 60¢ to 30¢/pound could be offset by increasing pollination fees. The assumption is that pollination costs are a very small part of the total costs of production of crops requiring pollination and could easily be increased. The second assumption is that sufficient pollination demand exists to supply pollination accounts and income to all beekeepers who are deprived of income from honey sales.

THE BEEKEEPER'S VIEWPOINT

The beekeeper who supplies colonies for pollination is not getting wealthy. Pollination is a very specialized service that requires a substantial capital investment if it is to be carried out on a large scale. Transportation of large numbers of honey bee colonies requires big trucks and mechanized loading equipment. Additionally, anytime honey bee colonies are moved in large numbers over public roadways, considerable risks are incurred in terms of transportation of relatively fragile living organisms, potential risks to the public from breakdowns or accidents, and the potential for Murphy's law to come into play in the logistically complex job of moving bee colonies.

The beekeeper who provided the 100 colonies of bees to the cucumber grower mentioned earlier eventually got out of the pollination business. After close scrutiny of costs and returns, he realized he was losing money even at $45.00 per hive. This beekeeper ran 250 colonies of bees. The 100 colonies that went to cucumbers were placed in fields June 1 and stayed there until October 15. During this time it was common to lose 10 to 15% of the colonies from vandalism, pesticide kills, theft, and queen loss. Additionally, beekeeping equipment receives tremendous wear and tear when moved frequently and equipment lifespan was effectively reduced by one half. This pollination job was 60 miles from the beekeepers, home base, which made routine maintenance such as requeening much more time consuming and costly. The beekeeper was at a point in his business where he could borrow money and expand to a large mechanized operation or retrench and remain a part-timer. The economics of pollination and honey sales made the decision. There is no future in borrowing money for honey bees when the Reagan administration flatly states that the U.S. beekeeper should learn to compete on the world market. This means he should also be prepared to drop his standard of living to match that of a Chinese peasant, with whom he would be competing in the world marketplace.

THE FARMER'S POSITION

To state that losses in income from honey sales can be made up by increasing pollination fees is a false and misleading statement. The first problem is, where will the grower get the money to pay higher pollination fees? On a cost per acre basis in North Carolina cucumber production, pollination fees account for approximately 7% of the total cost (based on 1984 production cost of $365.00/acre, $25 pollination fees). Net returns per acre averaged $250.00. If pollination fees were doubled, costs per acre would rise $25 and profit per acre would drop $25. To ask cucumber growers to take a 10% cut in profits to allow the Chinese to make money selling their honey to the U.S. would be no easy task. To ask growers to increase production to offset higher costs is also not possible. Pollination costs are fixed costs and will rise with higher acreage. Also, it is a rule of thumb that for every 10% increase in vegetable production, there is a 20% decrease in price.

The nation's farmers are in very poor condition. The USDA estimates that approximately 30% of the nation's farmers are in serious financial trouble. Apple growers are being overwhelmed by cheap imported juice concentrate, and are rapidly losing domestic markets as have honey and mushroom producers. To ask the financially crippled U.S. farmer to pay more for pollination so that our domestic markets may be inundated with cheap foreign honey is asking too much.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND

A second problem with the erroneous increased pollination fee theory is supply and demand. Demand is good for pollination services now because supply of available pollination units is not high. Sufficient colony numbers exist to supply pollination needs, but currently there is no financial incentive for most beekeepers to rent their bees for pollination. Pollination provides short term cash flow and long term loss. If honey prices drop to the 30¢ range, then many beekeepers will be driven to seek additional income from pollination. Supply of pollinating units would then exceed demand and pollination fees would probably drop during the first year of over supply. However, due long-term influence of depressed pollination fees and low honey prices would lead to failure rates among beekeepers similar to the 30-40% failure rate among U.S. corn and soybean farmers who are now competing on the world market. The end result in three to five years would be shortages of bee colonies for pollination and subsequently higher costs to growers for pollination services. Hive numbers have been declining in the U.S. since 1945. We would predict further drastic declines in hive numbers if the current USDA policy is implemented.

CHANGE AMID UNCERTAIN TIMES

A third problem in the misleading increased pollination fee theory is the logistics involved in changing the production and marketing thrust of the beekeeping industry. A study by the U.S. International Trade Commission in 1976 showed that pollination fees made up only 9.7% of total income from a large group of commercial beekeepers. Assuming pollination markets existed, these beekeepers would have to make large capital investments in necessary equipment to move large numbers of hives. Displaced honey processing equipment would have little resale value due to depressed honey markets. Beekeepers would be forced to formulate and adopt new management techniques, all with the prospect of decreasing incomes. To change management and production from a commodity with a history of reasonable return on investment (honey) to provision of a service (pollination) in a highly competitive, uncertain marketplace is a difficult decision to make.

IMPORTED POLLINATION

The final problem with the increased pollination fee theory is the fact that we can import honey, but we cannot import pollination. Honey bee pollination is responsible for over 19 billion dollars in crops produced in the United States each year. Beekeepers have historically made the majority of their income from honey sales. The U.S. honey market has been severely eroded by unrestricted imports of cheap foreign honey. The USDA has responded to the beekeeper's plight by saying that the beekeepers must compete on the world market with cheap, subsidized foreign honey, and he must enter what would become a cut-throat market for pollination services. The beekeeper should then ask the beleaguered U.S. farmer to pay more for a service that has traditionally been provided free or by specialized beekeepers for a reasonable fee. The end result will be ruthless competition and price cutting for limited markets. This will be followed by wholesale bankruptcies of beekeepers, which will result in a long-term shortage of pollination units. To whom will the free market people turn to when the prices of fruit, vegetables and beef go up because of pollination-related production shortfalls. The U.S. beekeepers will be broke and their bees will be gone. Will we then import Chinese bees to pollinate our crops? What would they charge a farmer? It's worth thinking about.

A CALL FOR ACTION

The final question is, what can we do about this problem? USDA economists tell American beekeepers and farmers that if they can't compete on the world market they should go out of business. Their advice is to enter "growth fields," like computer sales or economics. Unfortunately, computer salesmen and economists don't feed this country, but farmers and beekeepers do. We do it so well that 2% of our population feeds the other 98% (plus a good bit of the rest of the world). The problem is that we don't tell our story and we don't yell loud enough when our toes are being stepped on. As a beekeeper, have you ever wondered why you pay 36¢ a pound for bee feed sugar when the world market price is 4¢ per pound? The answer is simple. The sugar people are organized and vocal. We need to get organized and tell our story. We need to write our congressmen and tell our story to newspapers and magazines. Most importantly, write your senators and representatives. If they understand our problems, they can help us. The address for all representatives is: U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515. The address for all U.S. Senators is: U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.

LOUISIANA COOPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE, LOUISIANA STATE UNIVERSITY AGRICULTURAL CENTER, Baton Rouge, LA, April 12, 1985.

Mr. GLENN GIBSON,
Executive Secretary, The American Honey Producers Association, Inc., Minco, OK.

DEAR MR. GIBSON: I have read the questions and answers about the honey price support program in the Senate Congressional Record and would offer the following comments. The U.S. Department of Agriculture should be a little more complete in writing such, as it is misleading and could present a serious problem for beekeepers and eventually agriculture.

The honey price support program has been effective in stabilizing honey marketing in past years without great expense to the government, until recently. With the flooding of markets from imported honey at reduced prices and no tariff, beekeepers began to suffer. This year several large producers were told by their usual buyers that they could not afford to buy their honey for what it was worth. This has caused an increase of honey on the loan program.

We do not have overproduction of honey we have over importation, complicated by government actions producing an overvalued dollar high support prices and no tariff protection. Many beekeepers have stated that they could get by with a moderate price for their honey, yet each of the last 3 years, the support price has been raised automatically. Beekeepers need time to organize a marketing research program sponsored by various parts of the industry. Immediate correlation of price supports would spell widespread bankruptcies among beekeepers. In Louisiana, this would mean a loss of several million dollars in income, not only through honey production, but through queen and package sales.

Economists with USDA are very unrealistic in claiming beekeepers have only to raise the price charged for pollination to offset lower honey prices. If pollination was the principal reason for raising honeybees, Louisiana would probably only have 3 or 4 beekeepers. Most of our beekeepers raise bees, some honey, and some do both. So that idea is null and void in Louisiana. The pollination in areas that does occur is because a farmer has allowed the beekeeper to place an apiary on his farm. The pollination is payment for letting the bees on his farm. The beekeeper gets the honey. Problems such as the tracheal mite which may seriously hamper bee movement may find these same economists saying beekeepers in California, Texas, Florida, Washington, and Oregon are charging unfair pollination prices in the near future.

The economists also state that there are many wild bees to assist in agricultural pollination. This was true one time but the increasing acreage over the last several years has destroyed millions of acres of natural nesting sites for these wild pollinators, thus greatly reducing their potential. Most wild bees can pollinate native plants, but a large percentage (over 50%) are imported. The pollination mechanisms of these and many other plants cannot be triggered by most native pollinators. It must be stressed that the honeybee is the only pollinating insect that can be moved in any number great distances in a short period of time, making it the only pollinator that can be effectively relied upon. In agricultural production, large numbers of honeybees are required, but mainly for a short period of time. An example is the pollination of almonds in California where 400,000 colonies are required for only 2 weeks. What are beekeepers to do with the 400,000 colonies for the next 50 weeks? Only a small percentage could possibly be rented for additional pollination.

Each year America's agriculture intensifies, becomes larger and has a greater need for adequate pollination. Only a strong beekeeping industry from queen and package producers to pollinators supported by honey production can provide the needed workers for adequate pollination.

Sincerely yours,

DALE K. POLLET,
Specialist (Entomology).

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF ENTOMOLOGY,
St. Paul, MN, April 11, 1984.

Hon. JOE SKEEN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SKEEN: Thank you for your concern and interest in the problems facing American beekeepers. I will attempt to answer your questions in the order listed.

I know of no studies that have provided quantitative data to document the monetary benefits of honey bees to wildlife. If we could afford the luxury of such studies, I believe they would prove to be very enlightening. The food chain is such that the vegetarians that feed on foliage, flowers, fruit, and seeds are often food for the carnivores. Since so many of our native forage, seed, and fruit plants that provide food and shelter to our wildlife are insect pollinated, bees do have a significant impact on the wildlife (birds and mammals) that grace our urban and rural landscapes.

The beekeeping industry derives very little income from pollination fees. A study by the U.S. International Trade Commission in 1976 reported that during the 1971-1975 period, the 118 commercial beekeepers sampled derived under 10% of their income from pollination fees. It is often stated that one million colonies are rented each year to pollinate agricultural crops. This figure is misleading since many colonies are rented many times each season. One hundred thousand colonies rented 3 times, and one hundred thousand rented 2 times adds up to a half million colonies. This scenario is common in California, Oregon, and Washington. Although the pollinating activities of honey bees benefit about 19 billion dollars worth of agricultural commodities, the activities are essentially provided as a free byproduct of the beekeepers' attempts to harvest a crop of honey.

American honey producers are doing their best to produce maximum honey crops. High honey prices have not caused overproduction in the past. Production during the 1966-70 period averaged 227 million pounds. During the 1970-73 period the wholesale price of honey increased from about 14 to 42 cents a pound. Production during the 1974-78 period averaged 199 million pounds. A recent article by Morse and Nowogrodski indicated that the average honey yield per colony has been increasing over the past 42 years by about 0.3 pounds per year.

Dr. Morse's discussion of "Pollination and Wildlife," "Pollination and Home Gardens," "Pollination in Rural America," "Roadside Plantings," "Pollination in Intense Agricultural Systems," and "Most Pollination Is Free" describe very briefly the various beneficial impacts of bee pollination.

I am taking the liberty of sending you two articles and a working paper. The article describing trends in American beekeeping does discuss the honey price support program, the recent unfavorable import/export trade balances, and the significant increases in honey acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Very Sincerely,

BASIL FURGALA,
Leader, National Extension Apiculture Program.

ADDRESSES BY EVA ESTRADA KALAW ON THE FUTURE OF THE PHILIPPINES

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to two recent speeches by Eva Estrada Kalaw, president of the Liberal Party and a Member of Parliament in the Philippines, whom I recently had an opportunity to meet in Washington. Ms. Kalaw was in the United States to receive the Mahatma Gandhi Freedom Award from the College of William and Mary.

Her first speech, the Gandhi Freedom Award Lecture, was delivered at Williamsburg, VA, on April 2, 1985. In it Ms. Kalaw discussed U.S. policy toward the Philippines and emphasized the Filipino people's desire for true democracy, instead of the unacceptable alternatives of the Marcos dictatorship or the Communist insurgency.

In her second speech, a commencement address at Bicol College in the Philippines on March 22, 1985, Ms. Kalaw described the results of the Agrava Board of Inquiry into the assassination of Benigno Aquino and criticized President Marcos' announcement that he would reinstate Gen. Fabian Ver as Chief of the Philippines Armed Forces if Ver is not convicted of complicity in this crime.

Mr. President, I ask that these two important speeches by Ms. Kalaw may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The speeches follow:

GANDHI FREEDOM AWARD LECTURE DELIVERED BY DR. EVA ESTRADA KALAW

A few years ago, another Filipino stood here to receive this same award. He must have felt as honored as I do to receive it. But I think that, in retrospect, the College of William and Mary must feel even more honored to have had him here. The award itself was never more deserved than by him. He often quoted Gandhi, as who does not these days, but with him the words of Gandhi were spoken from the heart—a heart already braced for the return to his country and his final sacrifice.

He had come from our country, from eight years of a solitary confinement in which no effort was spared to break his spirit. It was important for the dictatorship to break that spirit, for it was one of the last places where the idea of democracy had taken refuge. His spirit, however, was not broken. On the contrary, he became stronger in the very places where the most cruel pressures had been brought to bear: in his courage where the dictatorship had tried to terrify him with the threat of a midnight execution in his cell; in his pride where it had tried to humiliate him by telling him, with some truth, that his people had grown indifferent to his sacrifice and his cause; and in his mind which the dictatorship had tried to destroy by denying him access to the world and his family.

He emerged from prison braver, prouder, and wiser for the trials he had borne. The dictatorship had determined that it was better to remove him from the country—and, three years later, from the world—rather than keep him in prison, where his persistence defined the limits of what absolute and immoral power can do to the human spirit.

His name was Ninoy Aquino. He and I among the handful of Senators who would remain true to the spirit of the Republic, which has been destroyed by the dictator—the president of the Republic whose duty it was to be its protector.

Ninoy Aquino was arrested and imprisoned on the night the dictator moved to crush democracy in my country. I, too, in much more modest fashion, enjoyed the privilege of imprisonment by the man your President had hailed as "a voice of reason and moderation in Southeast Asia" and whose "adherence to democratic principles and to the democratic processes" had apparently so endeared him to your Vice-President. I was arrested and briefly jailed on the charges of conspiring to assassinate this "voice of reason and moderation", this adherent of "democratic principles" who had just emerged victorious from another massive pervasion of "democratic principles". Since the credibility of this man is so well known that Filipinos expect him to do the opposite of what he says, I shall not waste my time and yours denying the charge. I am grateful, anyway, for the privilege he conferred on me.

Your Henry David Thoreau said that the place of every just man in an unjust society is in prison. And the man for whom this award is named said that "Freedom is to be wooed only inside prison walls." I had looked in vain for the face of freedom in my country. I found her finally, languishing in prison. Not until the government bullet that shattered Ninoy's skull had shattered also the walls of freedom's prison was I to see her again, in the faces of her angry people, ranging the land to reassert her dominion.

Freedom in my country today is far from having achieved her goal. The stones of her prison lie at her feet, but her jailers still surround her, bristling with the arms that, ironically, democracy's arsenal—America—supplies. And, beyond them, freedom faces a still greater threat and challenge.

After twelve years of thievery, lies and murder, years that have left my country hopelessly debt-ridden, despoiled, destitute, and divided in insurgency and secessionist war, many of freedom's children have grown cold to her promises. In growing numbers, they are finding in the arms of insurgency a more certain prospect of immediate safety and swift justice, a more reliable upholder of their dignity—at least in the short term. In the long run, they figure, we shall all be dead anyway.

From the time that President Marcos destroyed our democracy in 1972, ostensibly to protect it from an insurgency of 500 guerrillas, that insurgency has grown to consist of twelve to fifteen thousand regulars and 10,000 militia, with a popular base of about a million. They operate with increasing effectiveness in 63 of the Philippines' 73 provinces. In 1972, they were ragged bands of desperate men wandering among largely indifferent populace, with the army constantly at their heels. Today, they are hailed even by the propertied, especially in the embattled South, as deliverers of swift justice and upholders of order against the violent anarchy of an undisciplined army.

But you and I know where the road of that short-term justice ultimately leads. I, for one, will not trade my hope of freedom, and ultimately my dignity, for the instant gratification of my desire for justice for the terrible things that have been done to my country. I am not closing my eyes to the murder and mutilation that is being done in the countryside, and even in the cities, under the euphemism of "salvaging". But "forgiveness," said Gandhi, "is the ornament of the brave." And Ninoy Aquino returned for reconciliation and not revenge.

The depredations of the military would not have been possible without the license, if not explicit orders, of their civilian and military superiors. I believe—I must believe—that there is a residue of honor and patriotism in the Army that was once the shield and exemplar of our republic, the protector of our liberties.

That army, in its infancy, defeated Spain to establish the first republic in Asia. It fought bravely against your armies, and, later, under your flag, against the Japanese for the promise of freedom and independence. It did not hold back when it was called again to the colors of freedom in Korea. I cannot believe that that army is now beyond redemption. I appreciate your government's declared intention to work for the reform of the Philippine military and its re-dedication to the noble role of freedom's protector and democracy's guard. I can only hope that the effort does not result in merely refining its skills at oppression, thus becoming more than ever democracy's jailer. I must also confess my strong misgivings about leaving the work of re-training our army in the hands of a foreign power that is not yet all that clear and serious about its democratic intentions.

Your government appeals for understanding from my people, especially in this work for military reform, so necessary, it says, to America's security and our freedom. I hope it understands why some of my people continue to receive its proposals with profound suspicion. The Filipino people are being asked to suspend their disbelief and suppress their fears, while their military jailers are re-armed and re-trained, and while the authoritarian ayate that has robbed and oppressed them over 12 years is held in place to claim as its spectacular achievement the fresh infusions of American aid. To understand is to forgive their skepticism.

The need for military reform is pressing, indeed, in the light of a communist insurgency that is increasingly seen less as a threat than a hope by more and more of my people. But there is nothing whatsoever to prevent the work of reform from proceeding simultaneously with serious efforts to dismantle the dictatorship. As the Filipino people begin to clearly discern such efforts being made, so will they begin to welcome the efforts of the United States to shield them from another, a communist dictatorship.

In 1965, when Marcos came to power, my country's foreign debt stood at half a billion dollars. This was courtesy of a freely elected Congress that, for all the accusations against it of shortsightedness, incompetence and petty graft, was expert nonetheless in the preservation of the nation's partrimony and liberties. At the start of Marcos's second term in office, the foreign debt stood at two billion. The vigilance of Congress had been relaxed by bribes and cajolery. Only a handful of Liberal Party oppositionists remained in the Senate, some of them maimed by a still unexplained bombing in Plaza Miranda. In 1972, Marcos declared martial law, abolished Congress, and distorted a constituent mandate to revise the Constitution in order to perpetuate himself in power, this time permanently and absolutely. In 1983, the year of Ninoy Aquino's assassination, our foreign debt stood, inexplicably, at 28 billion—a figure that is continually being revised upwards, as IMF teams uncover more anomalies. I say "inexplicably" because my country has nothing to show for the 28 billion received and spent in its name. This is a debt—I must be frank with you—that my country cannot repay except at the price of a long program of austerity and privation that my people will not accept while the present government—the government responsible for their penury—is in power. It is a question of credibility, which the present government lost forever with the August 21 murder, and a matter of the justice it so richly deserves.

American diplomats have told us that we are confronted with the choice: Marcos or the communists. The same view was expresssed in a Presidential debate. No, my friends, the choice confronting the Filipinos is not Marcos or the communists. For the propertied and professional classes, it is Marcos, the communists or emigration. Many of them have already made the obvious choice. And I don't blame them. Theirs is a choice made in anger and frustration, blind but justifiable. There will be less and less fanatical anti-communists in my country who will allow themselves to become cannon fodder in a proxy war on behalf of a foreign power that props up a dictatorship.

But for the vast majority of Filipinos, the choice may, indeed, one day soon, be narrowed down to Marcos or the communists. The recent record of expanding insurgency should give us an idea of what their choice will ultimately be.

For the vast majority of Filipinos, however, the day has not yet come. They retain a faith, deeply shaken but real, in democracy, in spite of the sham that was made of it in the past 12 years.

When elections were called for May last year, many opposition civic and business leaders, opted to boycott it. And with good reason. The government had propped up its legitimacy before the world through an unblemished record of electoral fraud. Another election, and another certain victory, might restore to it the legitimacy it had lost with the murder of Aquino. I opted for participation.

I did not believe that even an election so-called victory—the way the government secured such victories in the past—could ever legitimize the Marcos government in the eyes of the world or my people. True, Marcos retained the emergency legislative power to override even an opposition majority in parliament. But the point was not only to legislate but also to take a sounding of the people's commitment to the democratic process in spite of their long experience with its travesty. The point also was to measure the people's commitment to work actively toward the removal of the present government. With Gandhi I believe that the boycott of legislative elections is not an eternal principle but a tactical measure to be adopted or abandoned as circumstances required.

In any event, on May 14, 25 million voters went to the polls on Election Day to choose 183 representatives out of a thousand candidates. The people spoke, they spoke clearly: faith in democratic processes was still there. But the boycott movement's fear of their perversion proved as clearly well-founded.

The government spent billions in a vote-buying spree that would further aggravate inflation. For added assurance, force and fraud were employed. Of the 100 or so opposition candidates that are believed by objective observers to have won, only 59 were proclaimed by the Marcos-dominated Commission on Elections. But in Metro Manila, in the heart of the dictatorship, within easy reach of Marcos's million and machinery, we thrashed his wife's candidates.

Where the elections were relatively clean, the credit clearly belonged to a citizen watchdog group, the NAMFREL, rather than to a conscious design on the part of the government to open up the political process to change. NAMFREL mobilized over three hundred thousand people from all walks of life—housewives, businessmen, students, nuns and priests—to monitor the polls and, if they could, stop the cheating. They worked gratis, long hours, often late into the night, always at grave risk to their lives.

The arithmetic in the polls showed that the majority of Filipinos had voted for the opposition, or, if you will, against Marcos. When you regard these votes as having been cast in a climate of fear, you get a measure of the profound desire of the people for change.

In parliament, the arithmetic turned out differently. Marcos's party retained a clear majority. Should this be regarded as legitimizing his regime? Yes, if politics, to use Burke, is a mere matter of arithmetic however dubiously performed. But, in fact, it is a matter of morals.

Marcos lost all moral authority to govern when he betrayed the Republic in 1972; he lost it irrevocably with the murder on August 21. No effort on his part can ever restore it to him. Moral authority, as Gandhi observed, is more quickly lost by a desperate attempt to hold on to it. It comes without seeking. It is retained without effort.

The May 14 Elections demonstrate that the Filipino people continue to have faith in democratic processes. It is a faith, let me be clear in the process—not in the government that has never flagged in its efforts to pervert it. But this latest demonstration of faith may also prove its last manifestation. The ballots were cast as a signal to Marcos that the people want democracy back, that they want once more a responsible and accountable government. If the government frustrates them again in this desire, as it appears bent on doing, then they may well give up their faith and take up arms for the only alternative left.

I cannot help but feel that my belonging to both the generation about to pass and the generation about to take over gives me a special advantage in evaluating the problems of our people and in seeking their solutions. For this reason, I work, to build, and to fight against the future that threatens.

My generation can stand the scrutiny of History. It fought valiantly for democracy and freedom in Bataan, Corregidor and Korea. It conducted successfully an effective guerilla war against the Japanese. From the halls of a reorganized postwar Congress it brought a ravaged nation to it's feet and laid down the foundations of a national reconstruction. We fought faithfully and consistently with every weapon we could harness to reflect and to strengthen our people's faith in Democracy. But the cunning hand of a dictator seized the torch of freedom from our hands. My struggle today is my continuing contribution to the faithful struggle of generations of Filipinos who like your own heroes laid down their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor at the altar of freedom. It is also my offering to the future vigilance of generations to come.

In the political work that I do, I keep one eye on the main objective of removing the blight that struck my land with the presidency of Marcos. I keep the other on the regeneration of the country he despoiled, whose morals he has corrupted.

I lay at his feet the major blame for the aggravation, if not the origin, of the problems that threaten my country and turn its people half into totalitarian slaves and half into exiles. I shall not deviate from this objective which I believe my people would hold me to.

There are other issues that demand close attention. The status of the U.S. bases in the Philippines is one of them. Its urgency arises less from a perceived threat to the survival of my country in a global conflict than from the popular equation of the bases with continued American support for the dictatorship. I appreciate the diplomatic imperative of having to deal with formal governments however established. But we must live and work with that imperative. But when diplomatic formalities yield to outright adulation for the dictatorship, I must regard it without sympathy.

The focus of my energies, however, remains the objective toward which the Filipino people are working: the removal of the dictatorship and its replacement by democratic order that will be as sensitive to their freedom and dignity as it will be responsive to their material needs. So far as I know, it is for this that the Filipinos have roused themselves from their political torpor to risk all in a struggle with the dictatorship. Even as Gandhi would not expand or shift the goal in the midst of the battle he called his people to fight, so will I not expand or change the purpose for which they elected me until the people so decide.

In the preparation and implementation of political platforms, the government consults its greed and its technocrats; some of the opposition have consulted their convictions.

I have consulted the people. I am determined to lead the people only where they would go. I have always had an implicit faith in their intelligence and in the soundness of their ideas of their own best interests. In a word, the platform yield by popular consultations was: democracy. Democracy in politics, democracy in the economy.

When one thinks about it, the people make sense. This, and future governments in my country, will be bankrupt and unable to intervene meaningfully—least of all benignly—in the rehabilitation of the country. Its recovery must be the result of the people's own untiring efforts. It will be free enterprise but without the limitless opportunities offered by your American frontier. It must therefore be free enterprise mitigated by social justice. And, one hopes, it will be an economy undistorted by the undue and unfair advantage of those with personal access to power. For this reason, it must have a democratic politics. For a democracy, such as that you are so privileged to have, means the end of secrecy, of patronage and immoral gratitude, of unpunished corruption, and of undue advantage growing uncontrollably by its transgressions of law, and fair play.

It is a modest program of government. But we are a modest people, with no aspirations to hegemony but only the modest desire for peace and prosperity in the land they shall leave for their children.

Neither this, nor any other program, can assure by itself the happiness of which my people have been long denied. I know that the removal of the present government is the first and necessary condition for the recovery of my country. But I have no illusions that the mere substitution of governments will be sufficient for that purpose.

"It would be folly to assume," Gandhi said, "that an Indian Rockefeller would be better than an American Rockefeller." Our first president, Manuel Quezon, said that he would rather have the Philippines run like hell by Filipinos than run like heaven by foreigners. We have experienced a native hell, and we will have no more of it. But it would still be folly to put our faith in the hands of foreigners. We have no recourse but to fall back on ourselves. Let it be, however, ourselves regenerated.

"I am not interested," said Gandhi, "in freeing India merely from the English yoke. I am bent upon freeing India from any yoke whatsoever. Swaraj will come not by the acquisition of authority by a few but by the acquisition by all of a capacity to resist authority when it is abused."

"My belief," he said, "is that the instant India is purified India becomes free, not a moment earlier."

This is a much larger task, but I know that upon its outcome depends the enduring happiness and freedom of my people.

COMMENCEMENT ADDRESS OF M.P. EVA ESTRADA KALAW, PRESIDENT, LIBERAL PARTY, BICOL COLLEGE, DARAGA, ALBAY, MARCH 22, 1985

In recent weeks I have been to Pangasinan, and Baguio in Northern Luzon; to Tarlac, Pampanga, Zambales, Bulacan and Nueva Ecija in Central Luzon; to Cebu and Bohol in the Central Visayas. Next week I will be in Mindanao.

Tonight, my friends, it is good to be here in Bicol for the things that I have seen in those many corners of our country, the fear and uncertainty among our people, the hue of despair written on their faces—many a time have made my soul weary and my spirit dreary, for many of them have been paralyzed by fear and have despaired the future of our country under this regime. I am burdened by the fear and despair that I have seen among our people.

So tonight I intend to rest my weary soul here among you. I say again it is good to be here in Bicol.

For today, as I moved around among the people, consulting with them, I saw courage and the will to fight until democracy is restored and the future of our children secured. As I listened to the people today, I was reminded of the stories of valor that are written in the history and tradition of Bicol. I was reminded of General Ola. who, in Bicol history, was the last to surrender to superior Spanish forces; of General Pawa, the other general who fought the Spanish long and valiantly; The saga of the thirteen Martyrs of Naga City who would not brook tyranny and injustices to be wrought on their people; the heroic stand of Kitwininan Hills in Camalig; The resistance put up by the gallant men of Legaspi City against the onslaught of American Troops, in the years past.

I will recall the courageous and victorious stand of the opposition Davids against the KBL Goliaths of Marcos. This latest display of courage earned for the opposition 8 out of 12 seats in the Batasan. I am honored to be their colleague. Bicol can be proud of her sons—Marcellana, Ziga, Padilla, Alefelor, Cea, Andaya, Villafuerte and Fernandez.

Bicol has another son, Kit Tatad, who waged a valiant and imaginative campaign in Metro Manila.

Bicol can be proud of many more sons and daughters, in and out of the political arena, who have brought honor to her name—the Senators De Vera, Ziga, Aytona, Cea; leaders like Vinzons, Pecson, Los Banos, Gillego, Frivaldo, Felipe, Daiz, Roco, Garchitorena, Bernas, Lorete, Quintano, Crisol, Tabuena. The courage of the sons and daughters of Bicol has given me courage and has revived my flagging spirit. I thank you for that.

My dear graduates, it is good to be with you tonight here in Bicol College. Earlier in the day I have learned about courage from your elders. Tonight as I watch you one by one walk up to the stage, I see the glint of idealism in your eyes.

Tomorrow you shall not be going back to your old familiar classrooms anymore. You shall be stepping into a bigger and unfamiliar classroom—life itself. As you step into life to assume your role, to work out your hopes and dreams, you shall go your separate ways. Your teachers, your classmates, your campus sweetheart shall not be around anymore. Each one of you shall be on his own. Really this commencement is also goodbye.

Your families, your teachers, your school have molded and prepared you to take your place in the real world outside of this sheltered campus. The commencement tonight means that tomorrow you shall begin to influence and mold the world outside. How that world, how this country shall be shaped shall depend on how steadfast you will stand by the ideals that you have imbibed from your alma mater.

My friends, I can speak on and on about commencement being the beginning of life. I can speak on and on about a myraid of beautiful things that ought to be spoken about on your graduation. But the hour is getting late for us who are all on this sinking ship of our Republic. The hour is getting late for the salvation of our country.

So let me move to the central point of my agenda with you tonight. I have chosen to speak out on this urgent matter here in Bicol because I have found courage among the people of Bicol. I have chosen to speak on this urgent matter on occasion of your graduation because I see the fire of your idealism in the glint of your eyes. And the matter that I shall address tonight shall require a lot of courage and a lot of idealism if we are to succeed in overcoming that problem. By speaking out here in Bicol I have to address, too, the rest of the graduates and our countrymen, especially those who are timid and still afraid. For I shall speak about a matter that, sad to say, few have so far spoken about.

I shall speak now about the sword of Damocles that Mr. Marcos has once again hung over our heads—the possible reinstatement of General Fabian Ver.

Allow me to review briefly the events that have led me to point to you this sword of Damocles that hangs over us.

For a long time since September 1972, we have been a frightened people. We bore the yoke of martial law in silence. If at all we spoke about the fundamental verities which are taken for granted in civilized societies—such as honor, freedom, justice, human rights—we spoke in whispers. We talked about them only in remembrance of things past, in remembrance of things we lost. Few dared to speak aloud because agents of the regime were mongered to be everywhere—in our neighborhoods, in our places of worship, in our places of work. They were listening to us and looking at us in Orwellian fashion—all in the name of national security. It was subversive to speak out against corruption in high government levels, against crony monopolies, against military abuses. It was subversive to speak the truth. We were afraid of the vengeance of a paranoid dictatorship.

Then Ninoy Aquino was killed in cold blood. The heinousness of the crime unleashed a torrent of moral outrage that swept away fear and timidity. The people poured into the streets and cried out for justice, for truth. They were no longer afraid. Ninoy's martyrdom gave life to a deadened national sense of outrage.

To appease an angry people, the Fernando Commission was constituted. Its mission—to find the truth. But the people were distrustful and angry still. They suspected a whitewash. The commission resigned, embarrassed by nationwide skepticism. With the nation and the whole world watching, the dictatorship could not have its way.

Another body, the Agrava board, was constituted. Most were skeptical. What truth could come out of a leadership that had a long established tradition for deception? But some sensed international pressure forcing the dictator's hand to let the truth come out. The people decided to wait and see.

After more than a year of watchful waiting, the nation and the world were presented with findings. Ninoy was a victim of military conspiracy. And so was Galman.

The submission of the report had its last moment of drama as people waited with baited breath. The chairman of the fact-finding board had her own report, separate and different from the majority report of the four other members. Her report found military conspiracy, General Ver was cleared. She slipped out of her board into Malacanang to deliver her report ahead of the majority report. Mr. Marcos was smiling on camera. He was pleased. His friend was cleared.

The four other members, the majority of the board, left out in the cold, were not smiling. Their chairman had preempted their majority report. The next day they went to Malacanang to submit the majority report. Their finding—military conspiracy and General Ver was part of it. Mr. Marcos was no longer smiling.

Back at the premises of the board session hall, people were waiting. The press was there. The whole world was watching. The members of the board arrived. The people were waiting to hear the report. But the new unsmiling chairman gavelled the fact-finding process to a close and left. The report was not read. The people clamored for it. Heeding the public outcry, the other members of the board caused the report to be read. The majority report debunked the version of the Marcos Regime.

That day of truth was a long way from the day of skepticism when the Agrava board was constituted. It was a day of celebration. The facts were forced out of a reluctant regime by popular outcry.

Why did we go this far? Why did we achieve all these? Because we were no longer afraid. And we kept our vigil. In churches and Mosques, we fasted and prayed for the truth to come out. On the streets we marched, demanding that truth must come out. In public forums we cried that the truth must come out. In the press we wrote that the truth must come out. And the whole world was watching—the democratic governments, the international press, the creditors, the citizens—expecting that the truth would come out. We stood in constant vigil. We were no longer afraid and the truth came out.

But three weeks ago we seem to have stopped our vigil. We seem to have lost our courage.

Three weeks ago, Mr. Marcos hung over us again the sword of Damocles. He announced the possibility of General Ver's reinstatement, if cleared by the Sandiganbayan. That was three weeks ago. Until now, except for a few brave columns and statements, no public outcry has been heard. I find the silence disturbing.

Have we stopped our vigil? Have we lost our courage? Have we reached the limits of our perseverance? Are we afraid of General Ver? Are we afraid of Mr. Marcos?

Among civilized governments, where honor in public office is the rule rather than the exception, the Agrava board findings and the subsequent indictment would have been cause for the immediate resignation of General Ver, Mr. Marcos and the entire government. Is this too much to expect from this regime? Is "delicadeza" a word that has been forgotten by this regime? And are we afraid to tell Mr. Marcos this?

By threatening to reinstate General Ver "if cleared" Mr. Marcos has hung the sword of Damocles over the heads of witnesses who would want to come forward to tell the truth and over the heads of prosecutors who want to do their duty faithfully. Has not Mr. Marcos, who conveniently invokes "subjudice" to parry questions from the press, in effect interfered with the judicial process? And are we afraid to tell Mr. Marcos this?

Credibility is the central point in the possible reinstatement of General Ver. Should this man, his credibility tainted, be reinstated at the cost of stopping the momentum toward reform of the military which has been steadily gaining ground in the past few months? Are we afraid to tell Mr. Marcos this?

In recent weeks, Minister Tolentino has been ousted from office for valid disagreements with Mr. Marcos. Minister Ople has been told to explain public statements he has made. Why has General Ver remained untouchable? Is Mr. Marcos, this lavishly-decorated war hero, this commander-in-chief, afraid of General Ver? Are we afraid to tell Mr. Marcos this?

I do not intend to sit in judgement over the guilt or innocence of General Ver. The Agrava report has revealed enough of that. The Sandiganbayan, should it prove courageous and independent, shall rule on that.

But, for God's sake, for our people's sake, I dread the possibility of his reinstatement. Thus I dread the silence of our people, for the whole world is watching us—whether we shall accept his reinstatement in silence or we shall gather courage again and rally against that reinstatement. The whole world will take its cue from us. If we remain silent because we are afraid, then the world will watch in silence. Surely General Ver will be back as chief of staff. Then we shall face the possibility that the military shall once again be not the guardians of the people but the instrument of this regime.

Then I dread the possibility that all the reforms recently instituted in the military shall be for naught.

I dread the possibility that military abuses shall escalate again and the NPA shall gather more adherents. For abusive soldiers are the best breeders of dissidents.

I dread the possibility that the gains we have won against salvaging, torture, and other forms of violations of our human rights shall be lost again; I dread the intrusion of spies into our lives again.

I dread the possibility that our hopes for a truly free election shall be dashed to pieces again. For the power of guns, goons, gold and Comelec—shall be backed up again by the forces of the military.

I dread the possibility that all the efforts of the opposition for unity shall be for naught. For there shall be no credible elections.

I refuse to accept that we shall have lost all the little victories that we have won, that we shall have lost democracy forever because, at a time when we needed to speak out, we remained silent and afraid.

The pattern of press releases in the past weeks indicates a well-orchestrated campaign to soften the public's mind for what I fear is impending "reinstatement".

Against this avalanche of press releases let the people stand their ground. Let them break their silence and speak out. Let them break out of their fear and speak out. Let them rise up together and cry against the reinstatement of General Ver.

I call on our business and political leaders to speak out against reinstatement. I wish to call their attention to the plight of our witnesses. A number of times the Sandiganbayan adjourned its trial of the Aquino murder case because the witnesses for the prosecution failed to appear. The witnesses are left on their own—with no one to give them courage and support. Left alone to fend for themselves, they stand a good chance of being threatened and discouraged out of testifying. I recommend them to the sponsorship of citizens and groups who can support them.

I call upon my colleagues, the members of the Batasan stand to be jeopardized. The very existence of the Batasan stands to be threatened with abolition by an arbitrary military machine. The closure of the Congress by the military in 1972 is still fresh in my mind.

I call on my brothers and sisters in the Parliament of the streets and cause—oriented groups to speak out against reinstatement. I call on them to organize marches and rallies against reinstatement. The gains in freedoms and human rights for which we have been truncheoned, arrested and salvaged are being threatened. I call on all our people to renew their courage and intensify their vigil against this latest and immediate threat to our freedoms and the tranquility of our land.

I call on you, the graduates of Bicol College, the valiant people of Bicol to rise up again and lead the fight against this new threat to our liberties and the tranquility of our lives.

My dear friends, in the early days of martial law when silence and aquiescence to the will of the dictatorship was the safe course to follow, there was one among the very few who had the courage to dissent and thus keep together his conscience and idealism. I refer to that "Dissenting Justice" of the Supreme Court, Calixto O. Zaldivar. Let me lift one passage in his dissenting opinion where he quoted Justice Sutherland of the United States Supreme Court and I Quote "The saddest epitaph which can be carved out in memory of a vanished liberty is that it was lost because its possessors failed to stretch forth a saving hand while yet there was time."

My friends, my countrymen, stretch forth that saving hand while yet there is time to do so.●

INSTEAD, CALL IT WASTEWAY

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, today I wish to call attention to an excellent piece by John B. Oakes that appeared last year in the New York Times. In clear and succinct terms, Mr. Oakes outlines the reason why the Westway real estate development and highway project in New York City should more properly be called Wasteway.

Specifically, Mr. Oakes points to the considerable environmental effects of the proposed project, notably the impact that the project will have on the striped bass. The striped bass, a popular and commercially important fish, is already seriously threatened and populations are in decline. Three Federal agencies have concluded that the construction of the Westway landfill would have a disastrous impact on the striped bass.

As Mr. Oakes correctly argues, however, even if Westway were given a clean environmental bill of health, it would still turn out to be an enormous financial burden on the people of the State of New York and the entire Nation. Though the project's backers are counting on cashing in on the Federal highway trust fund to pay for up to 90 percent of the 224-acre landfill and highway, the project's timetable will almost certainly run way beyond the 1990 closeout date for the interstate highway program. What will New York do with half a landfill, and billions to go before they have their road? Too late to quit, New York officials will have to search for a very deep pocketbook for cash to fill up the Westway bottomless pit of waste. That pocketbook will belong to John Q. Citizen.

We need to stop Westway before it becomes wasteway. If New York needs a highway—and few would argue otherwise—then let them build one on the scale more familiar to most Americans—that is without a multibillion-dollar landfill or commercial real estate development. Moreover, under the law, the State has until September 30, of this year to "trade-in" for $1.7 billion in Federal funds to rehabilitate the city's mass transit system in lieu of Westway. As Mr. Oakes argues, there are far better alternatives than pursuing the shabby business of Westway.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Oakes' column, "Instead Call It Wasteway," from the June 6, 1984, edition of the New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

The column follows:

[From the New York Times, June 6, 1984]

INSTEAD, CALL IT WASTEWAY

(By John B. Oakes)

With or without the striped bass, Westway is a fraud on New York's taxpaying and voting public. This multibillion-dollar landfill and real estate project for Manhattan's Lower West Side waterfront, disguised as an interstate highway, is a plan whose time had long since come—and gone. It is a politician's delight, a speculator's dream, a city planner's mirage and John Q. Citizen's nightmare. It deserves to be renamed Wasteway.

In the famous "snail darter" and "furbish lousewort" cases, to which Westway's striped bass are sometime derisively compared, the funny names of those embattled species tended to divert public attention from the intrinsic lack of merit of the pork-barrel projects that threatened them.

With or without the snail darter, the Tellico Dam in eastern Tennessee needlessly flooded 16,000 acres of prime farmland to create a "recreational" lake (now reportedly becoming sterile) in a region already surfeited with them. It was a bad idea to begin with. Similarly, the huge Dickey-Lincoln surplus-power project in eastern Maine, now fortunately shelved, was an outrageously uneconomic assault on the taxpayer, It, too, was a bad idea; and if the Dickey-Lincoln's threat to an endangered plant species helped to stop it, that's one up for the furbish lousewort.

So it is with Westway and the striped bass. Even if the Army Corps of Engineers has given Westway a clean environmental bill of health, it would still turn out to be an unconscionable financial and social burden on the people of New York.

But the Corps of Engineers did no such thing. Its most recent draft environmental statement, equivocal though it was, clearly points out that construction of the Westway landfill would have an "adverse" impact on the striped bass population of the Hudson River, and therefore of the entire northeast coast, of which the Hudson is a principal supplier. The report said further that there were sure to be "formidable" difficulties in experimentally creating new habitat for the bass elsewhere in the river.

This latest study was ordered by the Federal courts because the previous one was found to be full of the "blatant misrepresentation" for which New York State authorities, eager to push Westway through at any moral or financial cost, were primarily responsible. Under political pressure from Westway's most influential proponents, beginning with Governor Cuomo, this new study, too, had to be conducted in much less time than genuine concern for scientific accuracy would have required.

Nevertheless, even with its admittedly inadequate data base, it raises enough doubts about the effects of the proposed landfill on a $200 million sport and commercial fishery resource to warrant a veto of the project by the Federal agencies concerned—a veto called for under the law when less harmful alternatives are available.

The most realistic of these alternatives is a plan for a "substitute" riverside parkway along the Hudson that would be paid for through a "trade-in" of the Federal funds now earmarked for Westway. Since the substitute would cost only a fraction of Westway's cost (and could be built in a fraction of the time), a large part of the trade-in funds would be applied to New York's mass-transit system.

Despite misleading propaganda to the contrary, New York can realistically expect to get its full trade-in allotment of $1.5 billion over the next half-dozen years, if it asks for it. This is about the same amount that New York would get for Westway itself through 1990, when the interstate highway program is due to expire.

After that date, however, an increasingly reluctant Congress will be under even less obligation than it is today to cover 90 percent of the escalating costs of an interstate that the Federal Highway Administration itself has declared to be nonessential. Any Federal funds Westway may receive after 1990 will at best be taken out of other competing New York demands on the Federal budget. New Yorkers cannot have it both ways.

Westway's probable cost over the 10-year period needed to build it is now unofficially estimated as anywhere up to $6 billion, three times as much as the original official figure. It will be the New York public, not the Congress, that will be left holding the (empty) bag if a partly built Westway is ever to be completed. Moreover, whatever funds mass transit would receive from trade-in would, in the absence of trade-in, have to be raised through taxes or fare-backed bonds, thus placing an additional squeeze through increased fares on subway and bus riders for benefit of Westway's real estate developers.

It's a shabby business that will eventually cost New Yorkers dear, but that will be long after the present office-holders responsible for this mess will have gone to their presumably just political rewards.●

IN HONOR OF RABBI TRAININ

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to call attention to the dedicated and exemplary efforts of an outstanding resident of New York State, Rabbi Issac Trainin. I believe it is vitally important that we recognize those individuals who contribute so much to the advancement of society. In that vein, I recognize Rabbi Trainin for his 40 years of service to the Jewish community.

Rabbi Trainin has rallied New Yorkers to such altruistic endeavors as the creation of the Metropolitan Council on Jewish Poverty in New York. He founded the Commission on Synagogue Relations and remains its director. The commission provides worthwhile guidance in such needy areas as: alcohol and substance abuse, compulsive gambling, the needs of the disabled, and mental health. As evidenced by these accomplishments, Rabbi Trainin has demonstrated that he is concerned with not only the spiritual needs of his community, but its overall welfare as well.

In addition to being the founding director of the Religious Affairs Department of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies since 1952, Issac Trainin is also an author and a lecturer. His work with the federation is extensive. He has served as the organization's consultant on Jewish Iranians in New York since 1979 and organized the Committee on Medical Ethics at the federation.

Such accomplishments demonstrate 40 years of service that have tremendously benefited the New York City area and our ongoing efforts to provide our Nation's citizens with the potential they have fought for and deserve.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

SOUTH AFRICA: AN AMERICAN BUSINESS VIEW

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to call the Senate's attention to the "Submission by the American Chamber of Commerce in South Africa to the Special Cabinet Committee Under the Chairmanship of the Minister of Constitutional Development and Planning." In this noteworthy document the American Chamber makes a number of important recommendations on specific policy issues, including: A program to phase out influx control, the granting of freehold rights to urban blacks, an end to population removals, abolition of the migratory labor system, and the opening up of central business districts to traders of all races. The American Chamber's submission also calls for government by consent of the governed and for the right of all adults, regardless of race, to representation in the legislature; and it makes a number of specific proposals for political reform. Lastly, it calls for negotiations with all racial groups and political parties—including leaders of organizations now proscribed or in exile.

Mr. President, the American Chamber of Commerce in South Africa has identified many of the injustices of apartheid which must be addressed urgently. The fact that this organization has had direct, practical experience in working within South Africa makes its recommendations especially deserving of attention.

I applaud the effort of the American business community to make its views known to the appropriate South African authorities. I would hope that this is a precursor of future vigorous, visible, and aggressive action by American businesses inside South Africa to contribute to the campaign in that country to end apartheid.

I request that the entire text of the American Chamber's submission be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

The text follows:

SUBMISSION BY THE AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE IN SOUTH AFRICA TO THE SPECIAL CABINET COMMITTEE UNDER THE CHAIRMANSHIP OF THE MINISTER OF CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT AND PLANNING, MARCH 1985

I. PREAMBLE

AmCham takes this opportunity of submitting this memorandum to the Committee with the intention of making a constructive contribution to the process of policy formulation. We do so in the knowledge that there are no simple solutions, but we believe that our viewpoint may be helpful to the Committee. American companies in South Africa contribute to the country and benefit from it and therefore want to contribute from our own experience both here and in the United States.

II. SUMMARY

Our submission is dealt with under the following three headings:

1. Specific policy issues.
2. Democratic participation.
3. Negotiation and consultation.

III. SUBMISSION

1. Specific policy issues

(a) Urbanisation and Influx Control: We are aware that the influx control system has been under review for some years, and that certain modifications of a positive nature have been made, among them that blacks qualified for permanent residence in the urban areas may change their jobs now more freely than in the past. We wish strongly to urge that the government embark on an explicit programme to phase out influx control within a stated period of time. The weight of international evidence shows that the process of urbanisation can seldom be indefinitely arrested. In addition, urbanisation is a necessary prerequisite of economic growth. We believe that the costs of continued influx control in South Africa are high. Such costs include (a) the direct costs to the taxpayer of policing and administration, (b) opportunity costs to the economy and to business resulting from artificial restrictions on the free movement of labour, and (c) social costs in terms of damage to goodwill between the races. We are aware of studies that indicate that the net influx of blacks from rural areas to the towns that would result from phasing out of influx control would not necessarily be as great as has sometimes been thought. American employers wish to make the greatest contribution they can to raising South Africa's rate of economic growth, so creating the additional jobs that this country urgently needs. We believe that the present process of phasing out restrictions on the upward mobility of black labour into more skilled jobs should be accompanied by a deliberate programme to phase out geographical restrictions. As black employees are exposed to more responsibility and moved into more senior jobs, it frequently becomes necessary to transfer them from a company's operations in one part of the country to another. The influx control laws are a major hindrance in this connection.

We are aware of reports that new identity documents may be issued in South Africa, but it is important that the issue of such documents be accompanied by the phasing out of discriminatory influx control laws.

(b) Housing: the introduction of the 99-year lease system in many black townships was a major step forward, and the government's recent announcement that this system will now be extended to certain townships in the western Cape is also to be welcomed. According to press reports, the Minister of Co-operation and Development has stated that the government will give serious thought to the question of freehold rights for urban blacks. We strongly urge it to grant such rights. This is the logical follow-on to the 99-year lease system and it is also a logical consequence of the recognition of the permanence of urban black communities. The granting of freehold rights would remove a major piece of racial discrimination, and at the same time be conducive to greater political stability in the urban townships. Continuing to deny black people the right to own land in freehold, a right which lies at the very heart of the free enterprise system, is likely to undermine black commitment to that system. Granting freehold rights in urban townships is important from another point of view, which is that it would create a source of income for local authorities in these areas, as they would be able to levy assessment rates upon such property.

(c) Removals: population removals do grievous damage to South Africa, both in terms of racial goodwill within the country and in terms of the country's image abroad. A prominent South African business leader has said that population removals are the one thing most likely to ensure success or the disinvestment lobby in the U.S., which would harm both American companies and South Africa itself. There is much evidence to indicate that removals are frequently accompanied by coercion, and that once people have been removed, particularly into some of the more densely populated homelands, they suffer stress and deprivation, and become an additional burden on the taxpayer. Some of the communities removed are economically relatively prosperous, and it is tragic to see such communities destroyed. While we recognise that increased black urbanisation resulting from the abolition of influx control would entail additional housing and other costs, we do not believe that there would be any costs in simply halting removals altogether. Indeed, there would probably be savings, since the State would no longer have to provide housing for people who have been moved.

We urge that the immediate cessation of removals apply not only to blacks removed to the homelands, but also to coloured and Indian (and the small number of white) people removed in terms of the Group Areas Act.

(d) Migrant Labour: Concomitant with the phasing out of influx control, the migratory labour system should also be phased out. Denying a worker the right to live with his or her spouse and family for very large parts of his or her working life is not socially desirable, conducive to productivity, or morally right, nor is it compatible with the sanctity of marriage and family life. Again, allowing migrant workers to bring their families to live with them at their places of work would involve costs, but the government would be entitled, if it were to agree to the abolition of the migratory labour system, to call upon the private sector to play its full part in contributing towards housing and infrastructural development.

(e) Business rights: AmCham is aware that the question of opening up central business districts to traders of all races has been under consideration since the report of the Riekert Commission was published in 1979, and that some progress has been made in this direction. We strongly urge that CBDs should be opened, not only to coloured and Indian business and professional men and women, but also to blacks. We endorse the moves that some local authorities have made towards desegregation of CBD trading rights, while expressing our concern that others have refused to allow the African Bank, for example, to open a branch in the CBD. The question of whether local authorities should have the right to refuse to open their CBDs is a vexed one. The government, for one or another reason, may not be willing to dictate to them. However, the question at stake is not only one of the autonomy of local authorities, but a principle fundamental to the free enterprise system and to the dismantling of racial discrimination. Discretion should not be left in the hands of local authorities, however if necessary, it would be possible to provide for businessmen refused admission to any particular CBD, for whatever reason, to have a right of appeal to the Supreme Court, and to empower the court to overrule any local authority.

AmCham also urges the government to remove the petty restrictions that inhibit both formal and informal business development within the black townships. According to the Free Market Foundation, the development of the informal sector is inhibited by a great deal of legislation of various kinds. AmCham believes that in the interests of maximising job creation, restrictions on business development in CBDs and black townships should be reduced to the barest essentials.

In particular we would like to urge that proposals by the Welgemoed Commission to restrict minibus taxis be rejected. The growth in recent years of these taxis has been in response to commuters' needs, and the entrepreneurial initiative of such taxi operators should not in any way be stifled by attempts to protect competing rail or bus services. Commuter dissatisfaction with transport services has led to a number of costly and disruptive boycotts in recent years, and AmCham believes it would be inviting trouble to interfere with the operations of black entrepreneurs who provide a service that people are willing to pay for.

(f) Citizenship: The policy of denationalising black people—i.e., removing their South African citizenship—on the assumption of constitutional independence by homelands, should be abandoned. This policy is not only contrary to international law but almost universally rejected by blacks. With reference to press reports that a form of dual citizenship or nationality may be introduced so that blacks who have lost their South African citizenship are not deprived of internationally-recognised passport facilities, AmCham would like to state its view that the major objection of black people to denationalisation is its link to the question of political rights rather than to the difficulties it causes from a travel documentation point of view. Accordingly, AmCham believes that merely restoring citizenship of black people for travel purposes while restricting their political rights to homelands, will not meet their objections.

2. Democratic participation

AmCham endorses the statement on page 22 of the report of the Department of Constitutional Development and Planning for 1983 that the realities and demands of the constitutional development of blacks should be considered with an open mind and with a new vision. Our submission on the question of constitutional development is made in this spirit. We propose to discuss this question under the heading "Democratic Participation" and from the local, regional, and national perspectives.

Our broad position is that government should rest upon the consent of the governed and that all adults, irrespective of race, should be accorded the right to representation in the legislature that has ultimate control of their lives. While we are aware that all blacks in South Africa (broadly defined in this document to include homelands that were formerly part of South Africa) have a franchise for legislatures in the homelands, we do not believe that this alters the fact that ultimate control remains in Parliament in Cape Town and in the State President, who is vested by the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act of 1983 with the control and administration of black affairs. This is the case partly because almost half of the blacks in South Africa reside outside the homelands, partly because all ten homelands are heavily dependent on Parliament to balance their budgets, and partly because some two-thirds of the homelands' collective gross national product is earned in the white-designated areas. In this context it is relevant to refer to a statement by the Minister of Constitutional Development and Planning (Financial Mail 19th October 1984) that "there is very little political binding or connection" between blacks in the white-designated areas and the homelands.

Although AmCham, for the reasons just set out, believes that blacks are entitled to representation in Parliament, we are not in a position to prescribe how this should be effected. We are aware that the idea of a "fourth chamber" for blacks has been ruled out by both the government and black leaders (among them the president of Inkatha). We are aware too that some black organizations regard a constitution based on one-man-one-vote in a unitary state as the only acceptable type, but that the government has very firmly rejected this notion. We are convinced, however, that South Africans will ultimately devise a solution acceptable to the great majority of the country's population. Whether this is a unitary or federal system, or whether rights are protected on an individual or group basis, and other fundamental matters, are all questions that South Africans of all races will ultimately have to decide among themselves during appropriate negotiations between representatives of all races and political parties in the country. In our view such negotiations are a matter of urgency. If the process of consultation that the cabinet committee has embarked upon with various black leaders proves to be a first step in that direction, AmCham would applaud the fact.

Having stated the broad principles we have in mind we wish now to put forward a number of specific proposals that we believe will help create a climate for negotiation and carry the process of political reform in South Africa forward.

(a) Local Government

(i) One of the important features of the current upheavals in certain black townships in the southern Transvaal is the violent attacks on the persons and property of members of some of the new black local authorities. Such persons are in an invidious position because a document distributed in 1983 by the Department of Foreign Affairs on behalf of the Department of Constitutional Development and Planning was widely interpreted as portraying the new local authorities as substitutes for the parliamentary franchise. These authorities are in an invidious position also because they have been granted important responsibilities but lack the financial resources with which to discharge their duties effectively. We strongly recommend that the government immediately issue a clear statement to the effect that the black local authorities are a form of three-tier government only and that their establishment should in no way be seen as a substitute for black political rights at other levels.

(ii) We are aware that the question of how local authorities should be financed has been the focus of official attention for some time, most recently by the permanent finance liaison committee, and that a number of proposals are being considered. We strongly advise against introducing methods (taxes based on the number of employees, for example) to finance local authorities, be they black or white, that may have the effect, intentionally or otherwise, of discouraging business investment in metropolitan areas. We do not believe that South Africa can afford any measures which discourage job creation. We do not wish to comment on whether as a matter of general principle it is appropriate for local authorities to be self-financing. We do, however, strongly believe that to apply such a principle to local authorities in black townships in South Africa at the present time is most inappropriate. The large backlogs in infrastructure in these areas are the result of public policy (the freeze on housing construction in certain townships in the late 1960's, for example) and we believe it is unjust and unworkable to burden local authorities with the responsibility for the substantial upgrading that the townships require. We would urge the government to introduce direct subsidies for development and upgrading of the townships and to regard such subsidies as a form of development assistance (similar, perhaps, to that provided to homeland administrations). As we have noted above, the granting of freehold land rights in black townships would, in time, provide local sources of revenue. Any prospect of black townships eventually being able to be self-sufficient would also require maximum business development in those areas, which underlines the need to remove restrictions on such development.

(iii) AmCham has noted that the Regional Services Councils Bill, introduced in Parliament in 1984 and subsequently referred to a select committee, provides for white, coloured, and Indian local authorities to be members of these councils. Although black local authorities will be able to obtain services from the councils on a contract basis, they will not be formal members. We can see no sound economic or administrative reason for excluding blacks and we are glad to note that the president of the Transvaal Municipal Association has recommended that they be included. Accordingly we strongly urge that the legislation be amended before being presented to Parliament again. In this context we feel it is relevant to point out that the exclusion of blacks from the new tricameral Parliament has created a great deal of bitterness among black people of all political persuasions and we believe that this exclusion should not be repeated at the level of regional services councils. On the contrary, we believe that the regional services councils provide a golden opportunity for consultation and negotiation between blacks and other groups. To allow this process to go ahead in the regional services councils would, we believe, be a valuable experiment for South Africa, and contribute to the process of evolutionary change.

(b) Regional Government

Although ten homelands have already been set up in South Africa with their own administrations, eight development planning regions subsequently established straddle homeland boundaries, which is a recognition of the increasing economic integration of South Africa. The regional development advisory committees established in respect of these development regions are also a recognition of the inevitability of joint decision-making on matters of common interest. If this can happen in the sphere of regional development, it is logical to extend the principle to decision-making of regional relevance in other fields, including the social and political. In this context we would commend to the committee the report of the Buthelezi Commission, which found that the existence of separate authorities in Kwazulu and Natal led to expensive and inefficient duplication and overlapping, and accordingly recommended that all regional functions be carried out on a joint basis by the provincial administration and the Kwazulu legislative assembly. As AmCham understands it, the commission recommended a form of multi-racial regional government in Natal and, without wishing to endorse the policies either of the Kwazulu legislative assembly or of the Natal provincial administration, we would like to commend to the committee the principle of allowing cooperation in the eight development regions over matters of economic development to evolve into joint decision-making on regional, political, and other issues. Again, without wishing to prescribe the precise formula, AmCham is confident that such a formula can be reached through black and white negotiation and compromise. The formula could differ from region to region, depending on political, economic, and other circumstances, but regional governments of this nature could evolve into component units of an ultimate federal political system for South Africa, if such a system were eventually decided upon in preference to a unitary state.

(c) National Government

We have already stated above AmCham's confidence that eventually South Africans will devise an appropriate formula for black participation in Parliament. The proposals for local and regional government outlined above would, we believe, pave the way for such a development if they were successfully implemented. We would in the meantime wish to make the following recommendations:

(i) the government should make an announcement that it is its intention to grant the parliamentary franchise to blacks and that this will be done when an appropriate formula has been agreed upon by the leaders of all population groups;

(ii) the government should also announce that once the formula was agreed upon, the parliamentary franchise would be extended not only to blacks in the white-designated areas, but also to blacks resident in the homelands;

(iii) blacks should be given representation on the State President's Committee on National Priorities. Since this committee will play a major role in determining budget priorities and therefore have a major impact on public spending and on the economy, to exclude blacks from it seems unjust and anomalous; and

(iv) the government should not proceed any further with plans for a confederation, as it is evident that this particular formula is rejected by a great many black people, including a number of leaders of the homelands. We refer in this context to meetings held between the leaders of Kwazulu, Transkei, Lebowa, and Kangwane with a view to promoting federation rather than confederation. Confederation is, we believe, unacceptable because it is based upon the removal of citizenship from blacks.

3. Negotiation and consultation

As stated above, an appropriate political formula for South Africa can only be arrived at by South Africans themselves through an agreed process of negotiation in which representatives of all race groups and political parties can freely participate. For such a process of negotiation to be effective, it must necessarily include leaders or organizations now proscribed and/or operating in exile. AmCham does not presume to claim that such organizations are the only authentic voice of black people. Some of them are undoubtedly among the most important voices, however. AmCham accordingly believes that the organizations in question should be legalized and that leaders thereof now in prison or in exile should be granted an amnesty, subject to their agreement to participate in lawful democratic procedures and to dissociate themselves from violence. All persons in detention without trial should at the same time be charged or released.

IV. CONCLUSION

AmCham believes that South Africa has already shown itself capable of making important changes in policy, with benefit to all. We refer in this context to the growth of the black trade union movement and the legislation providing for the registration of black trade unions that followed the report of the Wiehahn Commission. We have witnessed also the employment of black people in ever greater numbers in skilled and managerial posts, and the gradual abandonment of the industrial colour bar. Blacks and whites have proved themselves capable of effective and mutually beneficial negotiation in the industrial relations field, and we believe this principle can successfully be applied in the political field at local, regional, and national levels. We have seen also the desegregation of sport and sports facilities in many fields, the desegregation of theatres and of certain hotels and restaurants, while an increasing number of black students are attending white universities. All this encourages us in the belief that peaceful evolutionary change in South Africa is possible. This submission is made as a result of AmCham's desire to do all in its power to assist that process to the benefit not only of our member companies and the many South Africans who work for them, but to South Africans of all races.●

TEACHER DAY U.S.A.

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, this month, as Congress continues to focus on the crucial problem of the Federal deficit, I ask that we take a few minutes to turn our attention to a critical issue facing our country. The education of our young people is an everyday concern of our Nation's parents, children, and educators. All too often, however, it is discussed only in the narrow terms of the budget debate. Today, as part of Teacher Appreciation Week and on Teacher Day U.S.A., we recall again that an investment in our children's education is vital for America's future—both for our economic health and our national security in the years to come.

On the first day of this session, I introduced the American Defense Education Act to ensure that America's children learn the skills of tomorrow—skills to operate sophisticated machine tools, to invent the next generation of computers, and to speak foreign languages in overseas markets. This bill, now sponsored by 19 members of this body, draws on the shared responsibility of families, communities, and Government to meet the challenge of educating our children. This challenge has become particularly acute during the mid-1980's when, as reported in "A Nation at Risk," we face a "rising tide of mediocrity that threatens our very future as a people and a nation."

We must not let this tide erode the foundation of our education system. This foundation is based, first, on our commitment to excellence in public education; and, second, on our commitment to meet the educational needs of every child in this country.

Together, our families, communities, educators, and Government can meet these commitments. Today, on Teacher Day U.S.A., we recognize and appreciate the efforts and achievements of our Nation's teachers in undertaking this difficult but most important of tasks—to provide quality education for all our young people.

In a changing world of new information and technologies, this task is becoming increasingly difficult. We must give teachers the help they need: We must provide them with the tools and training to teach our children new skills; we must reward them sufficiently for their important work; we must adequately fund quality education programs; and we must give them our strong support.

Only if teachers receive this support can we begin to reverse the trend toward massive teacher shortages projected for the late 1980's and 1990's. Unless we provide a sufficient number of educators to teach our children, our Nation will lack the human resources to keep pace with new developments in technology and science which are crucial to both our economic and national security. We can and must modernize our education system.

There is no question that, today, our schools are in crisis. Average achievement test scores today are lower than they were in 1957, the year the Soviets launched Sputnik and America initiated a furious race to catch up with the Russians in science, technology, and space exploration.

Today, only 13 percent of all high school graduates are prepared for the engineering curriculum in college, compared with 28 percent in 1972.

One-half of all high school students in the United States take no math or science beyond the 10th grade. What is most dangerous is that our toughest international competitors are devoting far more attention to educating their children in these vital areas. Soviet students must complete 2 years of calculus, 5 years of physics, 4 years of chemistry, 4 years of biology, and 5 years of algebra by the time they complete high school.

Mr. President, these statistics are alarming because a well-educated, well-prepared citizenry is essential to lead the United States into a changed economy that will require new skills and knowledge of its workers. And the national security of this country will depend on our citizens' abilities to operate, maintain, and control the sophisticated equipment on which our defense increasingly is based. Indeed, our education system bears a heavy responsibility, for it now must teach students the classics and computers, languages and lasers, physics and philosophy.

We must examine programs for responding to the crisis in American education. The American Defense Education Act establishes four programs which, together, provide such a response.

Under the ADEA, local school districts develop and implement programs in elementary and secondary schools to improve instruction and student achievement in mathematics, science, foreign languages, communications skills, and technology. During each fiscal year, school districts working with the ADEA Program will be entitled to a basic payment based on the average per-pupil expenditure in the State. And, for those which can show substantial evidence that the program meets the ADEA goals for the year, an additional payment is available.

The bill encourages institutions of higher education to coordinate efforts with local school districts for the training and retraining of teachers through workshops, summer institutes, and in-service training. The ADEA also authorizes funds through the National Institute of Education to support research and development into effective teaching and learning techniques in math, science, foreign languages, and technological training.

An additional component of the ADEA calls for the Secretary of Defense to project the personnel training needs of the Armed Forces. Then, in conjunction with the Secretary of Education and local educators, the Secretary will analyze the best way for education to help meet those needs. It is absolutely essential that our defense professionals communicate with our educators.

Mr. President, the American Defense Education Act establishes an incentive program, a Federal impetus, so our country can meet the demands placed on our educational systems by the technological changes taking place in today's world. The key here is Federal impetus. The ADEA provides localities with necessary Federal aid without stifling local initiative or flexibility. By developing programs to train our young people for tomorrow's world, we are investing in a safer, more prosperous future for our Nation.

I appreciate the participation of the Senators who have joined me today in drawing attention to the importance of investing in America's future through quality education programs, such as the ADEA. And, I want to thank again our Nation's teachers, because their hard work and dedication ensure that this investment is sound and that it will provide high returns in years to come.●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today, Teacher Day U.S.A., gives national recognition to the valuable contribution that teachers make to our society. It is only proper on this day that we thank our teachers for their hard work, dilligence, and dedication in educating our Nation's children. It is also an opportune time to briefly reflect on the status of the teaching profession and on the importance of the teacher.

Teachers are the critical determining factor in the measure of the quality of our education. Our schools are only as good as the teachers in them. For most students, it is the teacher who is the most significant role model outside the family. In this capacity, teachers not only provide students with a sound grounding in subjects from algebra to zoology, but also instill in a young man or woman a love of learning which that student will exercise throughout life. Teachers help each student develop his own sense of identity, character, and self-esteem. And teachers recognize the capabilities and potential of every student, while encouraging each individual to work hard so that he may go as far as his imagination, desire, and talent can take him.

We expect each teacher to perform these functions. Beyond this, we expect them to serve as nurses, counselors, after-school babysitters, policemen, and hall and lunch monitors. In short, we expect them to be concerned with the total welfare of all our children.

Sadly, we are losing our best and brightest teachers to the private sector because we do not provide adequate compensation for these responsibilities. Furthermore, we do not provide salaries and working conditions that can attract promising college graduates to the profession.

It is encouraging indeed that so many States across the country have undertaken efforts to increase teacher salaries, improve teaching conditions, and implement reward systems. While these efforts are laudable, we still have a long way to go if our goal is to hold on to the outstanding teachers we now have, and to attract top-level graduates to the field.

Teacher Day U.S.A. is a fitting occasion to underscore the importance of strengthening the quality of our education. It is important that we recognize that our Nation rests heavily on the development of the human potential of our citizenry. For, the makeup and character of our country is constituted by the sum total of the knowledge, character, and capability of our graduates. And in this regard, it is critical that we acknowledge that the investment that we make now in human capital through schooling is directly proportional to our economic strength as a Nation in later years.

It was with this concern in mind that we passed the Education for Economic Security Act in the last session of Congress. This act, for which I was proud to have played a significant role, provides a 2-year authorization to provide Federal assistance to State and local educational agencies to upgrade the quality of math, science, computer, and foreign language instruction. We passed this measure out of alarm that our schools could not keep pace with instruction in these subjects in other countries. We knew that failure to act quickly to improve the quality of education would have serious economic ramifications in the near future. It was our belief that our economic competitiveness in the world marketplace was in jeopardy, and we passed this bill as an emergency measure so that we might immediately begin to revitalize our ailing school system.

It is now time to move beyond this emergency legislation by beginning a discussion of legislation that will address the great magnitude of the long-term needs of schools in upgrading the quality of education. For this reason, I am a cosponsor of the American Defense Education Act, which advances a long-term approach to addressing the problems that schools face in math, science, foreign languages, and computer instruction. I am hopeful that we can soon begin a dialog on legislative initiatives of this nature, and that hearings can be held on the ADEA in this session of Congress.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, recent news articles and editorials continue to focus on the quality of teaching in our Nation. I'm pleased that the reports which have been completed since 1983, including "A Nation at Risk," the report on the Commission on Reading and many others have not been shelved to gather dust. Reports are worthless unless they are translated into action—action which results in higher student achievement, quality teaching at all educational levels, and a commitment to both excellence and access for all students.

Today is Teacher Day U.S.A. Along with my congratulations to the thousands of hard-working and dedicated teachers in the State of Illinois, I would like to bring to this Chamber's attention a news commentary and comprehensive reading report on teaching and learning.

Orley R. Herron, president of the National College of Education with branches in Evanston and Lombard, IL, wrote a commentary which appeared in the May 8, 1985, Chicago Tribune. In it, he states that "educational reform is in everyone's best interest." Herron points out that the dropout rate for teachers is almost as alarming as the dropout rate for high school students in Chicago. With starting pay at about $13,000 per year, this is an alarming, but not suprising fact.

Herron asks a crucial queston: How do we ensure that the teachers of our children are both well-paid and well worth it? One answer he is uniquely qualified to propose is the quality of teacher-training institutions. He makes sensible and workable suggestions such as early classroom experience for those training to become teachers, links between college and university schools of education and the community which includes elementary and secondary classroom experience on the part of professors of education, and early screening programs for students of education to identify those students whose qualifications or personalities make them better suited for another career.

Today's problems in education are certainly not limited to the quality and commitment of teachers. Teachers, in general, are among the most dedicated of all professionals. Dr. Herron suggests that we can train them better, that professors of education can become more involved in precollege educational systems and that early exposure and evaluation "will eliminate the bad apples destined for teaching careers and restrict our academic product to the pick of the crop."

The National Academy of Education's Commission on Reading is chaired by Dr. Richard C. Anderson, director of the Center for the Study of Reading at the University of Illinois in Champaign. Established in 1983, the Commission's work has culminated in a report just released "Becoming a Nation of Readers." I'm pleased that our major public higher education institution in Illinois has played such a key role in this important report.

"Becoming a Nation of Readers" begins with a firm statement that the ability to read is so basic, that excellence in high school and beyond is not possible without a strong foundation in reading upon which all learning rests. The Commission on Reading's report explores at length the skill of reading and how it is taught both in the home and in the classroom. Reading is a skill of understanding and appreciation of written communication which stays with that individual throughout his or her life, and is a major factor in success in school, on the job, and as an element in a full personal life.

The Commission extensively evaluates teaching and learning of reading skills, and makes a number of recommendations; from parental involvement with preschool children through time at home spent reading aloud, to intensive training in the process of teaching reading skills for college students who will become tomorrow's teachers.

Reading skills, quality teaching, and quality teachers are related and complex topics. I commend both Dr. Herron's commentary and the Report of the Commission on Reading to my colleagues as we make decisions on Federal education and literacy programs in the coming months.●

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on this day that has been designated "Teacher Day U.S.A.," I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the many fine teachers in our Nation's schools, to focus on the importance of education, and to stress the need for continued support of education at all levels of government.

It goes without saying that teachers play a very special role in our society. For it is from their classrooms that the leaders and thinkers of tomorrow will emerge. Teachers have the responsibility of ensuring that the future adults of our country will be prepared to fulfill their roles of citizens and leaders and that they will be competent to guide our Nation and implement its goals. For these great responsibilities that our educators have undertaken, we owe them our gratitude. Moreover, we owe them our continued support in helping them to obtain the resources necessary to maintain a learning environment.

When we think about it, investing in education is the best investment we can possibly make as a nation. When we invest in the education of people, the investment pays off. Educated people contribute to society. They are more productive. They often pay more in taxes to support government, our national defense, and programs deemed to be in the national interest.

On the other hand, those who have not benefited from education are less likely to be employed, and are more likely to cost society resources through welfare or support for correctional institutions. Without a doubt, education can be seen as a true bargain when viewed in this manner.

High quality education is the key to our continued success as a nation. If we want to have a healthy economy, a strong defense, and regain our country's competitive edge in the world, then we must have the best educated people in the world.

It is my hope that the homage we are paying to educators today and the importance we have attributed to education through our observance of this day will be remembered. As we continue the budget debate and as we look at major education initiatives such as the American Defense Education Act, we can show our commitment to education through our pro education votes. The education of our children is a responsibility that must be shared by all. Let us together make a commitment to do all we can to make our education system the best that it can be.●

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator HART and several of our colleagues in sponsoring the American Defense Education Act.

With our need to build a renewed emphasis in mathematics, the sciences, foreign languages, and communication skills, this legislation can help achieve our national goals of filling the void we have found in these areas.

Today's investment for developing engineers, computer specialists, business leaders, and teachers will be the key to our keeping the highest standard of living in the world. A nation which allows its education system to become second class will soon become a second class nation.

Education is the key to our solving the problems of the trade imbalance, developing competitive business technology, insuring the strength of our defense, and diversifying our economy into the 21st century.

Whether we like it or not, we are now a part of a world economy. Twenty-five years ago, only 3 percent of our national income was dependent upon world trade. By the end of the century, the portion will probably approach one-third.

Our investment in these key learning areas would be achieved by passage of the American Defense Education Act. Our long-term economic health and national security will depend on what small sacrifices we are willing to make today. I urge my colleagues to support the American Defense Education Act.●

FUEL EFFICIENCY REQUIREMENTS FOR AUTOS

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. EVANS] recently assumed the chairmanship of the Alliance to Save Energy, a nonprofit, public interest organization of Government, business, labor, and consumer leaders dedicated to improving our Nation's energy use.

I ask that a recent op-ed piece coauthored by Senator EVANS and by Senator HEINZ, a former chairman of the Alliance to Save Energy, be printed in the RECORD. The article addresses an issue that should be brought to the attention of the Senate, and I believe Senators EVANS and HEINZ have stated the case very clearly against the proposed reduction in fuel efficiency requirements for automobiles.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 20, 1985]

REJECT THE PLEA FROM FORD, G.M.

(By Daniel J. Evans and John Heinz)

WASHINGTON.—After posting record profits last year, two of the three big auto makers—Ford and General Motors—are asking help from the deficit-ridden Government. The Government should reject the plea, which would set a bad precedent, deprive Federal coffers of millions of dollars and reward companies that drag their feet, giving them unfair competitive advantage.

Specifically, the auto makers are asking the Government to ease its fuel-efficiency standard for automobiles. They say that gasoline prices are coming down and that consumers want bigger, less-efficient cars. What they do not tell you is that easing the standard could save them approximately $500 million in fines for not reaching the required fuel-efficiency level. And that in turn is revenue that could be used by the Government to fund important social programs.

The fuel-efficiency standard—called the "Corporate Average Fuel Economy" standard—is part of a law passed in 1975. Car manufacturers were given 10 years to increase the average fuel economy of their new fleets to 27.5 miles per gallon.

Ford and G.M. will not meet the standard this year and have asked the Transportation Department to roll back the standard to 26 miles per gallon. The department has indicated that it plans to do so and is taking public comments until April 29.

The corporate average fuel economy standard is important to our effort to reduce dependence on imported oil and to preserve national security. If all cars on the road today achieved 27.5 miles per gallon, rather than the current average of about 17, oil imports could be reduced by more than 29 billion gallons a year. That translates to 130 days of oil imports. Fully a third of our oil supplies still comes from foreign wells, some of them in unstable regions of the world. Easing the standard could make us look foolish if events in any of those regions led to another oil shortage.

Ford and G.M. claim that falling gasoline prices have encouraged buyers to demand larger cars. Therefore, they assert, they are unable to sell enough small cars to meet the standard for their total fleet unless they make their small models more attractive by providing special financing and make their larger cars less attractive by raising prices. These actions, they say, would limit buyers' options and "disrupt the free market in a manner that will lead to serious economic harm."

If the Government has set a goal that industry is unable to meet, or that causes undue hardship, then we should reconsider the standard. But before we get carried away by the "regulatory burden" argument, we must look at the record of another major auto maker, the Chrysler Corporation. Chrysler made a profit of $2.4 billion, met the fuel standard in 1984—and will meet it in 1985.

There are also questions of fairness and corporate responsiveness to the law. Chrysler invested approximately $4.4 billion, sold smaller cars (which have smaller profit margins) and obeyed the law. Ford and G.M., which can construct the necessary small cars, chose to enjoy the bigger profit of marketing a fleet of larger cars. Now they want to evade the consequence of their previous decisions. Is it really good public policy to reward these manufacturers for honoring the call of profit over the dictates of the law? If the standard is rolled back, Ford and G.M., will continue to reap the profits of a larger fleet, avoid breaking the law and evade large fines. And Chrysler will be penalized for obeying the law.

Lowering the standard would jeopardize our energy security goals. It is also unnecessary. The fact that Chrysler has met the standard and still turned a substantial profit shows that the standard is technologically feasible and economically practicable. It would punish a manufacturer that has fulfilled its corporate responsibilities to the Government, reward two corporations for falling to obey the law and cost the Government about half a billion dollars in potential revenue. It is an idea that, in the short run, serves only a few and, in the long run, hurts us all.●

HELSINKI HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 15, designating May 7, 1985, as "Helsinki Human Rights Day."

It is appropriate that this day should be so designated, for it also marks the convening in Ottawa of the CSCE Human Rights Experts Meeting. This meeting is intended to provide an opportunity for discussions regarding respect in individual states for human rights and fundamental freedoms, in all their aspects, as embodied in the Helsinki Final Act.

The record of compliance by the Soviet Union in the important area of emigration rights has been disappointing. Of particular concern to me has been the frustrated efforts of many Soviet citizens to obtain permission to leave the Soviet Union in order to be reunited with their families living outside of the country.

I was made painfully aware of the anguish of divided families during my 1983 visit to the Soviet Union. One of the most moving experiences of that trip was my visit with Mrs. Tamara Tretyakova Levin who, with her young son Mark, has been seeking permission from the Soviet Government to emigrate to the United States to join her husband, Simon Levin.

The case of Mrs. Levin has taken a tragic turn in recent weeks. To demonstrate her desperate desire to see her family reunited, Mrs. Levin began a hunger strike on March 18. Now in the 51st day without food, Mrs. Levin's condition is critical. Her anguish has been compounded by the Soviet Government's refusal to grant permission to Simon Levin to travel to the Soviet Union to take custody of their son, Mark.

The tragedy of the Levin family has recently been brought to the attention of the American people through stories in the Washington Post and other newspapers around the country.

Despite numerous previous U.S. appeals on Mrs. Levin's behalf and the recent Senate letter to General Secretary Gorbachev, signed by nearly 30 Members of this body, the Soviet Government continues to deny Mrs. Levin's 7½-year request to emigrate.

Although time is quickly running out on Mrs. Levin and on our ability to help her, we must not give up.

The Helsinki accords, signed some 10 years ago, have provided hope for Mrs. Levin and others like her who have been fighting for their human rights. As one of the 35 signatories of the Helsinki accords, the Soviet Union has pledged to uphold the basic human rights of its citizens. It is to that pledge that we who enjoy freedom must direct the attention of the Soviet Government, and urge that the principles of the Helsinki accords be honored.●

FRANK COX AND RAY DEBENHAM, ALASKA'S SMALL BUSINESS HONOREES

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, it is a pleasure during Small Business Week to recognize two of my fellow Alaskans, Frank Cox and Ray Debenham, who are the recipients of prestigious awards because of their promotion of small business enterprise.

Ray Debenham is Alaska's "State Small Business Person of the Year." Ray started his business, the Debenham Electric Supply Co., Inc., the day his former place of employment shut its doors. He did that with just $2,800. Within a year he obtained a small business loan through his bank. His electric supply wholesale business grew quickly and has expanded its base of operation from Anchorage to Kenai, Fairbanks, and Wasilla, AK, as well as to the States of Washington and Utah. I am proud of Ray's personal initiative and promotion of economic opportunity.

Frank Cox is this year's recipient of the SBA's Gold Medal Award. This award is intended to recognize the one SBA employee who has made the most significant overall contribution to the promotion of free enterprise. Frank has 15 years of Federal service, all of it as the District Director of the SBA in Anchorage. Among his achievements is that the Alaska district is the first in the Nation to enlist every bank in the guarantee loan program. Alaska's program is the third most active on the west coast and has the lowest loan failure rate in the country.

The SBA and Frank Cox have played a significant role in the development of Alaska's economy. The Agency has provided much needed loans to businesses during times when it was difficult to attract investment capital into the State. It is still doing so, in fact, in fiscal year 1983, the SBA loaned $72.5 million to Alaska businessmen, the second highest loan volume in the country.

The SBA has also played a significant role in helping the State recover from the devastating 1964 Good Friday earthquake and in helping Fairbanks recover after a severe flood in 1967. The SBA has been good to Alaska and has given many Alaskans the opportunity to exercise their entrepreneurial spirit.

Mr. President, I am pleased to have this opportunity to highlight the contributions of Frank and Ray who are close personal friends of mine. It is a great honor to share their well-deserved achievements with my colleagues in the Senate.●

FORGING SUCCESS: RHODE ISLAND'S SMALL BUSINESS PERSON OF THE YEAR

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this is the season of the year when we honor people who have been designated Small Business Persons of the Year from the various States, and I am particularly pleased to call attention to Rhode Island's representative this year because he seems to epitomize the very best in entrepreneurial initiative and imagination.

Jim Morrill came to our State just 3 years ago because he found there a unique opportunity to merge a good idea with the means to bring it to fruition.

The idea was to concentrate on the production of high quality, "bottom poured" steel ingots from scrap metal, for use by the steel forging industry. The unique opportunity was presented by the availability of a small steel plant in East Providence which was offered for sale in a bankruptcy proceeding.

Morrill was able to acquire the plant at a favorable price and then raised $3 million in capital with the help of two

SBA loans. Rhode Island Forging Steel shipped its first ingots in May 1983 and showed a profit 3 months later. In 1984, it realized profits of $1.5 million on sales of $14 million, and sales are expected to double in the next 3 years. The plant now employs a work force of 52.

Jim Morrill's success story is a classic affirmation of the merits of the Small Business Administration's loan guarantee program, without which his thriving business might not have gotten off the ground. His story merits special attention at this time of challenge to the SBA and its programs.

The Morrill story has been told in considerable detail and color in an article entitled "Forging Success" which appeared in the April 14, 1985 issue of Rhode Island Business Fortnightly. I wish to note especially that the article was written by a promising young journalist named John H. Chafee Jr., the son of our distinguished colleague. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

FORGING SUCCESS

(By John H. Chafee Jr.)

Beneath the glass top on James F. Morrill's desk lies a slip of paper reading: "The greatest pleasure in life is doing what people say you cannot do."

The "people" in Morrill's case are the bankers and venture capitalists who declined in droves to help finance the start-up of his specialty steel mill in East Providence—Rhode Island Forging Steel.

Today, two years after firing up its 40-ton-capacity furnace, the 52-employee steel company has captured 6 percent of the market for bottom-poured steel ingots and is riding into its second year of profits while winning accolades from customers, colleagues and competitors.

"Everyone's talking to us now," says Morrill, who has been named the U.S. Small Business Administration's 1985 Small Business Person of the Year for Rhode Island. That was not the case when the 55-year old steel executive brought his plans for a "mini-mill" to the Ocean State.

Morrill attributes some of this success to "being conservative"—in targeting the small market segment he knew the company could serve well, and in estimating the cost of running the business—but adds there was an unforeseen element in the outcome of the venture.

"There was a lot of just dumb luck," Morrill says.

Closer examination reveals, however, behind the "luck," the story of a corporate soldier who, late in his career, left the ranks to strike out on his own in a "dying industry." In two years he has created a thriving steel-making company on the banks of the Seekonk River that reached nearly $15 million in sales in the fiscal year ending last March.

"It doesn't surprise me," Morrill says of his company's success. "The downside risks were there, but we really put this plan together."

It all began in February of 1982, when Morrill, already a 30-year veteran of the steel industry. learned that the Washburn Wire Company plant in East Providence was being offered for sale in the wake of the company's bankruptcy. Morrill urged his then-employer, the Sharon Steel Company ($700 million in sales), to purchase the plant and reopen it as a mini-mill producing steel ingots from scrap metal for the steel-forging industry.

Company higher-ups rejected the idea.

Investigating the market and plant on his own, Morrill confirmed the high demand among steel forgers for "bottom poured" steel ingots, which cost them less than conventional "continuous cast" steel and, through recent technological improvements, met the quality standards that forgers demanded; and he determined that the plant's equipment could be converted without too much difficulty to bottom-poured steel ingot manufacturing. The former Washburn Wire plant was "the ideal facility for high quality steel," he says.

Morrill left Sharon Steel in 1982, subsequently negotiating a price of "5 cents on the dollar" or $1.2 million for the 27-acre Washburn complex. With four other investors—two personal friends from Sharon, Pennsyvania, and two current customers—he spent the next year lining up forging customers for the steel ingot he planned to produce and raising $3 million in capital. The money didn't come easily.

"This wasn't pie-in-the-sky, but I really couldn't get people up here to understand," Morrill says of the business plan he brought to Providence from Sharon, Pennsylvania. "I was thrown out of a few offices," he says.

Nevertheless, by February of 1983 Morrill had pulled together the financing—25 percent in equity investment and the remainder a combination of an SBA-guaranteed debenture issued by Ocean State Business Development Corporation, a low-interest loan from the city of East Providence, and two loans from Greater Providence Deposit Corporation, one of them guaranteed by the SBA.

"We bet on the man," says SBA district director James Hague of his approval of the loan guarantee for Morrill's company. It was the largest amount ever guaranteed by Hague's office.

Morrill's group then bought the plant, and worked quickly to engineer the adjustments. Bringing vital components such as the water system and giant furnace back on line without major repairs were crucial initial concerns, he says.

"The furnace, the electric pumps, the vacuum—most of the expensive equipment had lain idle for almost two years," Morrill points out. The element of "luck" came into play when all the major pieces of equipment came on line without a hitch.

"It all came in on the money," he says. "In our two biggest areas of concern, we well exceeded our best estimates."

Despite the extensive planning put into the venture and his 30 years' experience in the steel industry, Morrill felt the weight of the $3 million investment as start-up day drew near.

Working to Morrill's advantage were the low purchase price of the facilities and the spartan cost economies he had of necessity instituted, which combined to give his company an extremely low break-even point. Rhode Island Forging Steel shipped its first steel ingots in May, 1983 and showed a profit three months later. Amid the decline of the big integrated steel mills, Morrill's mini-mill has been on an upward trajectory ever since.

In its fiscal year just ended (March 31), Rhode Island Forging Steel shipped 35,000 tons of ingots to steel forgers, up 100 percent from the company's first year. Profits have risen from $250,000 on sales of $5.8 million in fiscal year 1983 to $1.5 million on sales of $14 million in 1984. Overall, Rhode Island Forging Steel's profitability has been almost double that of the steel industry as a whole.

One of the ways Morrill holds down costs is to run the "heats"—the melting down of the scrap steel that is the main ingredient of the ingots—during the off-peak energy hours between 7 p.m. and 7 a.m. (RIFS consumes more electric power with its electric-arc furnace than any other Rhode Island company.) The plant during those hours is heavy industry at its most dramatic.

An electromagnet swings down from the dark overhead recesses of the building, sinking into a pile of silvery scrap metal. Clump by clump the magnet carries the scrap to a giant bucket, which in turn is emptied into a 30-foot-wide furnace on a platform. At ground level, in the distance, a 20-ton pot—the "ladle"—glows red from preheating while it awaits its molten cargo.

Once the furnace is filled, three 15-foot-long electrodes descend into it. A foundation-rocking vibration begins, and sizzling and popping noises emanate from the furnace before a 30-foot-long tongue of sparks bursting from an aperture in the furance as the electrodes unload their 25,000 volts. Within minutes the scrap is reduced to a liquid, emitting an intense white glow through the furnace opening. The 3000-degree solution bubbles and gurgles in a violet penumbra. Macbeth's witches never stirred a brew so infernal.

On this night too much carbon is in the melt—"Only when visitors come," says quality controller Manny Pombo, a former Washington Wire employee—and the five men at the furnace work to offset the imbalance, alternately pumping oxygen through a pipe into the mix to burn off the carbon and spooning out fiery liquid samples for the metallurgist to analyze for the proper alloy mix.

While the melt continues, a visiting industrial consultant marvels at the crew's performance. "All these men can do at least three different jobs. You wouldn't find this kind of work at Bethlehem Steel," he says. "I don't know how Morrill motivates these guys. If it's them against the Japanese, I'll take them."

After an hour, the problem is resolved: an overhead crane rolls the length of the ceiling, hoists the giant ladle, and positions it below and to one side of the furnace. A stream of molten steel gushes from the furnace into the ladle. After a few minutes the entire furnace tips 45 degrees, filling the ladle to its 40-ton capacity.

The steel goes through a degassing stage before it is poured into a 20-foot-high cylinder. The steel rises up from the bottom into surrounding cylindrical molds (hence the term "bottom poured"). After 48 hours, it is in its solid ingot form, ready for shipment to the forging companies which shape the ingots into gears, crankshafts, turbine rotors and other heavy industrial products.

While the technology for manufacturing bottom-poured ingot has been in use for decades, most steel forgers have preferred steel made by the "roll and bloom" method for its higher quality, despite its greater cost. Recent technologial advances, according to Morrill, now enable bottom-poured steel to attain the same quality as the "roll and bloom" product while remaining less expensive. Strengthening Rhode Island Forging Steel's competitive position against such giants as Bethlehem Steel and Morrill's former employer, Sharon Steel, is the savings made possible by the low capital costs of the company's start-up financing.

"We save our customers money (over conventional roll and bloom method steel), and we're well known for high-quality products," Morrill says of the impetus behind Rhode Island Forging Steel's steadily increasing sales. Ingot quality, reliability, and customer service were cited by customers as the key advantages held by Rhode Island Forging Steel, according to a report on the company compiled for the SBA by an independent consultant.

"With Rhode Island Forging, you know that you come first," responded one customer to the survey, which reviewed the first year and a half of Morrill's SBA-backed company. "Delivery as promised is the very best that you can get from any ingot mill, anywhere."

Typifying the company's efficiency, its lead times—the time periods between receipt of an order and shipment of product—are "by far the shortest in the industry," according to the same report. A customer in Texas cites an order placed and filled inside of fourteen days, enabling him to capture a major contract. "Where else could you get that kind of attention and treatment?" the customer asked rhetorically.

"Knowing the market," Morrill lists as one of his own advantages. "Hard work," he might have said as well. The company has been operating Sunday through Friday for most of the past year, and its employees average "50 hours a week, easy," according to one worker, who went on to express admiration for his boss, saying "He took nothing, and he made something."

Asked how he motivates his workers, Morrill replies quickly, "You give them an identity, develop teamwork. People will take pride in their work if you give them an opportunity . . .

"Pride in your work," he muses. "Hell. That's the greatest feeling in the world!"

One basic tenet of Morrill's management philosophy is that all employees in the nonunion plant rotate into different job functions, from "melter" at the furnace to quality control.

Morrill notes that not everything went according to plan during the first year. "Soon after we started business, sales prices for steel ingots dropped 30 percent," he says. "Our business plan was pretty conservative to begin with, and we've still made profits based on other things going our way—mainly, the drop in interest rates beginning in 1983.

"The biggest error," he says, "was in the area of accounts receivable." An unexpected lag in customer payments impeded the operation's cash flow, and "it wasn't until May of '84 (a year after start-up) that we began to see daylight in our cash balances."

As payments began to come on stream and produce working capital, Morrill was able to invest in modestly greater economies of scale. For example, "In smaller shipments," he says, "'moly' (molybdenum, a key element of alloy ingot) would cost us $4.50 a pound; ordering in bulk costs only $4.00."

Against the backdrop of Remington Wild West scenes adorning the paneled walls of his office, Morrill can reflect on Rhode Island Forging Steel's first two years in business and his plans for positioning the company for sustained growth.

Ironically, or perhaps inevitably, the company's success has brought it to a critical crossroads. No longer the small start-up that could be managed by one or two people, Rhode Island Forging Steel has attained a momentum that necessitates investments in its own infrastructure—in personnel, equipment, and management.

Whether the company seeks to grow by broadening its customer base or moving into quality-enhancement operations such as ingot cutting and trimming, or into new markets altogether, in specialty steels for the defense and aerospace sectors, the path toward continued growth will be marked by greater complexity. Substantial growth often means reorganizing a company away from a one-man show, and for some owner-managers delegating management responsibilities comes hard.

Morrill's response to the suggestion that he will have to build the bureaucracy of the company is characteristically candid and enthusiastic. "It has to happen," he says emphatically. "I'll have to delegate authority. And I have to think about a successor to me," he adds.

For now, Morrill says he is "constantly looking at people" in anticipation of the increase in business he expects once the company's second furnace is activated later this spring. A major investment in quality control facilities, moreover, will enable the company to produce high-alloy levels for big-order companies like General Electric and Westinghouse. Morrill sees Rhode Island Forging Steel's sales increasing within three years from their current $14 million level to $30 million, a figure he concedes is ambitious.

As for himself, Morrill says he has only one main prerequisite for staying on at the company.

"I'll stay til it stops being fun," he says, with a big smile.

If his enthusiasm is an indication of Morrill's having fun, Rhode Island Forging Steel's boss should be around for a long time.●

50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ASSOCIATION

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today is the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration [REA]. Cooperative rural electrification in the United States represents a revolution of sorts, bringing farmers and other rural residents out of the 18th century and firmly placing them into the 20th century.

When most people think of Pennsylvania, they think of its cities and its great industrial base. Most citizens of the State have enjoyed the benefits of central station electric service from the dawn of the electric age. It was in Pennsylvania, after all, that the first hotel, the first church, the first street light, and—in fact—the first town were electrified.

But not so long ago there was another Pennsylvania. As recently as the 1940's, it was possible to drive out of the brightly lit city of Pittsburgh and, within an hour, walk into the homes of people who were living in another century. Just a half century ago, fewer than one in four rural Pennsylvanians had electric lights. Worse than that, they did not have the power to run machines, to generate heat, to provide communications with the outside world that electricity brings with it.

It was not that Pennsylvanians did not see the benefit of electrifying their farms and rural homes and businesses. More than a decade before the establishment of REA, Governor Gifford Pinchot appointed a commission to study the electric utility industry in Pennsylvania. One of the recommendations of the "Giant Power Survey" was that the State's electric utilities should move, with all possible speed, to provide central station electric service to all portions of Pennsylvania. Unfortunately, the power companies did not respond to the Governor's call to provide rural electrification. Many of the Commonwealth's rural areas where just too remote, too rugged, too sparsely populated to serve at a profit, they claimed.

The dream, that someday every citizen who wanted electric service would have it, did not die, however. Many organizations, such as the Pennsylvania State Grange, kept the idea alive and kept the pressure on the State government and the Commonwealth's electric utilities.

Wide-scale rural electrification in Pennsylvania had to wait another decade, however. The problems and costs of rural electrification, magnified by the Great Depression, required a national solution which carried the resources of the Federal Government.

Soon after Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the Executive order establishing the Rural Electrification Administration, the word that, at long last, it would be possible to "get lights" spread throughout the countryside. County agricultural agents, community organizations, and just plain folks wrote to Washington, DC, to get the facts about the Rural Electrification Administration, its work, and procedures. A woman by the name of Georgia Haefli of Steamburg in northwestern Pennsylvania was one of them. She held meetings in her community to explain how, with the help of the REA, farmers and other rural residents in their area could form their own electric utility, a nonprofit, consumer-owned rural electric cooperative.

At first, the idea seemed crazy. "If the private power companies, who know what they are doing, can't provide electric service to rural areas, then how can a bunch of farmers, unskilled in the utility business, do the job" went one of the arguments. But the meetings and discussions continued and finally, in early 1936, Mrs. Haefli's group and 12 other community groups in Erie and Crawford Counties organized the Steamburg Electric Cooperative Association. Today, this organization is known as the Northwestern Rural Electric Cooperative Association.

It is odd today to think that an event so simple and so commonplace as the setting of a utility pole could create so much excitement. But on August 5, 1936, more than 3,000 people gathered on the farm of A.D. Stainbrook to witness the setting of the first rural electric cooperative pole in Pennsylvania. As a side note, I should mention that Mr. Stainbrook, who was an original director of Northwestern Rural Electric Cooperative Association, still serves on its board. The reason that so many people showed up for this event is that it represented a new beginning for thousands of rural people in Pennsylvania and across the Nation. No longer would the farmer's workday be governed by the rising and setting of the Sun. No longer would schoolchildren have to study by lantern like Abe Lincoln did a century before. No longer would housewives have to pump and carry water by hand and cook over hot wood-burning stoves. No longer would rural people have to live lives as second-class citizens.

Yes, cooperative rural electrification represents a revolution; an American kind of revolution where people see a problem that needs to be solved and then go about the business of finding a solution. When we celebrate the establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration, we celebrate the work of millions of rural Americans who helped themselves to a better life. There are many reasons why we still need REA and rural electric cooperatives. But perhaps the most significant is that cooperative rural electrification provided a lesson in how people, working together and with their government, can get things done.●

CENTENNIAL OF GOUCHER COLLEGE

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, the faculty, students and alumnae of Goucher College will be participating in a gala reunion this weekend from May 10–12 as part of their yearlong festivities celebrating the school's centennial year. It is my great pleasure to commemorate the 100th anniversary of this distinguished institution, the first in the State of Maryland and one of the first in this Nation where women were afforded the opportunity to receive a college education.

Sharing the revolutionary idea that women were entitled to the same opportunity as men for a challenging college education, the visionary Dr. John Franklin Goucher and Dr. John Blackford Van Meter convinced the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in celebration of its own centenary, to establish a first-class institution of higher education for "the daughters of Christian parents." On January 26, 1885, the college obtained a charter of incorporation, and the Women's College of Baltimore City came into existence. It was to receive its present name later during Eugene Allen Noble's presidency from 1908 to 1911.

Reflecting on the first 100 years in Goucher's proud history we see an institution that remains committed to its founder's motto, taken from I Thessalonians: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good," and its founder's philosophy that this college should be one where women can achieve their personal and academic promise. It has held steadfast as well to its original mission: "The pursuit of excellence through the finest of traditional and innovative education."

Under the skillful leadership of President Rhoda Dorsey and her outstanding facility, Goucher College can boast a rigorous academic curriculum and an atmosphere that "favors the intellectually venturesome, free spirited individuals." The college is progressive in its adaptation to changing times, including computer literacy and internships in its required curriculum, one rich in tools to prepare women as professionals for entry into the modern workforce. While offering practical experience, the school has adhered to the principle upon which it stands. Having tested and proven the premise of a liberal arts education, the college fosters the development of the intellect, appreciates the diversity of the individual and stresses the importance of physical and social well-being.

At a time when educational institutions in our Nation face difficult financial times, Rhoda Dorsey has built a bright future for Goucher College. I am pleased to call the Senate's attention to this celebration and am confident this center of higher learning will have a tradition rich in centennial celebrations.

Mr. President, I ask that excerpts from an article in a Baltimore paper, the Messenger, chronicling the centennial celebration and the past and examining the present of this outstanding college, be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the Messenger, Jan. 9, 1985]

FROM PROMISE TO ACHIEVEMENT

(By Michael Ruby)

For the first time in Goucher College's history, the Towson educational institution is being called a party school. That's just fine with the college's faculty, students and alumnae who are in the midst of celebrating a year-long party marking the school's centennial year. And everyone has been invited to attend.

"We love to celebrate at Goucher and we think we have something wonderful to celebrate," said Martha Nichols, dean emeritus of students and chairman of the centennial committee.

"We wanted to do things with an awareness of the various constituencies that would be participating, including the alumnae, students, faculty, staff and, of course, the college's friends and the community. We felt that we could never accomplish in one week or one month the things that we set out to do."

What the centennial committee set out to do, continued Nichols, was to "celebrate the past accomplishments of the college, take a good hard look at where we stand today in terms of our educational standards, and try to determine where we might be going."

More than two years of planning was needed to set up the series of events ranging from academic symposia to an eight-mile foot race to a gala reunion/homecoming weekend in May. Regional events also are scheduled for friends and alumnae in Chicago, Philadelphia, Dallas, Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, Florida and Boston.

The anniversary's theme, "From Promise to Achievement, 1885–1985" has two meanings. One is the institution's growth from a one-building school in Baltimore City to the sprawling 287-acre Towson campus. The other, according to Goucher President Rhoda M. Dorsey, "evokes both the outstanding ability of our students and the remarkable accomplishments of the college's alumnae."

Throughout the centennial committee's deliberations, one common thread permeated the planning. It was the same that has been a constant throughout the college's history. "At the core to everything was our plan to celebrate our academic excellence," said Nichols.

"The promise in the initial founding of the college was to provide quality education for women at a time when this was not common. Not second-rate education and not an education that was an aping of education for men but one that had validity for the intellectual development of women.

"That's what made Goucher College special from the beginning and has kept it special throughout its 100 years. It is Goucher College."

LOOKING BACK

More than 100 years ago, another centennial committee was formed by the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church to consider founding a seminary. Three years later, the plan was changed to endow a college for women in observance of the American Methodist Church's own centenary.

"What they really had in mind was a boarding and finishing school," said Frederic O. Musser, Jr., a professor of French who is writing the authorized history of Goucher College from 1935 to 1985. "But Dr. [John Franklin] Goucher and Dr. [John Backford] Van Meter had a higher vision and convinced the committee to found a four-year college."

The Rev. Goucher was invited to be the institution's first president but he declined the honor. "Dr. Goucher had a great deal of interest in missionary work in India, China and Japan and wanted time to get out into the field,"said Musser. "So he didn't want to saddle himself with the administration of a college." Instead, William H. Hopkins served as president from 1886 to 1890.

In September 1888, the college opened its doors to students, who registered with $100 tuition, Two years later the U.S. Commissioner of Education placed Goucher, then known as The Women's College of Baltimore, among the top 14 Division A colleges for women in the country. By 1897, it was ranked among the top 14 schools in the nation—a group including Harvard, Yale, and Princeton.

Despite its academic success, the school floundered financially. "During the entire administration of Presidents Hopkins and Goucher (1890-1908) they were running up deficits which Dr. Goucher covered, primarily with money from his wife Mary Fisher," said Musser. "There have been a lot of financial ups and downs in the college's history. Mostly downs."

It took the leadership of William Westley Guth, who served as Goucher president from 1913 to 1929, to put the school on a sound financial basis. He raised tuition, nearly tripled enrollment and in 1921, purchased 21 acres of land in Towson for a future campus.

"Towson was considered fairly close," explained Musser, "and there were several large estates that could easily be put together for a campus. But the real reason may have been that people on the Board [of Trustees] knew people out there who owned land and could be persuaded in selling to the school."

"Despite its achievements, Guth's tenure was not without controversy. "Guth was a strong man who loved power and never hesitated to use it," said Musser. "He started out with a great deal of charm and a large following. But about half way through his term as president he became ill and his personality changed. He became abrasive. But he managed to clean up the previous administrations' deficit."

Musser cited at least one instance of Guth having been penny wise and pound foolish, however," Guth decided not to join the Seven Sisters [an organization of elite women's colleges]," said the French professor. "The expenses involved in joining were a little high and Guth didn't think the school could afford it. Just think," Musser marveled, "the Seven Sisters almost became the Eight Sisters!"

The Great Depression once again strained the school's budget, delaying construction of the new campus. From 1933 to 1937, the college faculty voted to accept a self-imposed 10 percent pay cut because of the school's tenuous financial situation. Not until 1940 did work begin on Mary Fisher Hall, the first building on Goucher's Towson parcel.

"Things were getting bad downtown with the neighborhood changing and the alumnae were pushing the Board of Trustees to build the new campus," said Musser. "Plans were drawn up for Mary Fisher Hall which would have taken about $600,000 to complete. The school only had half that. But the Board decided to go ahead anyway thinking it would inspire others to come up with the rest."

The money came in and Mary Fisher Hall was dedicated in 1942, but World War II halted any further construction. Goucher's sixth president, Otto Frederick Kraushaar [1948-1967], "essentially built the Towson campus," said Musser. "He is known as the school's great builder."

Kraushaar was the most charismatic of Goucher's presidents, contends Musser, and his spirit was well tested during the building period when the college was divided between two campuses and students were bused back and forth sometimes several times a day. By 1953, the move to the wooded campus in Towson was finally completed. After weathering the transition period, Kraushaar reigned over the school's 'Golden Age' from 1955 to 1965 when student applications were high and admissions very selective.

"I suppose the one thing that has surprised me the most while researching the school's history is the reputation for academic excellence it has enjoyed almost from the very start," said Musser. "That's in large part due to the excellent teaching faculty here and a Board of Trustees that was not content with following others.

"We have a history of firsts. Goucher College established the first department of physiology and hygiene in any women's college. Our graduates were among the first class at the Johns Hopkins Medical School. And we were the first school of our size or type to have academic computer courses as early as 1962.

"We've always been strong in the sciences and though there have been a few changes to the basic curriculum since 1888, mostly additions, the one thing that has never changed is our grounding in the liberal arts."

LOOKING AT THE PRESENT

Today, Goucher College boasts of 19,822 alumnae with 15,895 still living and more than 3,100 residing in Maryland. For those graduates unable to attend the school's centennial events held on the Towson campus, a series of satellite birthday parties are scheduled for various regions of the country.

"We've tried to tailor the activities to the particular interests, needs and preferences of the environment," said Martha Nichols chairman of the centennial celebration. "In Los Angeles, friends and alumnae of the school will take a cruise on John Wayne's yacht with a Dixieland band and a crab cake buffet.

"In Chicago, there will be a symposium with outstanding television personalities. And in Dallas, there will be a fund-raising dinner to start a scholarship in honor of Judge Sarah T. Hughes, the Goucher alumna who swore in Lyndon Johnson as president."

A seven-minute film about the college and its 100-year history is also available to alumnae groups across the nation. The movie includes interviews and a discussion between graduates and current students about changing social mores and how they have been reflected on the campus over the years.

The real highlights of the anniversary celebration are occurring on the Towson campus, with a special focus on four academic symposia, all featuring notable speakers-in-residence.

George Ball, former under-secretary of state and U.S. ambassador to the United Nations headlined the Conflict and Resolution Symposium that was held Oct. 15-17. Architecture critic and former New York Times columnist Ada Louise Huxtable was in residence Nov. 12-14 for the Style Symposium.

There will be a two-part Women Writers Symposium, with the Mar. 5-7 portion featuring authors Grace Paley, Hortense Spiller, June Jordan and Maya Angelou. The Mar. 18-21 segment will present novelist Joyce Carol Oates. Vera Kistiakowsky, professor of physics and experimental high-energy particle physics researcher at MIT, will be the main lecturer at the Science Symposium, Apr. 16-18.

"We are trying to present not necessarily people who are well known names but people who have made a significant contribution to their fields and are willing to share their excellence with the academic community," said Nichols.

"The symposia are a good way of bringing into the celebration the students and community."

A commemorative ceremony and reception is planned for Mar. 3 at Lovely Lane Church, the site of the original Goucher campus. And then on Mar. 9, an eight-mile race from the Towson campus to Lovely Lane will be held.

"Physical education always has been an integral part of the curriculum at Goucher," said Nichols. "Besides demonstrating the link between the two sites in the school's history, this was one of the things that many alumnae and students said they wanted as part of the celebration."

The centennial's grand finale will be a homecoming/reunion during the May 10 weekend, complete with a formal Friday night dinner at Baltimore's Convention Center, a day-long fair Saturday, informal Saturday evening parties with live music from the 1920's through the 1980's, and fireworks. Special Amtrak "centennial cars" will carry groups of alumnae from Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago to the festivites.

In the two years that Nichols has guided the centennial committee, she has been assisted by large numbers of alumnae all over the country. Their devotion to the school is not surprising to her.

"Graduates feel a loyalty to the college because they are aware of the college because they are aware of the growth they experienced in their four years here," she said.

Professor of French and school historian Frederic Musser adds, "The alumnae feel they were well served by Goucher. Academically, they were prepared to stand forth and achieve when they graduated."

One of the keys to that success, says Goucher President Rhoda M. Dorsey, is not so much what is taught but how. "I believe that we forget most of what we learn in college," she said. "The important thing is how one finds out about things.

"The strength of a liberal arts education is that it stresses literacy, cares about the development of critical judgment and teaches people how to learn.

"And Goucher is generally viewed as an institution of quality that makes demands on its students and pushes them beyond their limits."

Besides the strength in academics, other factors set Goucher College apart from similar liberal arts colleges. "One thing that is distinctive is its location," said Dorsey. "When it was first created, the college viewed the city as a laboratory, a library and a museum. And though we're now located in the county, Baltimore is still an asset for us. On orientation day I used to make a pitch to students and their parents to drive downtown and see Baltimore. Now they are coming in a day early to visit the city because they have heard about all the wonderful things that have happened.

"Baltimore, Washington and Annapolis are wonderful places for internships, summer jobs and permanent jobs and our proximity to these places helps."

The advantage of an all-girls' school is obvious, says Musser. "What it does is enable a young woman to go through her adolescence in a situation where she doesn't have the problem of direct competition with men," he explained.

"In many co-educational classes the voices that are heard are the male voices. Here the women learn to develop self-confidence which helps tremendously when they must deal with men."

But there is a "magic" about Goucher expressed by loyal alumnae that Dorsey finds a little harder to define. "I have to think it is what happens at a particular place between people that is the magic," she said.

"There is something about an institution like Goucher that makes it possible for the personal interaction and ties to grow that people cherish and are enormously strengthened by."

Dorsey doesn't pretend that Goucher College has a lock on that "magic." She says she feels the same way about Smith College, her alma mater. "But it was here at Goucher that girls became women and strangers became friends," Dorsey continued. "And some of that happened because of the kind of place Goucher was, is and hopefully always will be."

LOOKING AHEAD

"As long as it's a man's world, there will always be a need for women's colleges," said Barton L. Houseman, professor of chemistry.

So Houseman contends there will be a Goucher College celebrating its 200th anniversary in 2085. But whether there will be an actual campus with professors lecturing before a classroom of students, he can't say.

"My hunch is that within the next 15 years, college education will be revolutionized by computers," he speculated. "Computers will be so skillful that they will be comparable to some college teaching that goes on now. They will be able to talk in English and listen to the student speak."

Personally, Houseman would hate to see the end of the interchange between the student and the teacher, something that has been one of the building blocks of Goucher's excellent academic reputation.

"There's nothing to compare with the experience of students gathered in a classroom matching wits with the professor and each other," said Houseman. "I view Goucher as kind of a boot camp of women of intellect. Goucher says to the student to put aside the toga college scene and the rah-rah bigtime athletics. Give me your very soul for four years and I will do good thing with you."

Since President Dorsey took over at Goucher in 1974, she has seen this task made easier because of the computer. "By working with word processors, students no longer are burdened with retyping so they are more willing to go back and rework something until they get it correct," she said. "It has completely changed their attitude about their work and because they are willing to keep at it, their skills are improved.

"But the change in teaching has happened so quickly it takes one's breath away."

Dorsey is not one to look 100 years down the road. Instead, she has been steering the school on a steady, pragmatic course for the impending difficult years when the college-age populace is expected to plummet.

Three years ago, Goucher completed a $14.6-million capital fund-raising campaign that will help to renovate and refurbish the school's physical plant. The educational institution's endowment fund now stands at $33.5 million. And though historian Frederic Musser will not say how the Rhoda Dorsey chapter of his book is going, he does credit her with giving the college a bright financial future.

Dorsey modestly perceives her role as a facilitator. "I believe that what happens here, like life, is a result of tinkering," she said. "Sometimes it's a major tinker, sometimes a minor one. But my job is to encourage the faculty to do its work and modify the curriculum to meet the needs and interests of the students.

"Whatever technological innovations are introduced will not be looked upon with fear but with understanding and they will be applied to our benefit. But basically my goals are to keep the place pretty much the same. Goucher will always be preparing women to take roles of responsibility and leadership at the work place, in society and in life."

To know where Goucher College will be in the next 100 years, just look where it is today or was 50 years ago. It will be busy making girls into women and changing promises into achievements.●

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD-423.

The advance notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, May 7, 1985.

Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN,
Deputy Staff Director,
Committee on Foreign Relations,
Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated February 18, 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Southwest Asian country for major defense equipment tentatively estimated to cost in excess of $14 million.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Director.●

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE CLARKSON S. FISHER

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to Judge Clarkson S. Fisher, whose distinguished public service warrants our admiration and praise. Judge Fisher is being honored on May 17 by his friends and colleagues in celebration of his 15th year on the Federal Bench and his 20th year as a judge. I wish to join those in honoring Judge Fisher for his many accomplishments.

Clarkson Fisher began his legal career in private practice, serving with a Long Branch law firm for 14 years. From there he became a judge on the Monmouth County Court. Shortly thereafter, Judge Fisher served on the New Jersey Superior Court, and in 1970, he was appointed to the U.S. District Court, District of New Jersey. His two decades of service behind the bench have resulted in many important decisions, decisions marked by integrity and scholarship. Since 1979, he has served as chief judge of the court, managing a growing docket that has imposed increasing strains on the court in New Jersey.

I should add that Judge Fisher's commitment to public service extends far beyond his role as arbiter of the law. He has served as a New Jersey State assemblyman. He was legal counsel to the Long Branch planning board and the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association. In addition, Judge Fisher has been a member of the West Long Branch Fire Company No. 2 since 1955. He served as a trustee for Monmouth College.

Mr. President, I am pleased to join in honoring Judge Fisher today.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with the committee's intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notification which has been received. The classified annex referred to in the covering letter is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC., May 7, 1985.

Hon. RICHARD C. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding under separate cover Transmittal No. 85-30, concerning the Department of the Navy's proposed Letter of Offer to Korea for defense articles and services estimated to cost $14 million or more. Since most of the essential elements of this proposed sale are to remain classified, we will not notify the news media.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Director.

[Transmittal No. 85-30]

NOTICE OF PROPOSED ISSUANCE OF LETTER OF OFFER PURSUANT TO SECTION 36(b) OF THE ARMS EXPORT CONTROL ACT

(i)(U) Prospective Purchaser: Korea.

(ii) Total Estimated Value: Major Defense Equipment [1] (Deleted); Other (Deleted); total (Deleted).

(iii) Description of Articles or Services Offered: (Deleted).

(iv)(U) Military Department: Navy (AEI).

(v)(U) Sales Commission, Fee, etc., Paid, Offered, or Agreed to be Paid: None.

(vi)(U) Sensitivity of Technology Contained in the Defense Articles or Defense Services Proposed to be Sold: See attached Annex.

(vii)(U) Section 28 Report: Case not included in Section 28 report.

(viii)(U) Date Report Delivered to Congress: May 7, 1985.

POLICY JUSTIFICATION

(U) This sale will contribute to the foreign policy objectives of the United States by helping to improve the security of a friendly country which has been and continues to be an impetus for modernization and progress in Eastern Asia. The sale of this equipment and support will enhance deterrance and contribute to the preservation of peace and stability on the Korean peninsula.

(U) These missiles will be used by the Republic of Korea on its F-16 fighter aircraft and will enable these aircraft, scheduled for delivery commencing February 1986, to achieve their full combat potential.

(U) The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

(U) The prime contractors will be the Raytheon Company of Lowell, Massachusetts and the Ford Aerospace and Communications Corporation of Newport Beach, California.

(U) Implementation of this sale will not require the assignment of any additional U.S. Government personnel; however, one contractor representative will be required for 12 months in Korea.

(U) There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

WEST VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE URGES INCLUSION OF FORESTRY SECTION IN 1985 FARM BILL

● Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, it is my pleasure today to place in the RECORD the text of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 4, adopted by the West Virginia Legislature urging the Congress to include a forestry section in Congress' 1985 farm bill. The State legislature supports the inclusion of a forestry section in the farm bill to prevent the erosion and increase the productivity of marginal crop and pasture land.

As one who has long supported the wise use of West Virginia's natural resources, I commend the resolution passed by the West Virginia Legislature to my colleagues.

The resolution follows:

Whereas forestry plays a major role in the economy of this nation, with the expected demand for softwood in the United States to exceed supply, at current price levels, by the year 2000; and

Whereas there are millions of acres of eroding marginal crop and pastureland which will reduce the overall productivity of our agriculture and forestry land base; and

Whereas tree planting on those marginal crop and pasturelands will yield a greater average annual rate of return to the landowner and reduce erosion and improve water quality; therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Legislature of West Virginia:

That the inclusion of a forestry section to the 1985 Farm Bill that would provide federal incentives for planting trees on marginal crop and pasturelands, particularly those which are eroding at accelerated rates and those which will yield a greater economic return to the landowner if planted in trees, is hereby supported; and, be it

Resolved further, That the Clerk of the Senate forward a copy of this resolution to the West Virginia Congressional Delegation.●

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, after conferring with the Democratic leader, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 9 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATORS SPECTER AND PROXMIRE ON TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the two leaders under the standing order of 10 minutes each, there be special orders in favor of the following Senators: Senator SPECTER and Senator PROXMIRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m. with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, following routine morning business, the Senate will resume Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the budget resolution. There will be rollcall votes expected throughout the session tomorrow and on quite late into the evening, I would anticipate.

Mr. President, the first amendment for consideration tomorrow is expected to be the Kassebaum-Biden-Grassley amendment, the so called KBG amendment.

The time remaining on the budget resolution: Senator DOLE controls 1 hour and 50 minutes, and Senator BYRD controls 4 hours and 27 minutes, for a total of 6 hours and 17 minutes.

RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. SIMPSON. In accordance with the previous order, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 9 a.m. tomorrow.

Thereupon, at 5:50 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, May 9, 1985, at 9 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, May 8, 1985

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We pray, O gracious God, that during these days of remembrance and anniversary that our minds will be enlightened and our hearts lifted with knowledge of the courage of those who have gone before us. We are aware of so many who have suffered injustice and tyranny, whose lives were lost with only the hope of peace. We salute those who fought against evil in word or in deed, and for those who gave their lives, grant a holy rest. Gracious God, we admit our debt to so many and, as we celebrate anniversaries, may we be strengthened for our tasks in our day and time, by the faithfulness of those who have gone before. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 259, nays 157, answered "present" 1, not voting 17, as follows:

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO HAVE UNTIL 5 P.M. FRIDAY, MAY 10, 1985, TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 1872, DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION BILL, 1986

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services have until 5 p.m., Friday, May 10, 1985, to file a report on H.R. 1872, the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense authorization bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO SIT TODAY DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee be given leave to meet today, Wednesday, May 8, 1985, to mark up legislation while the House is sitting under the 5-minute rule.

I understand this has been cleared with the minority.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair at this point intends to forego the 1-minutes until after we have completed the resolution on V-E Day.

FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF V-E DAY OBSERVED AS A DAY OF TRIBUTE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 161) expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that May 8, 1985, the 40th anniversary of Victory in Europe [V-E] Day, should be a day of tribute to those who served and sacrificed to bring the war in Europe to a successful conclusion, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objections to the legislation being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY], the chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the distinguished gentleman from New York, the very able chairman of the Subcommittee on Census and Population of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee [Mr. GARCIA], for bringing up House Resolution 161, expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that May 8, 1985, the 40th anniversary of V-E Day, should be a day of tribute to those who served and sacrificed to bring the war in Europe to a successful conclusion.

I also want to thank the distinguished gentleman from Utah, the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. HANSEN, the distinguished chairman of the full committee, Mr. FORD, and the ranking minority member of the full committee, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR] for allowing the resolution to be considered in the House.

Mr. Speaker, the official ending of World War II occurred exactly 40 years ago today. It was called V-E Day because it was victory in Europe for the Allied Forces.

V-E Day was a historic milestone in the history of the world. It was a war in which almost every American had a relative who was serving in the military or who knew someone who had been killed, wounded, or captured. The significance of this day was the ending of a war so massive and destructive that the tragedy it caused to so many is still difficult to comprehend. Therefore, it is no wonder that V-E Day will always be remembered as the day that there were spontaneous parades all across America, with millions of Americans dancing in the streets. On hearing the official announcement of Germany's surrender, people in America and throughout Europe took to the streets in jubilation, singing and dancing to celebrate victory and the end of the war in Europe.

Many of us can vividly remember the day's newspaper headlines and the joy that prevailed. It was, as one of the headlines in the Washington Post reads today, "The Day the World Danced."

From a personal view to most Americans, the immediate cause of most rejoicing was the end of this war which had involved more American military and naval servicemen and women than any war in our Nation's history. The total number of casualties of Americans who served during the European theater totaled close to 1 million, with approximately 200,000 battle deaths.

The U.S. soldier, however, always considered himself a civilian who was serving his country temporarily while in uniform. Therefore, on V-E Day millions of Americans realized for the first time that they would see relatives involved who would return home from a long, difficult war. Many American servicemen had been serving overseas for many months, with a large number having been in Europe for years.

Thanks to our veterans, Mr. Speaker, and the veterans of the Allied Nations who put their lives on the line, freedom not only prevailed, it was strengthened. V-E Day was not the end of World War II. There was still much fighting and sacrifice ahead for millions of servicemen who were to help bring World War II in Asia to a successful conclusion. However, V-E Day is a day which Americans will never forget as the day that ended the totalitarian German Empire and was the beginning of a new age of freedom not only for Europe, but for the world.

Mr. Speaker, America is No. 1, and people throughout the world are free today, thanks to our veterans.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT], the ranking member of the committee.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, on this day, 40 years ago, the Allied forces announced one of the most significant events in the history of the world. May 8, 1945, was proclaimed Victory in Europe [V-E] Day. The day before, the leaders of the terrible Nazi war machine had unconditionally surrendered to the Allies.

During World War II, America united with many other nations to preserve freedom and democracy. Millions of people made great sacrifices, and many made the ultimate sacrifice, so we could have all that we hold dear. Many Americans are too young to have experienced the event of V-E Day 40 years ago, but, today, we should all be mindful of the valor and dedication of those who contributed to the successful war effort.

It was a united effort unlike any other. From the victory gardens to the munitions factories to the front lines, Americans determinedly worked and fought for the things they knew without a doubt were right. They kept faith with their ideals, and even in the dark early days of the war, never waivered or gave up hope. In the end, they achieved a resounding victory.

On May 8, 1985, we can learn from the example of the men and women who won the battle for Europe. They have our eternal gratitude for their courage and unselfishness. Today, we give them a special tribute and remember their noble service. We cannot adequately repay them, but we can continue to uphold the precepts they fought so hard to preserve.

I am most pleased to be an original cosponsor of House Resolution 161.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON].

Mr. HORTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. As one of the cosponsors of this resolution, I urge its adoption.

I recall that 40 years ago, on May 8, I was in Italy as part of the U.S. Army forces there, having landed in North Africa and Italy, and I recall very vividly how much we appreciated the fact that the war was over. It is a great pleasure to be one of the cosponsors of this resolution, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I rise to support the resolution. Last night WETA broadcast a film entitled "Memory of the Camps" on channel 26.

□ 1230

It was a film of the atrocities executed and administered by the Nazis at Bergen-Belsen, at Dachau, Buchenwald, Auschwitz and many of the 350 concentration camps throughout Nazi Germany. It told the story of the Third Reich being sustained by enslaving millions of people to work without adequate food or proper housing to produce for the German war machine. It showed barbarism and brutality at its worst. A British soldier was interviewed at Bergen-Belsen near Bitburg where 30,000 people died of starvation and disease. He said, "Now, having seen these atrocities, I know why I am fighting Nazi Germany." This inhumanity to humankind is so horrible it must be seen to be believed.

I have asked WETA for permission to rebroadcast this film on the House broadcast system, and as soon as that permission is granted, I will advise Members of the time that it will be broadcast. Every Member of Congress should see this moving film and be reminded of why World War II was fought and why we should never forget the horrow inflicted upon the civilized world by a barbaric band of Nazis. We shall never forget!

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

● Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, our great State of Kansas has shared in some of this country's greatest historic milestones, and in the First District people come from all over the world to visit the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library in Abilene. Some are scholars, some are those who wore the uniform and served with him, some are tourists, and some are young people who ponder and perhaps are inspired as they should be that a small-town boy who grew up in Abilene would one day lead the mightiest military force ever assembled to victory.

On May 8, a great deal of attention was given to the 40th anniversary of V-E Day, the end of World War II in Europe. For the next 2 months, the "Flag of Liberation," given that designation by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, will be on display at the Eisenhower Library in Abilene. It was the flag flying over the Capitol dome here in Washington at the moment the attack was launched against Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. One of the Members of this House, the late Congressman Maury Maverick of Texas, had the flag taken down and saved. It was to be flown over each of the Axis capitals as they were defeated in WW II. That order was carried out.

On the night of May 7, at a special 40th anniversary of V-E Day reception at the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library, its director, Dr. John Wickman, invited Col. Barney Oldfield, USAF, retired, of Beverly Hills, CA, to be the guest speaker. Colonel Oldfield worked with General Eisenhower and the Flag of Liberation kept crossing his path over many years. He made President Reagan aware of its existence, and it was the President's wish that it be a part of both V-E and V-J 40th anniversary activities. After 60 days in Abilene, the Flag of Liberation will be moved to the Harry S. Truman Library in Independence, MO, in connection with plans there for V-J Day.

Because the Flag of Liberation is congressional property, it seemed to me that my colleagues who do not know about it, and those who do, will be inspired by its wanderings, the meaning it symbolizes before history of a great effort by all the people of this country.●

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the victory over Nazi Germany which brought the Second World War in Europe to an end. That victory was made possible by the alliance between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Now as our two countries mark that anniversary, there is an important opportunity available to the new Secretary General of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev, an opportunity that will reflect favorably on the Soviet Union and that will certainly have a favorable effect upon relations between our two countries.

A number of Soviet citizens—veterans of the Soviet Army who fought to defend the Soviet Union during World War II—have requested permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union. Thus far that permission has been denied by the Soviet Government.

On this 40th anniversary of V-E Day, I wrote to Mr. Gorbachev and asked that he exercise magnanimity in the spirit of the commemoration of this great victory over the the forces of Nazi Germany and grant amnesty to 18 of these veterans, and that he grant permission for these men to join their families and friends in other countries, as they have repeatedly requested.

The youngest of these men is 65, and many are in their seventies. Their departure will not be a loss to the Soviet Union, but on the contrary, it will demonstrate the humanitarian sensitivities of the Soviet Government and its leaders.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend publicly David Waksberg, the executive director of the Bay Area Council for Soviet Jewry, for providing me with the list of 18 Soviet veterans which I have sent to Secretary General Gorbachev. David and the Bay Area Council have been most helpful to me and many others in the bay area. I am also indebted to David for his assistance in the establishment of the Committee of 21, which was formally established yesterday under the auspices of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus.●

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 40th anniversary of V-E Day, the day the allies brought an end to the repression and horrible atrocities committed by Nazi Germany. It is a time for celebration. It is also a time to remember all those Americans who served and sacrificed to bring an end to the war in Europe.

I hope my colleagues will join me in cosponsoring House Resolution 161 submitted by the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, SONNY MONTGOMERY, to set aside this day in honor of our World War II veterans.

I hope we will also commit ourselves to a meaningful reconciliation with the people of West Germany who are now strong allies of ours in the struggle to ensure that such tyranny as prevailed 40 years ago never occurs again.●

● Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as we discuss in the Congress the many conflicts existent in the world today, it is important that we pause to reflect the anniversary of the ending of the war in Europe.

Forty years ago on this day, the Allies accepted the surrender of the Axis forces and victory was declared in Europe. It was a truly momentous day.

As we all learned from our experiences or our reading of history books, World War II was the war to end all wars and lead to eternal peace for America and the world. Unfortunately, this serene outlook was later shattered.

The goal, however, is eternal. Peace for this Nation and the world should be the ultimate aim for us and for our peers around the globe. With the extreme capabilities of destruction which so many nations possess today, this goal takes on an even more important and urgent message. As Harry Truman once said, "It is all too obvious that if we do not abolish war on this earth, then surely, one day, war will abolish us from the earth."

I am sure that no one shares this belief more than the nearly 16 million Americans who served their country in World War II. There should be no greater testament to this goal than the 406,000 Americans who lost their lives in defending their country.

Today, let us continue the search for peace and honor those who served and those who never returned from the war to end all wars.●

● Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, today is the 40th anniversary of Victory in Europe, or V-E Day. On this day we should turn our thoughts to a number of things: to the untold suffering of the countless millions on all sides who died during this last worldwide conflict, to the great courage and sacrifice of all those who fought for the defeat of tyranny and the preservation of liberty, and also to the great achievements and long strides toward peace which have been made in Europe since the war.

It cannot be denied that the United States can learn lessons from the experiences of Western Europe since the war. Nor can it be denied what a tremendous contribution the Western Europeans have made to the security and prosperity of the West.

Mr. Speaker, on May 3, 1985, the Christian Science Monitor ran another installment in its series "Pattern of Diplomacy" by Joseph C. Harsch. Mr. Harsch's comments about what 40 years of peace has meant to Western Europe are so clear and thought-provoking that I would like to quote from his column at length:

This is an appropriate moment to notice what 40 years have done to and in Western Europe.

When the victorious Allies of 1945 swept up the Italian peninsula, broke across the Rhine, and ended the Nazi tyranny in Germany, Soviet influence and communist ideology were also on the rise. Many in the West thought of communism as the wave of the future. Many assumed that democracy as a form of government was an outworn idea whose time had passed.

Those anxieties have been dispelled . . . Forty years ago Spain and Portugal were fascist dictatorships. A U.S. president would not have been able to visit either one (now Reagan has visited both). Today both are sturdy democracies. And that has opened the way for them to become members of the NATO alliance, and prospective members of the European Community.

Forty years ago, Communist parties were powerful and gaining strength in both Italy and France. Today the French Communist Party has shrunk to a small minority status. and all of West Europe's Communist parties are weakened by inner divisions over attitude toward Moscow. No country in Western Europe is today in danger of losing its liberty to communism.

Forty years ago, those who believed in democracy watched in bitter helplessness as Moscow fastened Communist regimes of its selection upon the peoples of Eastern Europe. Today all, except possibly for Bulgaria, would embrace democracy and economic ties with the West were they free to do so. Their preference has been proved by a series of protest movements and even of armed uprisings against the tyrannies which Moscow imposes on them by force of arms.

If there is any rising tide today, it is a rising tide of preference for democracy in politics and a free marketplace in economics. Even China, to the horror of communist countries, is experimenting with revival of marketplace economies. The ideas of Adam Smith are again bold and radical. Adam Smith is on the ascendent. Karl Marx and John Maynard Keynes are both recessive . . .

The essential fact is that the Western Europe of today is entirely democratic for the first time in history and has achieved a level of economic prosperity that is the envy of most of the world. If it has not achieved full political unity, it has gone so far that the idea of another great war between any two of its members has become unthinkable.

The historic rivalries between England and France, between Spain and England, between France and Germany—those rivalries that plunged the whole world into two world wars—all belong to history.

The Europe of today is an economic community. Its citizens travel freely throughout the community. Their goods and their currencies move freely within the community. And all of them enjoy the ability to get rid of any government they dislike at the ballot box in free and honest elections.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, on this 40th anniversary, we must not forget those who remain in tyranny in Eastern Europe. We must not forget the present-day suffering of the Poles, East Germans, Latvians, Lithuanians, Estonians, Czechs, Hungarians, Albanians, Bulgarians, Romanians, and even the citizens of the Soviet Union.

We must look forward to the day when all of Europe will know the peace and prosperity that only Western Europe now enjoys. We must anticipate and work toward an era when all of Europe can strive toward unity and freedom. But President Reagan was correct when he told a gathering of West German youth that the unification of Germany, and indeed of all of Europe, can only come with the liberation and freedom of those who live in the East. Military conflict must, of course, be avoided, but we must not lose sight of our goals and ideals, and we cannot resign whole peoples to live in bondage.●

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 161

Whereas on May 7, 1945, after six years of fighting and destruction that led to the deaths of millions, German Nazi forces agreed to an unconditional surrender, thus ending the war in Europe;

Whereas May 8, 1945, the date of the official announcement of surrender, marked the culmination of the efforts of men and women of many different nations who were united by the common quest for peace and justice;

Whereas over four million U.S. troops, the largest American military force ever committed to a particular theater of operation, provided essential strength and made numerous sacrifices, with almost 200,000 giving their lives in battle and hundreds of thousands wounded;

Whereas many U.S. veterans who fought in Europe are now members of associations that gather regularly to commemorate the deeds and accomplishments of the Allied forces which fought successfully in the European theater, and such associations' efforts should be encouraged; and

Whereas May 8, 1985, marks the 40th anniversary of V-E Day, a day proclaimed to commemorate the Allied victory in Europe: Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that May 8, 1985, V-E Day, is a special day on which we should all pay tribute to the courage of those who prevented the course of history from veering from the path of freedom and who gave to the world a magnificent reminder of the constant vigil that is necessary for freedom to endure and, on this day, we should join with our veterans in renewing our commitment to maintain this vigil and to always remember the heritage that has kept us strong, secure and proud.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF MEMBER TO STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Democratic caucus and by direction of the caucus, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 162) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 162

Resolved, That Frank McCloskey, Indiana, be, and he is hereby, elected to the following standing committees of the House:

Committee on Armed Services (to rank immediately following Representative Spratt): and

Committee on Post Office and Civil Service (to rank immediately following Representative Sikorski).

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMERICAN MILITARY INVOLVEMENT IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, our Latin American and European allies have overwhelmingly rejected the latest of President Reagan's ill-fated attempts to bring the Sandinistas to their knees.

European officials are amazed the President would justify the embargo on grounds of "national emergency."

Venezuela's former President calls the embargo "an error following another error."

The Guatemalans and Costa Ricans are concerned the boycott would make it more difficult for Nicaragua to pay its debt to them. Costa Rican President Monge fears the embargo will ignite "a migration bomb."

Bolivia condemns the President for resurrecting the U.S.' big stick policy of the early 1900's.

The embargo has even sparked the criticism of Archbishop Obando y Bravo and the Nicaraguan Chamber of Commerce, COSEP, and La Prensa, Nicaragua's anti-Government newspaper, calls the embargo "unjust," charging it will "discredit the very cause (Democrats) are trying to defend."

That elder statesman of conservatism, William Buckley, has dismissed the embargo as a "lost cause."

Mr. President, listen to your friends and allies around the world. Stop this campaign to brand Nicaragua a threat to the United States. While there is still time, turn off the path of direct American military involvement in Central America.

WELL DONE, MR. PRESIDENT

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend our President for his masterful address today to the European Parliament. His message was both inspiring and challenging.

He talked of the shared struggle of the Second World War, and of America's continuing commitment to a strong partnership with Europe.

He described his vision of a future with a Europe filled with freedom, prosperity, and peace.

The President talked about the challenges of keeping the peace with an increasingly more powerful Soviet Union. He is to be commended for offering a series of practical steps for reducing tension with that country.

The President suggested that to reduce East-West tension, a series of steps should be taken to solve the current problems with the Soviet Union. These include exchanging observers at military exercises, and holding regular high-level contacts between U.S. and Soviet military leaders.

The President also proposed that we agree on confidence-building measures and that we establish a military communications link.

These steps are absolutely necessary in order to avoid future tragic incidents between our two countries.

I am certain that my colleagues will join me in saluting the President for a job well done.

LET'S CUT THE DOUBLETALK

(Mr. MARKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, President Reagan said the SS-X-24, the Soviets' new, accurate, solid-fuel 10-warhead missile, is a dangerous first-strike weapon.

But somehow the MX, President Reagan's new, accurate, solid-fuel 10 warhead missile, is not a first-strike weapon—it is a peacekeeper.

Let's cut the doubletalk.

If a Russian silo buster is dangerous, then an American silo buster is dangerous.

The MX is even more destabilizing than the SS-X-24, because it is a sitting duck.

Yesterday, Richard Perle expressed his personal view that the United States should let SALT II crumble, rather than retiring old missiles to stay with its limits.

Mr. Perle talks about Soviet cheating.

What he doesn't talk about is the fact that, in order to stay within SALT II, the Soviets have dismantled 190 SS-7 missiles, 19 SS-8 missiles, 160 SS-N-6 missiles, 10 Yankee class submarines, 308 SS-9 missiles, and 510 SS-11 missiles.

The administration talks about arms reductions.

Well, the SALT II limits have brought about more Soviet nuclear reductions than years of playing to the galleries at the arms talks.

SALT II has been one of the most powerful weapons we have to bolster American national security.

America would be better off if we ratified SALT II, and let the Richard Perles of this administration lapse into obscurity.

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY AWARENESS MONTH

(Mr. LEWIS of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, last Monday Eckerd Drug Store announced they will soon be displaying pictures of missing children on their shopping bags like this in the State of Florida.

If successful this project will be extended to Eckerd's Drug Stores in 15 additional States.

The initiative shown by Harry Lambert, the president of Eckerd's and the entire Eckerd Corp., is a magnificent example of how the private sector can join in the search for missing children.

Mr. Speaker, as each day passes more children mysteriously disappear.

I urge all my colleagues to join with me in recognizing the month of May as National Child Safety Awareness Month.

Through education, awareness, and prevention activities we can make a difference.

You can begin by cosponsoring my bill, H.R. 604, which helps States set up their own missing children clearinghouses.

Please join this private-public partnership to save our children.

TELEPHONE RATES

(Mr. WISE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I am holding a telephone bill from my district in West Virginia. Now, how would anyone in this Chamber feel if their telephone bill was going to increase anywhere from 46 percent to 245 percent? You would be mad and you would want to do something about it. That is the way my constituents feel, and that is why my office is taking steps to fight this proposed increase at our State Public Service Commission. There has been much progress so far, Mr. Speaker. So far, 20,000 West Virginians have responded by sending me petitions such as this, letters and telephone bills in protest. We have worked to have hundreds of consumers attend regional Public Service Commission hearings, we are organizing a mass consumer rally when the final hearing begins June 12 in Charleston.

But West Virginia is not alone, Mr. Speaker, and the fight is not just at the State level. In the past 3 years, local telephone companies have requested an unprecedented $10.9 billion in local rate increases and have been granted $5.1 billion. Much of the reason given is that to keep large users from bypassing local telephone companies, consumers must pay more.

Only action at the Federal level can deal with this problem, Mr. Speaker, and I urge Members to cosponsor legislation I have introduced.

Mr. Speaker, West Virginians are showing how to organize at the State level, but I fear this experience is going to be repeated across the country if Congress does not act.

ASIAN/PACIFIC AMERICAN HERITAGE WEEK

(Mr. BLAZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLAZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise, in these my first remarks on the House floor, to mark Asian/Pacific American Heritage Week, our Nation's future in the age of the Pacific and my territory's quest for a larger role in that bright future.

I chose this time to deliver my initial message because President Ronald Reagan has chosen this week to applaud the achievements and contributions of Asian/Pacific Americans to our national development.

There are 4 million Americans who can trace their ancestral roots to the Asian/Pacific region and the achievements of the sons and daughters of the East span the spectrum of the arts, sciences, and professions.

Yet their greatest contribution may be their role as a bridge to East Asia in the age of the Pacific.

America has been traditionally a European-facing nation. But our destiny is in the Asian/Pacific world.

Our two-way trade with East Asia—more than $1.6 trillion last year—has surpassed our total annual trade with our traditional European allies. Our military commitment to the area has guaranteed the stability that permitted this phenomenal economic growth.

America's Pacific territories play a vital role in the emerging Pacific era, where President Reagan has said the future of the world lies. Guam, as the keystone of our Micronesian gateway to East Asia, is ready and willing to play a larger role at the crossroads of our major Asian trading routes and lines of communication across the Pacific.

The Compact of Free Association, which lies before this House for consideration, secures our national security interests in the region and fulfills the aspirations of our Pacific wards in Micronesia, which straddles the Pacific from Hawaii to Guam.

The compact fulfills commitments this Nation made in the Atlantic Charter and the 1947 trusteeship agreement to promote self-determination for the people of Micronesia.

The Micronesians have come of age and are ready to assume their international role at our side, close allies and valuable members of our political family.

Guam, the American democracy that has served as a beacon and model of economic development for Micronesia, has been a member of the American family for 87 years. Guam, the star pupil of the territories, asks you to consider a resolution supporting our quest for a stronger, more politically mature relationship.

We seek your endorsement of a fair consideration for our Commonwealth status. The people of Guam have demonstrated their lasting commitment to American democracy and have manifested exemplary loyalty as American citizens in defense of their country.

LET US KEEP THE INTERSTATE TRANSFER PROGRAM INTACT

(Mr. LIPINSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the administration's fiscal year 1986 Transportation budget contains a provision that would combine the transit and highway elements of the Interstate Transfer Program and reduce overall funding by $250 million—this would be a 24-percent cut.

This ill-advised proposal will delay urgently needed highway and transit project funding and drive up project costs. The combining of the two programs by the Department of Transportation will constitute a breach of the value for value bargain struck between the Federal Government and transfer recipients when local interstate projects were withdrawn in favor of funding for substitute transit and highway projects.

When these trade-ins occurred, State and local governments were assured that the exact same funding that would have been available for the completion of the interstate project would be available to complete the substitute transit and highway projects. Local areas were further assured that once they submitted binding contract plans for the substitute projects, funding would be made available in a timely fashion to ensure a trade-in of funds that is equal to the cost of the original project.

However, if these programs are combined and the authorizations reduced, the program will be put into disarray. In fact, UMTA Administrator Ralph Stanley has stated that the Interstate Transfer Program will take longer to complete under this proposal, than the original 1991 deadline.

I urge all of my colleagues to join me in a letter I am sending to the Public Works and Transportation Committee urging them to keep the Interstate Transfer Program intact with separate funding for both highways and transit.

FIVE AMERICANS STILL HELD IN LEBANON

(Mr. O'BRIEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, there are many important considerations facing us today—but I think it is vital that we not forget the five Americans who have been kidnaped and are still being held hostage by terrorist forces in Lebanon.

One of my constituents and a personal friend, Father Lawrence Martin Jenco of Joliet, IL, director of Catholic relief services in Beirut, was kidnaped January 8 of this year. Three others, William Buckley of the State Department, the Reverend Benjamin Weir, a Presbyterian minister, and Peter Kilburn, librarian at the American University have been held captive since 1984. The fifth individual, Terry Anderson of the Associated Press, was kidnaped just this past March.

Mr. Speaker, I think we owe the families of these captive Americans—and, indeed, Americans everywhere—our assurances that none have been forgotten by the U.S. Congress. And I urge my colleagues to join me in calling on President Reagan to further strengthen U.S. efforts to secure the safe and timely release of these innocents held against their will.

RETIRED DIRECTOR OF THE DEFENSE INTELLIGENCE AGENCY SAYS 50 TO 60 AMERICAN SERVICEMEN STILL IN PRISON IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

(Mr. HENDON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HENDON. Mr. Speaker, last night on ABC's "World News Tonight," the former head of U.S. Military Intelligence, Lt. Gen. Eugene Tighe, said that perhaps 50 to 60 U.S. prisoners of war from the Vietnam war are still alive in Communist prisons in Southeast Asia.

No one in the world, except the Communist governments themselves, is more qualified to make the statement. General Tighe served as Director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, the very agency charged with determining the fate of our missing men.

Mr. Speaker, in response to General Tighe's past statements before Congress that U.S. POW's remain in captivity, and his statements last night on national television that perhaps 50 to 60 are still held, I again solicit support for House Concurrent Resolution 129, to establish the Perot Commission on Americans Missing in Southeast Asia.

House Concurrent Resolution 129 would establish as independent commission, headed by Texas industrialist H. Ross Perot, to determine first, if the men are there, as the head of Defense Intelligence says they are, and second, if they are there, how to get them home.

Mr. Speaker, what better way to get these brave men home than to support this commission, and what better man to head it than H. Ross Perot?

THE ANGLO-IRISH TALKS MUST BE BROADENED TO INCLUDE ALL SEGMENTS OF POLITICAL THOUGHT

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, recently, Sir Geoffrey Howe, the British Foreign Secretary indicated his support for future economic assistance for Northern Ireland, provided by the United States and the Common Market for any agreement that might emerge from the present Anglo-Irish talks.

As chairman of the bipartisan Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs, I wish to express my limited support for this proposition. For the past several years, I have advocated that the United States commit future economic aid to Northern Ireland. In fact, I will soon be introducing legislation calling for such assistance contingent on the British Government working with all parties to try and reach a political solution in the north.

The need for economic assistance for Northern Ireland is not in issue. It suffers from the highest unemployment rate in all western Europe. However, it would be immoral for us to provide assistance without strict assurances that it would benefit both communities. That cannot come until the existing Anglo-Irish talks are broadened to include all segments of political thought. The time for that is now.

ONE TOO MANY

(Mr. GREGG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, as we head into the end of the school year and into the prom season, I think it is important to stress to our students the concerns and the problems of drunk driving. We all know that this is a very serious problem, and one which can damage significantly the lives of many young people.

As a result of our concern in this area, myself and Congresssman SMITH have obtained from ABC Television a copy of the film, "One Too Many." This film will be made available to people throughout the State of New Hampshire by the New Hampshire Highway Department.

It is my hope that schools in the State of New Hampshire will take advantage of this film and will show it to their students during this critical time. Through this process, if we can save just one life or avoid physical damage to one student, it will be a successful effort, and I strongly encourage schools to take advantage of this opportunity.

LET US KEEP THE VOLUNTARY RESTRAINT AGREEMENT WORKING

(Mr. ERDREICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, 40 years ago today we all joined in celebration over the end of the war in Europe. Soldiers and civilians in both Europe and the States joyously marked the resolution of the conflict within Europe.

Today, we can look back upon the progress that has been made since that time in reuniting the Western European Community and be proud of the role our great Nation has taken. Past enemies are now close allies and work together for greater peace and economic prosperity for all.

But admittedly our allies today are also our trading partners and competitors. Just last year we concluded a voluntary restraint agreement on steel imports, strengthened by legislation passed by Congress.

Part of that agreement, which moved us toward reciprocity and fairness in international trade, included the United States-European Community pipe and tube arrangement, and the ink is barely dry on that agreement of 4 months ago when major attempts by some have begun to circumvent the import levels.

There are currently over 12 requests to bring imported tube and pipe through the short supply provision of the arrangement which would greatly exceed the European pipe and tube import ceiling of 659,000 tons for 1985.

In fact, two requests alone would exceed the limit by 72 percent. I have urged the Secretary of Commerce to reject these requests and he has done so. The particular products are not in short supply. An attempt is simply being made to get around the voluntary restraint agreements—an attempt to open up a loophole a mile wide and almost 500,000 tons of steel deep.

World War II is 40 years behind us. I thought our latest trade war on steel was behind us as well.

I commend Mr. Baldrige for his actions and urge him to keep the voluntary restraint agreement working—so more Alabamians and Americans will keep working.

U.S. ARMY'S QUICK LOOK PROGRAM

(Mr. MOLLOHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Speaker, recently, I had the opportunity to examine first-hand the American commitment to NATO and the people of the free world as part of the U.S. Army's Quick Look Program.

Quick Look offers Members of Congress a low expense opportunity to experience maximum exposure to American troops in the European field and examine the threat to liberty that exists across the barbed wire and walls that separate the two Germanys.

The 3-day, no-nonsense tour takes Members on a regularly scheduled Air Force cargo transport to Europe for an intensive examination of American troops, training and weaponry that includes a detailed briefing on the status of NATO defenses.

Mr. Speaker, there is simply no better way to see the results of military funding that this body must deliberate so frequently. The Quick Look Program is designed to accommodate the Member through an efficient use of time and resources.

I want to commend the Army for making this valuable opportunity available to Members of Congress, and I also want to commend the Air Force for its cooperation in making the program work.

I urge my colleagues to see freedom's front line of defense by participating in this important, very informative, no-nonsense program.

NEUTRALITY IN FEDERAL EXPENDITURES ACT

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the Congress needs a clear policy regarding the use of taxpayer dollars by nonprofit groups for political purposes. The Congress has responded in the past, and needs to do so again. Today, I am introducing the "Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act," which protects the rights of all groups in the marketplace of ideas.

The use of Federal dollars for partisan politics dates back to the spoils system, prior to the establishment of the Civil Service. Later the Hatch Act restricted the use of Federal resources and employees for political partisanship. Congress has clearly defined, through law, when lobbying and advocacy are proper and in the public interest. In general, however, the use of public dollars by nonprofit groups for political purposes is unfair to all people who do not receive Federal moneys, yet participate in the political arena.

The legislation I am introducing is a fair, commonsense approach that simply requires recipients of Federal money to do what is authorized by Congress, and refrain from political partisanship.

REPEAL OF CONTEMPORANEOUS RECORDKEEPING

(Mrs. LLOYD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of one of the measures to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement, I am relieved to be at this point in the process. I hope the Senate will move quickly to approve the conference report and the President to sign it. Our constituents are still pursued by the specter of recordkeeping. They are overwhelmed by the requirement but afraid not to make a valiant effort to comply until it is repealed. Not a day goes by that I don't get at least one call from a taxpayer unsure as to whether records have to be kept for this year—but not for next—or not at all. The 1984 provision created nothing but confusion. The mistake will not be corrected until the President has signed this measure reinstating the pre-1984 substantiation rules.

The conference agreement goes beyond the House measure in refining the recordkeeping exemption for vehicles not likely to be used for personal purposes. While some confusion may still arise, I think the fairly detailed list of exempted vehicles will be sufficient for most circumstances and I will be looking for the IRS to issue reasonable regulations for unmarked law enforcement vehicles.

I'm also pleased that the conferees clarified the working condition fringe benefit provision. One of the many problems with the 1984 act was that it called for a distinction between business and personal use but did not include guidelines making that distinction. As a result, the personal use of business vehicles, even if required by the employer, was considered taxable income. This was clearly unacceptable and again, I will be awaiting appropriate IRS regulations to eliminate this injustice.

On the whole, I think the conference report does what must be done and I urge the Senate to approve it and the President to move quickly.

NATIONAL EYE HEALTH CARE MONTH

(Mr. BILIRAKIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a lifetime without ever seeing a sunset, a flower, or the smile on the face of your child? Can you imagine awaking one morning never to see these things again?

Most of us, fortunately, will never be placed in this frightening situation. An estimated 47,000 people each year, however, do lose their sight. Every 11 minutes someone in this country loses his ability to see all of the precious things that others, unfortunately, take for granted.

The National Society To Prevent Blindness estimates that at least half of all blindness can be prevented. Increased public awareness of eye health care and ways to prevent eye damage is, therefore, crucial in this battle to prevent blindness.

To this end, I have again reintroduced legislation to proclaim January 1986 as "National Eye Health Care Month." My bill, House Joint Resolution 207, which has the support of the American Optometric Association, would create a commemorative month to urge all Americans to focus on the issue of eye care and the protection of the sight which serves as our most precious sense.

I would like to urge all my colleagues to join me in doing our part in the fight to prevent blindness by cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 207 and thereby help to ensure that the beauty of the world is enjoyed by all.

ORTEGA'S TRIP TO MOSCOW WAS NO SURPRISE

(Mrs. KENNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I read with interest news reports that many Members of Congress would have voted differently if they had known Ortega was going to the Soviet Union. I do not know how many is many, I do know that no one should have been surprised. Ortega has been there three times since 1979. I do know that no one should have been surprised to be embarrassed.

Many of his policies of censorship and suppression have been embarrassing, and I do know they should have been irate at the stupidity of the timing of this trip, but as Mary McCrory says, he might be in over his head.

But what we must remember, Mr. Speaker, is that the votes last week were on military aid in a covert war, not on Mr. Ortega's travel plans. We must continue to remember what the real issues are, Mr. Speaker: Whether the United States is intent on breaking international law before first pursuing political, economic, and diplomatic avenues to solve the serious problems we face in Nicaragua.

V-E DAY—THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, time has a tendency to blur our recollection of crucial events in our lives. Today is the anniversary of a day which we should keep forever fresh in our minds, the day World War II ended in Europe, V-E Day.

It was the final vindication by arms of our commitment to the freedom of man. We may have been naive in our hope that we were expanding the horizon of human rights, but our entire Nation gave its blood, sweat, and lives for a noble cause.

As President Reagan related to the European Parliament earlier today, we are right to remember our fallen soldiers and our exalted purpose. V-E Day should remind us all of the price of refusing to see evil for what it is.

May God save us from another such war, but may He also save us from making the mistakes which proved so costly in that great conflict.

We owe it to ourselves and to all mankind to learn the lessons of that war and to prevent its repetition.

PROPOSED REDUCTIONS IN APPROPRIATION AMOUNTS

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, it is coming near appropriation time. We have not spent any money in the Congress yet this year, but we are going to spend a lot from here on out—about $1 trillion.

I rise on this occasion just to put every Member on notice that on every appropriations bill—every appropriations bill, including supplementals and these junk things we get together at the end of the session called continuing resolutions—I will be seeking recognition to add to those bills the power so that the President can delete or reduce any appropriation.

Before July is over, this House is going to be asked to raise the debt ceiling again, and when we do, it will be by more than $1 trillion in 4 years. We cannot go on mortgaging the future the way we are doing.

Mr. Speaker, I urge careful consideration of my proposed amendment by the Members.

URGING REPEAL OF CERTAIN IRS RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to support the repeal of recordkeeping of automobile expenses for business use. If it is allowed to continue, every small business owner will be overburdened.

I am particularly concerned that the system is extended to off-duty police vehicles. Policemen are on call 24 hours a day, and many have lost their lives under these circumstances. And we are taxing them? They are grossly underpaid to start with.

This law is dangerous and precedent-setting. Think about it. What is next? Will Americans have to report the amount of toilet paper they use?

This Congress should be monitoring the power of the IRS, not increasing it or expanding it. I urge my colleagues to repeal this law which never should have been passed in the last Congress. Let us right a wrong for the American taxpayer once and for all. Enough is enough.

RECOLLECTIONS ON THE OCCASION OF THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF V-E DAY

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, V-E Day! What a glorious day in world history. Now the 40th anniversary—tempus fugit. Our President has just delivered a powerful speech before the European Parliament in Strasbourg on this important anniversary. Important for many reasons, among them that this is the longest period in 1,000 years that European nations have not been at war killing off one another's innocent youth. The President today used compelling logic to cover many subjects of critical importance to the mutual security of our European allies and ourselves.

Our European friends and we have come so far together in 40 years. Our great and giving Nation and those men and women willing to serve her then and now, and thousands will not live to see a 50th V-E Day anniversary, have truly put the nations of Europe in a safe position to grow and prosper in peace. We have helped immeasurably to block that cyclical blood-letting that has been Europe's curse. The world has never, never seen victors in our mold. Thank God for His guidance to our leaders.

Mr. Speaker, the centerpiece and final accomplishment of our allied crusade across Europe in the spring of 1945 was the liberation of the starving, tortured humanity viciously crushed in Hitler's concentration camps and extermination camps. The enormity of Nazi Germany's crimes defy normal comprehension. Staggering offenses against God and humanity.

Last night together with my wife I sat transfixed, awe struck, watching again 1 hour of 16-millimeter films of the camp survivors and the thousands upon thousands of emaciated bodies. I had seen somewhat similar films as a 12-year-old child in 1945, but this 1-hour program last night on PBS-TV's "Frontline" was something different. It had closeups of the horror. These black and white films recently rediscovered in the British War Museum archives, showed the indescribable, ghastly barbarity of totalitarianism degenerated into a demoniac manifestation of hell turned loose on Earth.

Mr. Speaker, I support the just proposed suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] in his efforts to show this heart-wrenching program "Memories of the Camps" on our closed television system here on Capitol Hill. We must periodically witness this horror, even in the very, very weak form of one dimentional black and white film, to give deep, passionate attention to the cries of the survivors and their loved ones, of "Never Again!" And—and to remind us vividly that it is happening again! Right now. At this very moment. In Afghanistan, poison gas again. Concentration camps again. Yesterday, today, and tomorrow, for 68 years in the gulags of near and outer Siberia. Genocide again in Cambodia. Millions have suffered a death of torture again. On the Iraq-Iran border, children by the thousands sent to their death again. Communist totalitarianism lives and it has far more staying power than Fascist totalitarianism, and it is far more seductive to our frailties and evil inclinations.

Mr. Speaker, may God help us and guide us in our endless struggle to confront man's incomprehensible inhumanity to man.

COMMEMORATING WEST VIRGINIA'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE ALLIED VICTORY

(Mr. STAGGERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, the proud heritage of West Virginia includes the demonstrated commitment to defend this Nation in times of great peril. As we celebrate the 40th anniversary of the Allied victory in Europe, I share the pride felt by West Virginians in the contribution made by citizens of the State four decades ago.

On the field of battle, West Virginians distinguished themselves. The Stars and Stripes will fly in every community throughout my district today to honor those who served and to commemorate the sacrifice of those West Virginians who died in defense of freedom and justice.

On the homefront, during the Second World War, West Virginia mines and factories produced coal, steel, chemicals, and other vital war supplies. This major contribution, a result of hard work and an expression of true patriotism, is a source of pride for the citizens of West Virginia.

V-E Day celebrates the successful defeat of forces that sought to extinguish the flame of liberty. I join with my fellow citizens in commemorating West Virginia's contribution to the great victory.

REAGAN FLUNKS HISTORY, AGAIN

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, Ronald Reagan has again failed as a student of history.

Fresh from honoring German war dead he journeyed to Spain to be met by hundreds of Spaniards protesting his visit, in part due to remarks he made last October but which were only recently published in Spain.

Mr. Reagan criticized those Americans who fought on the side of the Spanish Republic against Generalissimo Franco during the Spanish Civil War. He said,

> I would say that the individuals that went over there were in the opinions of most Americans fighting on the wrong side.

Ronald Reagan said this to a nation about to celebrate its 10th anniversary of democracy after 36 years under the dictatorship of Franco. The same Franco who enlisted the support of Hitler and Mussolini in his successful effort to overthrow the fledgling Spanish Republic. The same Franco who utilized the bombers of the Luftwaffe to destroy the gentle Basque village of Guernica, immortalized in Picasso's painting of the same name. And this is the same Franco against whom more than 3,200 Americans volunteered to fight in the famous Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 1,700 of whom never returned home.

Mr. Speaker, those brave Americans who fought and died against fascism were true freedom fighters.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE AID TO NICARAGUAN RESISTANCE FORCES

(Mr. McCURDY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a joint resolution to release the $14 million that was appropriated last year, subject to further congressional approval, for aid to the resistance forces in Nicaragua.

There has been a lot of discussion about whether or not we should allow the use of such funds for military purposes. This resolution does not repeal the Boland amendment. It specifies that the set-aside funds are to be transferred to and distributed by the Agency for International Development, and that they may be used only for humanitarian purposes. The Boland amendment restrictions would remain in effect for all other appropriated funds.

I have found a strong consensus among my colleagues that we must continue to put economic and diplomatic pressure on the Government of Nicaragua to live up to its commitments to its own people and to its neighbors. My resolution offers a way to pursue these goals, while moving any military options to the back burner.

Mr. Speaker, the administration should be straightforward with the American people. If the President really wants the $14 million he requested last month, he should not be concerned about having its use restricted to nonmilitary purposes, as he himself indicated he would do.

At the same time, I urge members of my party not to reject this approach simply for the sake of opposing the President. We should not be tying our own hands while Daniel Ortega is shaking those in the Kremlin.

It is high time that we fill this void in our foreign policy, and that we do so on a bipartisan basis.

THE PROGRESSIVE-REGRESSIVE TAX SYSTEM

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today the President said that he thought our tax system was too progressive.

Mr. President, is our system too progressive when General Electric and General Dynamics pay no taxes? Is our system too progressive when 9,000 millionaires pay no taxes?

Mr. President, the American people want tax reform, but it is not the kind of tax reform that you seem to be giving them. In 1960, corporations and the wealthiest 1 percent of Americans paid 43 percent of all taxes, Federal taxes. They now pay 17 percent of Federal taxes.

Our system has been made repeatedly more regressive and if your tax reform bill makes the system even more regressive than it is now, it is doomed to failure.

Whatever reform bill is passed by this House, if it fits with the needs of the American people it will restore some of the progressivity in the tax system that came in, Mr. President, before you and your tax proposals became the law of this land.

THE WESTERN EUROPEAN UNION

(Mrs. BOGGS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, when the President of the United States addressed a meeting of the European Parliament today, it was a cause of great rejoicing for people who loved freedom all over the world and a day of personal satisfaction to this Member. Because my husband, Hale Boggs and Senator William Fulbright of Arkansas had introduced and had passed a joint resolution in the Congress saying that the U.S. Congress was in favor of a Western European Union, we were invited to the very first meeting of the Western European Union following World War II in Interlaken, Switzerland, in 1948, and what a poignant scene it was to see people who did not know whether the other was alive or not, the great rejoicing among some of them, the great well of tears among others for family members who had either been victims of war or of atrocities.

I think this Congress should take pride, Mr. Speaker, that in a very bipartisan manner it did indeed support the initiatives of a great Democratic President and helped to establish the Marshall plan and to form NATO and thereby to make certain that the Europeans could have a European Economic Community and could indeed one day form this European Parliament. It is a lesson that all of us who are freedom lovers should remember and I hope the Congress will take justifiable pride in its bipartisan support.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE WHIPPING BOY

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my remarks, not to revise them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I heard a few minutes ago someone from the other side of the aisle standing up here and whip their favorite whipping boy, corporate America.

You know, I always thought, as a person who worked all his life and one who has developed several corporations over my lifetime, I always thought that corporate America was owned by people like senior citizens, retired people, who worked all their lives, had saved their money, had invested it in corporate America and now are using the dividends from those corporations to support their retirement.

Not only do those senior citizens own them, but so do all the labor unions, both public and private, that invest their retirement funds in those dirty, nasty American corporations. All the State retirement systems in New York State and California and throughout this country invest their money there. All of the private colleges and universities invest their money there and finally all of the churches and nonprofit corporations, these kind of people own most of the stock in corporate America.

Why do we not stop picking on the labor unions, the senior citizens, the churches, and all of the people who have worked so hard to build a strong economy in America?

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—RESOLUTION ASKING FOR INVESTIGATION CONCERNING CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privileges of the House, and I send to the desk a privileged resolution (H. Res. 163) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 163

Whereas, public law provides that the Congressional Record "shall be substantially a verbatim report of proceedings" in the House and Senate (44 U.S.C. 901); and

Whereas, pursuant to such public law the Joint Committee on Printing has promulgated a rule which reads as follows: "Only as an aid in distinguishing the manner of delivery in order to contribute to the historical accuracy of the Record, statements or insertions in the Record where no part of them was spoken will be preceded and followed by a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●."; and

Whereas, during the consideration of a resolution involving the constitutional prerogatives of the House to punish its own Members for disorderly behavior the Speaker announced that "it is essential that the Congressional Record contain as true and accurate a record of the proceedings as possible," advised that all insertions and extensions would "appear at the end of the proceedings with a bullet symbol," and asked Members "to refrain from making any changes in the substance of debate" (H. Res. 558, 98th Congress, Congressional Record, July 31, 1984, p. H8051 [daily edition]); and

Whereas, a resolution relating to the election of a Member also involves an important constitutional prerogative of the House, namely the right of the House to judge "the elections, returns and qualifications of its Members;" and

Whereas, it is just as essential in debates on such election resolutions that the Congressional Record contain as true and accurate a record of the proceedings as possible," and that "all insertions and extensions not delivered in debate" be clearly distinguishable in the Record from those words actually spoken; and

Whereas, the Congressional Record of May 1, 1985, carrying the debate on H. Res. 146, "relating to election of a Representative from the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana," contains two instances in which remarks of Members appear as if they were delivered during debate, i.e., without a "bullet," when in fact not one word of either statement was actually spoken, to wit, the remarks of one Member at pages 10003–10009, and the remarks of another Member at page 10014; and

Whereas, an insertion made by an identical consent request by yet another Member at page 10011 does contain the distinguishing "bullet" as required of such statements "where no part of them was spoken," and

Whereas, the proceedings of the House relating to the election contest in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana may be considered as relevant evidence in ongoing judicial proceedings and must therefore be preserved as an accurate record; and

Whereas, the accuracy of the Congressional Record is a matter touching on the integrity of the proceedings of the House and therefore raises a question of the privileges of the House; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules is hereby authorized and directed to:

(1) undertake an immediate investigation into the circumstances surrounding the inaccurate, distorted, and misleading Congressional Record account of the proceedings of the House during debate on H. Res. 146, "relating to election of a Representative from the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana," on May 1, 1985; and

(2) report back to the House, within 60 calendar days, its findings with respect to such account, together with its recommendations both for (a) remedying the specific inaccuracies cited in the preamble of this resolution, and (b) preventing the recurrence of such incidents in the future, including its recommendation as to whether the Record should contain a verbatim account of words actually spoken, clearly distinguishable and set apart from any remarks or words not actually uttered in debate and instead simply inserted in the Congressional Record under leave to revise and extend remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PEASE). The Chair will state that the gentleman's resolution does state a question of privilege.

For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Mississippi has undoubtedly expressed a concern shared on his side of the aisle and perhaps one that should be investigated by the House as a whole.

I, personally, believe that the appropriate committee to undertake such an investigation would be the Committee on House Administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman have a motion?

Mr. FOLEY. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on House Administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman wish debate time on his motion?

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, my impression is that that motion would be debatable for 1 hour, is that correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington will have 1 hour to debate the motion. A motion to refer the resolution is in order and is debatable.

Does the gentleman from Washington wish to debate?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman intend to designate the time that he would share in this debate?

Mr. FOLEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi for purposes of debate only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington is entitled to 1 hour and he yields 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Again a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his inquiry.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire, are we going to have the full hour of debate or have I been yielded just 5 minutes of that 1 hour, or what is the procedure at this point?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington is entitled to 1 hour of debate and it is in his control how much of that time he uses and how much time he yields to other Members.

□ 1320

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the resolution.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I demand 40 minutes under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to 40 minutes under the rule. The time will be divided equally between the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY].

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution I have offered raises a serious question regarding the integrity of House proceedings, for it goes to the very heart, the RECORD, of those proceedings.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is the official record of our debates. It is described on the back page of every issue as "the public proceedings of each House of Congress, as reported by the Official Reporters thereof." And public law requires that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD "shall be substantially a verbatim report of proceedings."

However, as my colleagues are aware, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not a verbatim account of our proceedings. Since at least the middle of the last century Members have been permitted to extend their remarks and insert speeches not actually delivered in order to save the time of the Congress. The widespread reliance on this privilege, however, has grossly distorted the record of our debates. It is often difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish between what was actually said from what was inserted. This can be especially troublesome when a court is attempting to decipher the legislative history behind a particular bill or amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution I have offered touches on just such a debate that could be introduced as evidence in ongoing court proceedings. I am referring to the May 1 debate on the resolution to seat FRANK MCCLOSKEY in the Indiana Eighth District election contest.

As my colleagues know, since 1978, the Congress has been operating under a rule promulgated by the Joint Committee on Printing that requires that "statements or insertions in the RECORD where no part of them was spoken will be preceded and followed by a 'bullet' symbol," in order "to contribute to the historical accuracy of the RECORD." This still permits a Member to utter just one sentence of his speech, and it will appear in the RECORD without a bullet, as if he delivered it all. Nevertheless, it represents some improvement over the days when all insertions were run together with actual debate, without distinction.

During the debate on the seating of FRANK MCCLOSKEY, two Members, who happen to be from the majority party, asked only for permission to revise and extend their remarks, and did not utter one word of those speeches. And yet, their speeches, through no fault of their own, appear without the required bullets. My staff has confirmed this by reviewing the TV tape of the debate.

On the other hand, a Member of the minority party, who made an identical request to revise and extend his remarks, in between the requests of the two Democrats, and who also did not utter one word of his speech, received the requisite bullets around his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the case of the missing bullets is a crime of commission or omission. It is curious, though, that the Republican in the middle got a bullet to the head and tail-end of his remarks, while the two flanking Democrats weren't even grazed.

But, regardless of whether this was done by design or simple clerical error, it does bear investigation by the Rules Committee and a reassessment of our whole RECORD policy. That's the purpose of my resolution and the opening salvo in what we will be calling on this side of the aisle, our "McIntyre Agenda," a constructive response and approach to the problems which plague this House. And the first item on our agenda is an honest CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make it quite clear to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that this resolution is not being offered as a frivolous matter, or with obstruction or delay in mind. The allegations raised by this resolution are quite real and serious, and the investigation called for by the resolution is wholly warranted given the facts of the situation.

But, I also want to make it clear that the resolution does have a larger purpose. That larger purpose is clearly stated in the "resolved" clause, and it is for the Rules Committee to report back its recommendations for "preventing the recurrence of such incidents in the future, including its recommendations as to whether the RECORD should contain a verbatim account of words actually spoken, clearly distinguishable and set apart from any remarks or words not actually uttered in debate * * *." Do we want a more honest and accurate historical record of our debates? I urge adoption of this resolution to resolve both the immediate incident and the larger issue of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reform.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN].

Mr. PASHAYAN. I want to thank the distinguished minority whip. I am the Member whose remarks were bulleted, and I certainly agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that the bullet was not aimed at me or certainly not aimed at my heart. But I think he raises an excellent point.

There is nothing less at stake here than the history of the House.

Not only do the courts turn to the RECORD to interpret what statutes might mean in the cases of ambiguity, but historians not only in this century but in the next century will turn to these very RECORDS when they come to pass judgment on what we have all done in these times.

The gentleman makes an admirable point and I firmly believe that the Rules Committee is the proper committee that ought to be investigating this whole matter. The House Administration Committee has to do with papers, and ballpoint pens, and paper clips, and wastepaper baskets, and that sort of thing. But it is the Rules Committee that has the expertise, has the background, and really has the tradition and the mandate to look into procedure. And this is clearly a procedural question.

I want to point out that I admire what the gentleman is doing today and I fully support his resolution.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for his comments and I know that this is an area that he has spent a lot of time on, a Member that is concerned about the rules both in the legislature and now in this particular body, and while he was not, you know, a target, or was not wronged, in a way, it is important that while you were affected that you emphasize that there should be a more accurate reflection of what happens here on the floor.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I must say that owing to the comity, not comedy, the comity that was occurring on the floor as a matter of courtesy, I am constrained to say that I was a little surprised when I saw the bullet there. Now, I do not know whether it was a .22 or a .406 Wetherby magnum, but the bullet was there and I must say I was a bit surprised, although it was there properly and of course the other should have been there properly under the same circumstances.

It is a question of the consistent application of the rules and that is, of course, obviously I think it is really beyond much serious debate that that is the purview of the Rules Committee.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman again for his comments.

Mr. MICHEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I will be glad to yield to my distinguished leader for——

Mr. MICHEL. Whatever comments I might make?

Mr. LOTT. Whatever comments he might make and for however long he wants to make them.

Mr. MICHEL. I appreciate the gentleman first introducing the privileged resolution because, frankly, when it was drawn to my attention I thought this was again one of those instances where there was possibility for some kind of chicanery or prejudicial treatment, one versus the other, or discrimination, and it is the kind of thing we have arguing around here on a number of issues having to do with the revision of the rules of the House by which this Chamber is run. And the gentleman well knows in our conference this morning we revised that package of revisions that we introduced on opening day and have memorialized our gentleman from Indiana, Mr. McIntyre, and to use that mechanism for the balance of this session to continually remind the majority side of some of those grievances we think we have on very legitimate grounds.

Here is one where the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] finds himself in a difficult situation and on an opposite number on the other side of the aisle, and for no other reason than one of these little mechanical things that takes place during the course of debate.

□ 1330

And it may be rather miniscule to those on the outside; to us it is one of those important things that if not checked at this point becomes something which is pyramided. So we have to make the case.

I appreciate the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] offering the privileged resolution. The issue ought to be enjoined.

I agree with the gentleman that the Rules Committee is best able to handle this matter. If there is a motion to send it to the House Administration Committee, I am reminded it was the House Administration Committee that gave us the deal on the McIntyre vote count just a week or so ago.

Now that raises another question. Now that is not impugning the motives and good character of my friends that serve on that committee, but it would appear to me the Rules Committee is the place for that matter to be adjudicated and I would hope that the gentleman's resolution would be adopted.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman on the other side require or take some time in this discussion?

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FOLEY. Parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, because of the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] there is 40 minutes of debate, is that correct?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. FOLEY. Is that equally divided between the sides?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is equally divided.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, on my own time I will take 5 minutes.

Is the gentleman [Mr. LOTT] willing to conclude his remarks?

Mr. LOTT. We have additional requests for time, but just for the sake of discussion I thought perhaps the Member would want to take some time. Then it would come back over here.

Mr. FOLEY. I would be glad to accommodate the gentleman in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the notion of an investigation of any inaccuracies in the so-called bulleting of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I think each side feels quite clearly that the RECORD should reflect to the maximum extent possible under the rules what goes on on the floor. I am a little concerned, however, at the suggestion that the only recent example of an inaccuracy has been to the disadvantage of a minority Member.

It is my understanding that only last week a prominent Member on the other side made a speech in the RECORD which was not given but was not bulleted. Under those circumstances it seems there has been no favoritism in the failure to bullet. In fact, it has occurred apparently on both sides of the aisle and I am sure without any intention, because of the very prominence of the Member on the Republican side who made the statement without a bullet appearing in the RECORD.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I was just going to say again I referred to a particular debate where it was curious that that was the situation. But I have no doubt that it probably goes both ways. I made that point during my remarks. I do not want to impugn anybody's integrity on this. But I do want to say that I think there is not a consistent pattern, and the result is we are not getting an accurate record of what is said and what is not said.

Now I have discussed this with Members on the gentleman's side of the aisle in the past and there are those who are not too happy with the way the record is handled. So I do not want to make it in this case just a partisan issue. I do not think it is. I think it is something much broader than that. I said that in my remarks.

I think there is a constitutional question here and it is a clear-cut question of the history and the record we make.

Mr. FOLEY. I say to the gentleman, I am perfectly willing to support the idea that this matter be inquired into. I think that is reasonable. I think it ought to be done by the committee that has jurisdiction over the RECORD which is the Committee on House Administration, and that was the purpose for my motion to refer. I do not want to prejudge any inquiry that the committee would make. May I suggest, however, that the assumption that the mistakes that have occurred are more than that or have some ulterior motive is hardly supported by any evidence that I know of. At the same time, it certainly ought to be a matter of inquiry if there is any serious allegation that more than just inadvertence and clerical error has occurred.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like also, like the distinguished minority whip to, repeat what I said. I hope that I made it clear, perhaps I did not, that I did not take it that the bullet was aimed at me. I do not take it in any malice or anything like that. I am sure it was an error of omission; it was an accident. So that is how I take it. I was not making any allegations or charges that there was something sinister or even intentional about it. I am sure that it was strictly accidental. But the point of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] still stands, and I take it the gentleman's remarks underscored his point, namely that there is an inconsistent pattern that works both ways in terms of aisle, and I would make the further point, however, that since we are talking about procedure here and rules and this kind of a thing will go long back into the history of the Congress, and doubtlessly it can be traced back to the Parliament before that, how the record was kept, under what rules are remarks made on the floor of the Congress, or before that the floor of the Parliament, accepted, written down and recorded. After all, when we wrote our Constitution in 1787, Parliament was our chief model and a lot of the rules and procedures that the early Congresses used were adopted from Parliament, from the English Parliament.

So that is a matter it seems to me clearly within the purview of the Committee on Rules to decide what the rule ought to be.

Now once the rule is decided by the Committee on Rules——

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if I may reclaim my time, I appreciate the fairness of the gentleman's comment about there being no particular suggestion of bad faith or deliberate misconduct here. I share that view, that if there is any problem, it is one with the administration of the rules.

I do not think there is any need to reconstruct the rule. The rule is not really under question here. The question that has been raised by the resolution is whether in fact an appropriate following or administration of the rule has occurred and that is why I insist that the proper committee is the committee that has administrative responsibility over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I took the remarks of the distinguished minority whip as being broader and farther than just merely the application of the Administration Committee.

I think what he was suggesting was that the proper agency within this House, which would be the Rules Committee, take a whole look at the idea of putting into the RECORD remarks not spoken on the floor as though they were spoken on the floor. I think that is the point the gentleman was raising, not only this particular rule and how it is applied but the whole idea of should we identify remarks not made on the floor all the time? Now I should think that is not the proper purview of the Committee on House Administration. Once again, that is the purview of the Committee on Rules because we are going to be dealing with the long and historical traditions and precedents, as I mentioned before, far beyond Congress, back in the English parliamentary history.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I repeat, if I can say to the gentleman, I think the bulk of this is an investigation of occurrences in the RECORD, affecting Members on both sides where there is some failure to carry out the rule. Any recommendation for changes in the rules can obviously be made not only by individual Members but by committees that have responsibility for the investigation. We have a disagreement on which is the appropriate committee. I believe very strongly that it is the Committee on House Administration and I have so stated.

At this time, does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] wish to regain some of his time?

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman. I wish to speak to the point he was making. Part B of the resolve clause in this resolution states this:

> Preventing recurrence of such incidents in the future including its recommendation as to whether the RECORD should contain a verbatim account of words actually spoken clearly distinguishable and set aside from any remarks or words not actually uttered in the debate and instead simply inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under leave to revise and extend their remarks.

I clearly intend for this to go beyond this particular incident. I would hope and that is why I specified the Committee on Rules, after all it is the Committee on Rules to recommend a change in the rule. I think that this whole process of getting an accurate CONGRESSIONAL RECORD needs review. The Rules Committee needs to do that. That is why I would urge the defeat of the motion to refer for a couple of very simple reasons. One, sending it to the Committee on House Administration would not get to the bottom of it, of the immediate incident since the resolution calls for the Rules Committee to investigate the matter; and second, and most importantly, as I pointed out, only the Rules Committee can report a new House rule to reform our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I think we need to do this. I view this in a much broader way than just this immediate incident which may or may not have been occurring on a regular basis anyway. I am worried about the long-term way that the RECORD is handled here.

□ 1340

Mr. MICHEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I am glad to yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. MICHEL. I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me, and if I might address myself just a moment to the comment of the distinguished whip, who made mention of no intended Members, or no intention on the part of Members but rather an administrative detail that could be faulted.

I am reminded of a supposedly administrative detail having to do with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] in a doctoring-up of a hearing record at one time, where the Members as such were not involved, but it was done at administrative level, and did real serious injury to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because the exact opposite intent of what he said was portrayed in the RECORD.

Now we can pass that off as there was an attempt to do at that time as an administrative error, but we are responsible, I feel responsible for every person in my office, every bit of administrative activity that takes place, eventually I have got to be responsible for.

As Members of this House, when it comes to the administration of the rules of the House, I think we have got an oversight responsibility of Members to make absolutely sure that those who are administering whatever rules we prescribe are, is done properly, and that is the issue here, and I do not think we want to lose sight of that.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have remaining on this side of the aisle?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 6 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I was just having lunch, and when I overheard that the subject of dots had become a matter of congressional debate, I could not resist joining in, because I have not had a chance to debate dots for some time. We used to connect them, and now we are disconnecting them, I think, taking up the floor of the House time, but that is OK, because Members are free to do whatever they wish.

I did want to respond, as I understood what the majority whip was saying was that he was agreeing with what the minority leader was saying, although the minority leader seemed to be thinking they were in disagreement. That is, the majority whip was saying that the Committee on House Administration was the appropriate place for the great dot inquiry, because it was not a question of a rule, but whether or not there had been a mistake.

The minority leader was suggesting that we are responsible for administrative mistakes. The gentleman from Washington was saying that this very grave matter of the misplaced dot ought to be taken up in the administrative oversight committee, the Committee on House Administration.

So the gentleman from Washington was not suggesting that this matter should not be looked into. He was suggesting that the appropriate place to look into it is there; he was not in any way disclaiming that.

I did want to rise though, because the gentleman from Illinois did refer to an unfortunate situation where there were some apparent, deliberate altering of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and those of us who have been privileged to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly do not want to have them altered; we prefer to have them preserved in pristine form.

I would want to make it clear that I hope no one is suggesting in this case that there was hanky-panky with the dots. That is, I hope that no one is suggesting that, unlike the previous case, there was someone deep in the bowels of the House who is dotting unfairly.

I think the American public has the right to be reassured that no one is playing fast and loose with the dots deliberately, and it was just an administrative error.

Mr. LOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Just for a couple of brief questions.

First of all, the gentleman is aware that these are generally referred to as bullets as opposed to dots, and——

Mr. FRANK. I will take back my time for 1 second. I understand the gentleman would rather call them bullets, and that is what the technical term is, but I thought it was useful that everybody should understand that the bullets we are talking about are in fact dots.

Mr. PASHAYAN. If the gentleman would yield, maybe we should compromise and call them BB's.

Mr. LOTT. Let me ask the gentleman this: Knowing the gentleman's interest in the way debate is handled here, and what the RECORD reflects, I would think that the gentleman would like for the record to reflect accurately what is said on the floor of the House, in that if it is not said it should not be so indicated; if it is spoken, it should be so indicated.

Also, that you would probably like to have a little bit stricter rule about making sure that we have an accurate record of the House.

Mr. FRANK. I would say to the gentleman, I very much agree. I also believe, I must say, in accuracy in reporting, and I think that while the technical jargon term is "bullet," we ought to be clear what we are talking about; it is a little black spot in the RECORD.

Yes; I am for accuracy. In fact, I do not ask that my remarks be revised and extended. Frankly, having said them, I think I have done my bit and I should not have to read them again, to go over them; that is for other people to do if they choose to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRANK. I ask for 1 additional minute.

Mr. FOLEY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman from Washington, who is the first person who has ever given me more than I have asked.

The point that I would make though, is that I believe that the RECORD ought to be accurate, but I think we have two separate issues here. One is, and the gentleman from Illinois is the one who underlined it: He said, look, we have a problem here, because someone has perhaps put a dot where—it is not that someone put a dot where they shouldn't have, but someone didn't put a dot where they should've.

The question of the missing dot was raised in a resolution—the gentleman from Washington says, let's find out. Because we do want the RECORD to be accurate as to what was said, and apparently we want the RECORD to be accurate as to what wasn't said, but should have the bullet next to it.

I would agree with the gentleman from Mississippi. I would like to see the RECORD be absolutely—whatever is said on the floor of the House with no ability to revise and extend. I would vote for that at any time, and if the gentleman wants to make such a proposal, I would be gland to join in. That is the practice I follow; I think people understand that when one is speaking extemporaneously, one is not always going to get every detail correct, and I believe in that.

I thought we had two separate issues, and perhaps it would be better, then, to separate those out, because there is the question: The gentleman from Illinois raised it. Did someone fail to follow the rules?

The gentleman from Washington said that goes to the Committee on House Administration to see if someone failed to follow the rules, but there is a separate issue, and Members on both sides want to do away with the revise and extend provision, and the poor people on our staff will not have to do any more of that work, late at night checking over what we said, cleaning it up for us, that is fine; I will vote for that, but that is separate than this issue.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as usual, when a serious matter is brought to the floor by the minority, there is an attempt to trivialize it by the majority, both in terms of the gentleman from Massachusetts' remarks and the attempt to send this to House Administration Committee, rather than actually put it where it should be, in the Rules Committee.

Because the problem here is that there is something drastically wrong with the rule. We have not had just a problem that is stated in the gentleman's resolution, the gentleman from Mississippi's resolution, we have a longstanding problem with the RECORD.

The RECORD has become a disastrous document. The public is often provided with deception, rather than truth about congressional proceedings. Those institutions of our society that have to rely on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to interpret our laws, including our courts and our regulatory agencies, are left relying on a mixture of fact and fiction.

It was not too long ago, in fact, in February 1983, that James Nathan Miller wrote in the Reader's Digest an article that he entitled, "Congress' License to Lie," and that sounds to me as though it is a fairly serious issue, and in fact got quite a bit of attention across the country.

In that particular article, Miller says, "According to Congressional rules and custom, what a Member actually does to his manuscript is a matter between him and his conscience. Nobody checks up on him. And so revising and extending has often been used as a license to lie."

He continues, "But they don't just wipe out words they wish they hadn't uttered. They also glue in whole speeches they wish they had delivered, and they alter words to reverse positions they wish they hadn't taken. As a result, the RECORD is probably the government's most untrustworthy official publication—up to 70 percent of what's in it was never spoken on the floor, and 10 to 15 percent of what was spoken doesn't get in it." End of quote.

A newspaper columnist, TV commentator, Jack Anderson was given 2 days' RECORD to look into, to examine against the transcript against the video tape. He took a look at this, and when he finished taking a look at it, that is what he wrote in his column.

He said about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it is quote: "A fraud, a travesty, a monumental sham." End of quote.

That is what we are talking about here. That is what we are talking about. The gentleman from Mississippi wants the House Rules Committee to look into a practice that has become a fraud, a travesty, and a monumental sham, and it is high time that we do so. It is high time that we go to the Rules Committee and force the Rules Committee to take a look at this practice that has been abused all the time.

I have been given a copy of something by the minority staff here where I am told, for instance, that 30 pages were inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without getting a cost estimate, as we are supposed to around here. One more abuse of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is high time, it is high time, it seems to me, we look into these abuses. The gentleman from Washington wants us to refer this to House Administration. To be buried? We have no time certain by when we are going to get this back from House Administration; there is a time certain in the gentleman's resolution, the gentleman from Mississippi.

We are going to get an administrative look at a couple of incidents of the RECORD—we need a look at the entire rule. The problem here is the rule that is not working right. We have got a RECORD which is a distortion, and is a laughing stock out across the country as an official document.

□ 1350

I congratulate the gentleman from Mississippi for bringing to the House a resolution that allows us to get at this question. I think when a nationally known columnist can call our official document a fraud, a travesty, and a monumental sham, it is something that we ought to look into and we ought not trivialize.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. GREGG. I think the gentleman has made an excellent point. You know, what we have here—and I have to disagree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, who does not appear to see the forest through the dots, so to say—is the fact that these changes which occur in the RECORD—and they seem to occur with an incredible amount of consistency, because I remember last year there was an actual rewrite of one of the subcommittee documents—are a perversion of the history of this House. And what is more fundamental to the integrity of the process of this House than its actual record and its history?

If we are not willing to change this consistent failure of administrative action, we are simply not going to be able to address this fundamental failure in our historical documents. And that needs a rules change, because there have been so many "administrative errors"—and I will use that term in quotes—that it is clear the rule has failed which is producing these "administrative errors," and this matter should definitely go to the Rules Committee and be addressed in a substantive way rather than a perfunctory and superficial way as is proposed by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. The press, other than Jack Anderson and a few others, is not going to be much interested in this. I found multiple occasions where my predecessor eradicated the black dot bullet and wrote in franked privileged documents into the district in 1984 that he made such and such a speech on the House floor. We went and got the RECORD, saw that he had not, and saw the black dot.

So there is a lot of dishonor involved here. Even if this is just perceived as a point of honor, let us not bury it in House Administration. Let us do something about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on House Administration, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I appreciate the gentleman from Washington yielding.

I want to correct an erroneous impression that if a matter is referred to the House Administration Committee it is going to be somehow buried and forgotten. That is far from the truth. Any matter pertaining to a committee of this House, any matter pertaining to a Member of this House, regardless of the request, each individual gets the same attention, be he a Republican or a Democrat.

I knew nothing about this resolution until I came to the floor. But under House rule 10, clause 1(k) subparagraph 7 of the Rules of the House of Representatives—and these are the rules—the Committee on House Administration has entire jurisdiction over measures relating to printing and correction of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am not going to tell this House where to refer the matter. But I am merely stating the rules of the House as adopted by this Congress on matters relating to printing and correction of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on House Administration.

This rule, which was promulgated by the Rules Committee specified the jurisdiction of the House Administration Committee. So if the Members on the other side want to change the rules, that is the jurisdiction of the Rules Committee. But once the rule is adopted on matters relating to the printing and correction of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it comes to House Administration.

I want to also point out to the House that there is a Joint Committee on Printing with Members of the Senate and Members of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] has expired.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. There is a Joint Committee on Printing. In this Congress there was a change of chairman. Senator MAC MATHIAS of Maryland, a Republican, this year is chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, and I am vice chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, because we alternate chairmanships of these two joint committees.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished chairman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I would like to finish my statement.

We alternate chairmen. There are three Democratic Members of this House on the Joint Committee on Printing, as well as two Republican Members, and the committee is evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, between the Senate and the House. So a matter pertaining to the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any other printing matter, should be referred to our Subcommittee on Procurement and Printing or to our Joint Committee on Printing. I just want to make the record clear.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the chairman yield for just one question?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] has again expired.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. LOTT. I thank the distinguished majority whip for that, and I thank the chairman for yielding.

I would hope and would urge that the motion to refer to House Administration would be defeated because I do think that the gentleman, in a way, has made our point. This does go to the rules or the rule of the House with regard to an accurate record. But if perchance it should be referred to House Administration, could the gentleman give us some assurance that within a reasonable period of time, as the resolution calls for, 60 days, that we would get a report back on this investigation, the result of the effort by the committee?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. As the gentleman knows, in January a certain matter was referred to the House Administration Committee. I was questioned on the floor of this House, and I said that we would bring a report back to this House by April 30. And, as you know, we brought that report back by April 26.

If this matter is referred to House Administration Committee and the House tells me they want a report back in 60 days, I will do everything within my power to bring a report back in 60 days.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] has again expired.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. May I have 30 seconds to yield to the gentleman from California? I do not want to deny anyone the right to talk.

Mr. FOLEY. I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. PASHAYAN. I appreciate the accommodation that the distinguished chairman has made in meeting the deadline, but I hope the point is not lost, the point you were making, that the examination of the rule and the question, "Should the rule be changed?" lies not within your very distinguished committee but lies with the equally distinguished committee, the Rules Committee. I am glad the chairman sees that, and that is the point the gentleman from Mississippi is making.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. These rules came from the Rules Committee. All I am pointing out to you is that the House in this session adopted these rules and that House Administration has jurisdiction so far as printing and correction of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are concerned. And if the Rules Committee in the House wants to change that rule, that is their business.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who cited my remarks and then refused to yield during this 5 minutes, stressed several times his apparent agreement with Jack Anderson that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a shame, a disgrace, and a travesty because people insert material which they have not said.

We ought to just be clear—and I do not myself do that, but the rules call for people to do that—that that is a bipartisan shame, disgrace and travesty, and I just wanted to get up and say that I hope he was not casting any aspersions on our friend from California, because, as I understand it, the gentleman from California had inserted some material to be carried in the RECORD which he had not uttered on the floor. And then the gentleman from Pennsylvania says this practice of the RECORD not being a verbatim thing is a shame and a disgrace. So I know he did not mean any reflection on that particular gentleman, because that is what the rules were, but someone might have gotten the implication that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was trying to make a partisan point, hard as that might be to imagine, and I just want to make it clear that the shameful travesty, disgrace that he was talking about is not only a bipartisan one but one which the gentleman fully within his rights indulged in, in this particular instance, and that is why we are where we are.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has 2½ minutes remaining.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute at the conclusion of which I intend to yield back the remainder of my time. However, I will indicate to the Chair that, following the debate, I intend to offer a motion, under rule XVII, to commit the resolution to the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the overwhelming bulk of the debate that has taken place here today has had to do with complaints that the rules are not being satisfactorily carried out. The whole issue of whether or not bullets were included is clearly a problem that has occurred on both sides of the aisle, and I appreciate the more generous comments from the other side that this is not a partisan matter, that Members have not been singled out deliberately or on the basis of party affiliation. Indeed I do not think there is any evidence of that, and the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished chairman of the committee, has given his indication in all good faith that this will be promptly reported back to the House after examination by the House Administration Committee.

I think that the House clearly should stay with the rules and agree to the commitment.

□ 1400

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, did the distinguished majority whip yield back the balance of his time?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in the brief time that I have left, I would just like to sum this debate up. Rather than getting into questions really of which committee it should go to, I think there are two fundamental questions here: Do we want an accurate RECORD of the House or not? And do we want the requirement for that accurate record in the Rules of the House?

If the answers to those two questions are yes, than we should defeat the motion to defer or commit, and vote for the resolution to require that the Rules Committee investigate the immediate situation, but also look at the broader question of how this House has an accurate report to the American people and to the courts of what we do as an institution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, under rule XVII, I move to commit the resolution to the Committee on House Administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 1869, REPEAL OF CONTEMPORANEOUS RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the unanimous-consent request of May 2, 1985, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 1869) to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements added by the Tax Reform Act of 1984, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). Pursuant to the order of the House of May 2, 1985, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of May 7, 1985.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DUNCAN] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI].

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report presently under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 1869, legislation repealing the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements added to code section 274(d) by the Tax Reform Act of 1984.

Under the conference agreement, the act's requirement that records to substantiate certain deductions and credits be contemporaneous is repealed, effective as if never enacted. Thus, daily logs of automobile use for business purposes are no longer required. In addition, the conference agreement postpones until 1986 the date on which the new substantiation rules, as revised by this bill, apply to local travel expenses, computers, and certain other "listed property". Thus, for 1985, the substantiation rules in effect prior to the Tax Reform Act of 1984 apply.

Under the conference agreement, taxpayers must substantiate deductions or credits subject to the standards of code section 274(d) by adequate records or sufficient evidence corroborating their own statements. Unlike the House bill, there is no statutory requirement that the evidence be written. However, the conferees agreed that, absent other factors, oral evidence should generally have less probative value than written evidence. Further, the conferees agreed that written evidence assembled closer in time to the expense sought to be deducted should generally have greater probative value than written evidence created later.

The conference agreement further repeals the contemporaneous recordkeeping regulations, the return preparers' penalty, and the special negligence penalty added by the Tax Reform Act. The conferees also adopted the House bill's provision requiring the IRS to issue new regulations by October 1, 1985, reflecting the provisions of the new law.

The conferees agreed to the House bill's provision exempting from the new substantiation rules certain vehicles which are not likely to be used more than a very minimal amount for personal purposes, and excluding such minimal personal use from the employee's income. The conferees expanded the list to include school buses, certain heavy trucks specially designed to store and carry emergency utility repair equipment, and certain moving vans where personal use is irregular. Treasury is authorized to issue regulations exempting from the substantiation and income inclusion requirements certain officially authorized uses of unmarked vehicles by certain law enforcement officers.

The conferees agreed to House provision which provides additional flexibility to employers by permitting employers an election not to withhold income taxes with respect to the noncash fringe benefit attributable to commuting or other personal use of a highway motor vehicle. However, an electing employer must so notify the employee, include the value of such personal use of the employee's W-2, and withhold social security taxes.

In order to ensure that the bill would remain revenue-neutral, the conferees adopted the House provision reducing the limits on the investment tax credit and depreciation for automobiles, with modifications. The maximum investment tax credit is $675 as in the House bill. Maximum depreciation deductions are reduced to $3,200 in the first year, and $4,800 per year thereafter. In addition, the inflation adjustment is delayed until 1989.

Mr. Speaker, the conferees, in my view, have come to a rational and equitable compromise on this issue, balancing concern for excessive and unnecessary paperwork burdens on taxpayers with the need of the government for tools to effectively administer our tax laws. I urge the House to support the conference report on H.R. 1869.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I happily rise in support of Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI in bringing this important conference agreement to the floor in this expeditious manner. Most of us have received a number of comments from constituents relative to the impact of the auto recordkeeping rules that were enacted in the 1984 Deficit Reduction Act. Needless to say, those comments were not of a positive nature. It was apparent early that the 1984 act provisions, especially as interpreted by the Treasury, imposed burdens that were not contemplated when the legislation was originally enacted. Recognizing these problems, the Committee on Ways and Means, under Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI's leadership, drafted a modification of those rules which was overwhelmingly passed by the House as H.R. 1829 several weeks ago. The Senate soon followed suit with a bill which had certain differences from the House-passed bill, including a very costly revenue provision. The conference last week worked out the differences between those two bills in a manner which I think equitably addresses the legitimate complaints with the 1984 act while not resulting in an undesirable revenue loss. Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI has aptly and accurately described the contents of the conference agreement. I will not repeat them. Recognizing that this conference agreement addresses a problem which was brought to our attention by numerous constituents, and which needs to be corrected, I urge the Members of the House to adopt it today.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to thank the chairman of the full committee and the ranking member for expeditiously handling a problem that all of us in the Congress had come to be all too familiar with.

There is no question that this regulation was an onerous burden on the people of America. There is no question that at a time when we speak of tax simplification and fairness and yet we have rules that are promulgated that make the tax system more complicated, we in fact invited abuse of the system. I think that the chairman of the full committee and the ranking member recognized this. I think that the people's voices were heard, and this is a very fine day for the House of Representatives for having heeded that cry.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this conference report and I would like to take this time to thank the Ways and Means Committee for its timely and beneficial action on this matter. I would also like to thank the conferees for insisting on the House provisions over the Senate version for resolving this matter.

The Congress should be praised for taking this step in a fashion that will protect our taxpayers and not reduce revenues.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference report on H.R. 1869.

The conference report adopts the majority of the provisions passed by this House last month, which would repeal the burdensome contemporaneous recordkeeping rules contained in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. While repealing those rules, the conference report contains the House passed provisions which makes the repeal revenue neutral, which I believe is necessary in these times of severe fiscal constraints.

I commend the members of the committee for their work on this bill. The recordkeeping rules extended the heavy hand of big Government to the Nation's farmers, small business, and public safety officials. Rather than make the tax code more efficient, the new rules resulted in the creation of more Government red tape, which as we all know only restrains economic growth and prosperity.

By passing this bill today, the House will be sending the message that the Congress is in favor of curtailing restrictive Government regulations and making the tax code work in favor of the public rather than the bureaucracy. I am proud to have been an early supporter of this legislation which will allow all workers to stop worrying about the IRS and get back to work.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS].

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me, and I rise in strong support of the conference report.

I would like to commend the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, and all the conferees for coming to such an expeditious conclusion and for adopting most of the House's recommendations. It is a great day for many people who felt a terrible burden was imposed by these regulations, and I am very grateful to the chairman of the committee and to the gentleman from Tennessee for moving this matter to its conclusion.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to a valuable member of the committee, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE].

□ 1430

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I seek this time in order to enter into a colloquy with the distinguished chairman of the full committee.

The conference report authorizes the Treasury to exempt from the $3 a day imputed income rule law enforcement officers when the officers are authorized by the empowering government unit to take a vehicle owned or leased by the employing government unit home for law enforcement functions, such as undercover work or reporting directly from home to a stakeout or an emergency situation.

A law enforcement officer is defined as a full-time employee of a governmental unit responsible for the prevention or investigation of crime involving injury to persons or property, who is authorized to carry a firearm and execute search warrants, who can make arrests and who regularly carries firearms.

Is it the understanding of the Chairman that if a local district attorney or the employees of that office meet the above law enforcement officer definitions, such employees would be exempt as well?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, yes, if they meet the applicable definition.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's clarification. I thank the gentleman for yielding the time.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee for yielding.

As the chairman well knows, this was an issue that spread all across the United States. Many Members of Congress heard from their constituents. It was a piece of legislation that was specifically refused in the Ways and Means Committee. It was added on from the other body in the last year's tax bill.

I am proud that the committee worked very hard, very diligently, listening to the public and trying to make what I call corrective changes, I think corrections that the public will be able to understand and be able to live with.

I would like to publicly thank the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee for his diligence in working with us and putting this piece of legislation together; more particularly in making sure that the House bill basically was maintained in the conference, but even having our bill strengthened a little bit so that this conference report is something that we can all be very proud of and I ask my colleagues to support it.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to observe how swiftly the Members of the House and the Senate respond when the public ire is raised and when regulations are irresponsibly written. The people's House reacts very affirmatively. This is certainly an instance where my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, particularly the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DUNCAN], moved firmly, expeditiously, and correctly.

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the passage of H.R. 1869, legislation which repeals the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements with respect to vehicles used for business purposes.

The Tax Reform Act of 1984 intended to ensure that deductions claimed on tax returns were accurate, but the resulting requirement that records be kept contemporaneously created an incredible paperwork burden. I have heard from hundreds of my constituents who tell me that the recordkeeping process which went into effect in January is a paperwork nightmare. A return to previous recordkeeping requirements coupled with information to be provided on individual tax returns is a much better approach and one which I think will ensure that taxpayers take only those deductions which the law allows.

I thank the conferees for recognizing the negative revenue effects of the Senate bill and for agreeing that the legislation not increase the deficit. The last thing we need to do is repeal an arduous, logging requirement and then, in the same breath, agree to provisions which would result in $4.5 billion increase in the deficit over the next 3 years.

I am very happy the conferees also addressed the problem of emergency vehicles being treated as a working condition fringe benefit when they are driven home by emergency personnel. Police officers, firefighters, and emergency medical personnel are on call 24 hours a day and often find the need for emergency use of their work vehicle during nonworking hours. This unique situation was overlooked by the Congress when it addressed the fringe benefit issue in the Tax Reform Act of 1984, making the corrective action taken in H.R. 1869 clearly necessary.

As an original cosponsor of House legislation to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement, I urge my colleagues to join with me today in strong support of this important legislation.●

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, the IRS regulations requiring extensive recordkeeping for automobiles used for business purposes really struck a raw nerve with all of us. I am pleased that we finally have that "turkey" plucked. The conference agreement is a reasonable approach to what has been a difficult situation and I urge my colleagues to support it. I want to particularly commend our chairman, Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, for his commitment to resolve this issue in a fair and timely manner.

Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on a few portions of the agreement. Both the House bill and the Senate bill repealed the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirement which was a major headache in this whole matter. The House bill did require some sort of written evidence to substantiate a taxpayer's claim that deductions taken were appropriate. While the conferees did not adopt this written requirement, we did make it clear in the report that written evidence is more significant than oral evidence in supporting a taxpayer's claim that a deduction was appropriate. We do not wish to overburden taxpayers with excess paperwork, but it is important to make the point that some type of evidence will be given less weight than others in determining whether or not deductions have been substantiated.

The conference agreement excludes from the substantiation rules a specific list of vehicles that, by their nature, are not likely to be used more than a very small amount for personal purposes. The agreement also allows IRS to issue regulations that exclude this same list of vehicles from income valuation rules. Mr. Speaker, while I don't have an extraordinary problem with the list of vehicles—although I might quarrel a bit with the specifics—I am glad we gave authority to the IRS to expand that list when necessary. In that regard, I also am pleased that we specifically directed IRS to provide an exemption for certain uses of unmarked law enforcement vehicles.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the revenue aspects of this bill. While I acknowledge and agree that our current budgetary crisis mandates an awareness of revenue-losing items, I had hoped we would not have to go beyond the limitations of the House bill. Under the House bill, we pared back both the investment tax credit and depreciation deductions on automobiles used for business. However, the conference committee was forced to limit the depreciation deductions even more in order to make the bill revenue neutral. I had hoped we could find another way to make up the additional revenue, but this was not the case.

All in all, Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a good effort that ought to be supported. We cannot continue to overburden our taxpayers with heavy regulation and this approach, I believe, will make us all breathe a little easier. I urge my colleagues to accept the conference report.●

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for this opportunity to express my strong support for this conference agreement on repeal of the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements of the 1984 Tax Act. I again want to compliment my committee chairman for his assistance in moving this legislation and, in addition, compliment the diligent work of the outstanding staff members involved in this process.

Last Thursday, the House and Senate conferees were able to reconcile differences between versions of contemporaneous recordkeeping repeal measures and adopted the House provision requiring the Internal Revenue Service to issue new regulations by October 1, 1985, which will reflect these changes. I especially appreciated the privilege of personally observing our conferees in action and commend this product of their efforts.

Briefly, I want to highlight two provisions of this report which were in the original House bill and the adoption of which will most certainly provide relief to individuals and businesses from sharp increases in the costs of recordkeeping. The first provision is that which exempts from substantiation requirements (under section 274d) vehicles which are not likely to be used more than a very minimal amount for personal purposes. School, buses, certain vans used by professional moving companies, and certain heavy trucks designed to carry equipment for emergency utility repairs were all added to the list of examples of such limited-use vehicles, and are thus exempted from the substantiation requirements.

I am especially pleased to note that the conferees adopted provisions that ease the burden from businesses engaged in trucking, sales, and a variety of other activities that lease, own, or operate from 10 to 500 vehicles. I'm certain that our local businessmen and employers will appreciate that our bill now relieves them from a flood of paperwork.

Finally, I'm happy to point out to my colleagues that under this agreement, no longer will recordkeeping be required for special-use vehicles, including marked police and fire vehicles.

Elective withholding is an important feature that should be noted by Members, which provides the widest possible latitude for employers and employees for pay period, quarterly, biannual, annual or annual FICA only withholding. Indeed, with respect to the revenue provision of the bill, my preferences may be otherwise but the concept of being sure that this bill is in fact, in the chairman's words, "revenue neutral" is a goal that we have met.

Again, I appreciate the opportunity to express strong support for this conference report and am pleased that it does reflect the majority of the hard work and efforts of Representative Beryl Anthony, Representative Buddy Roemer, and myself along with those of the Ways and Means Committee in developing responsible and fair legislation.●

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified to be able to join my colleagues today in the adoption of the conference report accompanying H.R. 1869, the repeal of the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements of the Tax Act of 1984. I hope this legislation will be adopted by this House unanimously.

This legislation, substantially similar to my own bill, H.R. 1897, which repeals the same section of the Internal Revenue Code, is an example of Congress working at its best. Few times in my 23 years in Congress have I witnessed the types of complaints and concerns generated by this requirement. The protests about the burdens of recordkeeping came from a true cross-section of the American public. This wide range of individuals who use automobiles for business, includes sales people, fleet owners, large companies, small businesses, realtors, and the farm community.

This recordkeeping section of the Tax Code came about due to a misinterpretation of congressional intent by the Internal Revenue Service. The IRS interpretation of this code was estimated by the National Federation of Independent Business to cost the consumer $7 billion this coming year to comply with the regulation. This cost, through lost time and effort, was posed against a potential revenue gain of less than $100 million. As I said when I introduced my legislation, never had so much been wasted to recover so little.

I am happy to report that efforts by many Members of Congress have come together today to repeal this section of law. I thank the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee for working so expeditiously to bring this conference report to the floor today.●

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference agreement on H.R. 1869, the repeal of the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements. I would like to thank Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI and the other conferees on H.R. 1869 for their expeditious consideration of this matter. I believe that Congress' quick action to repeal the burdensome recordkeeping rules demonstrates to the American taxpayer that we are able and willing to respond to their legitimate concerns.

Many small businessmen in Ohio's Ninth Congressional District—which I have the privilege of representing—were justly outraged by the onerous requirements placed upon them by the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements. Not only did they find these burdensome rules silly, but also a hindrance to the efficient operation of their enterprises. I must emphasize that Ohio's small businessmen, many of whom I have personally known for years, do not object to paying their fair share of taxes. Rather, they object to having to spend their time and energy recording for Uncle Sam how they spend their time. They would much prefer doing what they originally entered business to do: being productive and adding to our Nation's wealth. It is wrong when laws needlessly interfere with a business endeavor to be productive. This is why I support the repeal of the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements.●

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the House of Representatives gave final approval to H.R. 1869, legislation which repeals the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements for business use of automobiles imposed last year.

The regulations issued by the Treasury Department were overly burdensome, particularly on the small business community. Thousands of contractors, salespersons and others using vehicles in their business would have spent countless hours to comply with the paperwork mandate. I was pleased to cosponsor H.R. 1869, which lifts this burden, and I am delighted that this matter has finally been resolved. While this may have been an area of past taxpayer abuse, I think the remedy should not impose onerous requirements on honest business men and women. I believe the conference agreement provides a workable system for substantiation of these deductions.

The conference agreement essentially goes back to prior law requiring taxpayers to substantiate deductions by using adequate records or sufficient evidence corroborating their own statements concerning vehicle use.

In addition, the conferees adopted language that includes specific questions on mileage and business use to be asked on tax returns. One of the questions is whether written evidence was maintained by the taxpayer.

Police cars, fire service vehicles, some types of moving vans and specified vehicles used by utility company employees are excluded from the substantiation requirements. Also, the Treasury Department was authorized to issue regulations excluding unmarked law enforcement vehicles from the substantiation requirements.

In order to offset the revenue loss associated with the easing of the requirements, the conference agreement limits the investment tax credit for business cars to $675, and limits the depreciation deductions to $3,200 in the first year, climbing to $4,800 in each succeeding year.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the conference report on H.R. 1869 and I urge its adoption by the House.

Like most Members, I have been inundated by mail from constituents opposed to the contemporaneous record-keeping requirements that resulted from last year's tax bill. A heavy flow of mail on issues is not unusual for any of us but I was impressed by the depth of feeling on this particular matter. It became clear to me that, in trying to address a particular tax compliance problem, a remedy had been fashioned that was worse than that which it was trying to correct. The conference report before us today addresses that situation in a way that should restore common sense to this portion of the regulations of the Internal Revenue Service [IRS]. In addition, the conference report provides some much needed guidance to the IRS on the question of the tax treatment of the business-related commuting use of employer provided vehicles. I believe this guidance is necessary to ensure that employees who must take certain vehicles home as a condition of their employment do not have their income tax liability increased as a result.

Mr. Speaker, the conference agreement on H.R. 1869 represents important legislation. In passing this measure, Congress demonstrates that it will repond to, and correct, the unintended consequences of prior actions. That is a reasonable position and represents an important message to all of our constituents.●

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO MEET DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE ON TODAY AND TOMORROW, AND FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY INSTALLATIONS AND FACILITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO MEET TOMORROW DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet while the House is in the Committee of the Whole for business under the 5-minute rule on today, May 8, 1985, and tomorrow, May 9, 1985, and that the Subcommittee on Military Installations and Facilities of the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet tomorrow, May 9, 1985, while the House is in the Committee of the Whole for business under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, U.S. INFORMATION AGENCY, AND BOARD FOR INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEARS 1986 AND 1987

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 137 and Rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 2068.

□ 1458

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The CHAIRMAN. Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 2068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes, with Mr. PEASE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Thursday, May 2, 1985, all time for general debate had expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the bill will be considered under the 5-minute rule by titles, and each title shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate title I.

The text of title I is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—DEPARTMENT OF STATE

SECTION 101. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "Department of State Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1986 and 1987".

SEC. 102. AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The following amounts are authorized to be appropriated for the Department of State to carry out the authorities, functions, duties, and responsibilities in the conduct of the foreign affairs of the United States and for other purposes authorized by law:

(1) ADMINISTRATION OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.—For "Administration of Foreign Affairs", $1,852,025,000 for the fiscal year 1986 and $1,910,313,000 for the fiscal year 1987, subject to any offsetting reductions pursuant to section 120 (relating to the Consular and Passport Services Fund).

(2) INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS AND CONFERENCES.—For "International Organizations and Conferences" $543,574,000 for the fiscal year 1986 and $572,519,000 for the fiscal year 1987.

Section 11 of the Department of State Appropriations Authorizations Act of 1973 (22 U.S.C. 2685) is repealed.

SEC. 112. PERSONAL SERVICES ABROAD RELATING TO MIGRATION AND REFUGEE ASSISTANCE.

(a) AUTHORITY.—Section 5(a) of the Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1962 (22 U.S.C. 2605) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (5);

(2) by redesignating existing paragraph (6) as paragraph (7); and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (5) the following new paragraph (6):

"(6) contracting for personal services abroad, and individuals employed by contract to perform such services shall not be considered to be employees of the United States (except for purposes of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code (relating to compensation for work injuries), and for claims arising under section 2(f) of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2669(f)); and".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Authority provided by the amendment made by subsection (a) shall only apply with respect to funds appropriated after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 113. CERTAIN INDIVIDUALS EMPLOYED ABROAD DEEMED TO BE EMPLOYEES OF UNITED STATES FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES.

Section 2(c) of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2669(c)) is amended by inserting before the semicolon "(except for purposes of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code (relating to compensation for work injuries), and for claims arising under subsection (f))".

SEC. 114. PERFORMANCE PAY FOR SENIOR FOREIGN SERVICE.

(a) CEILING ON PERFORMANCE PAY.—Section 405(b)(1) of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 (22 U.S.C. 3965(b)) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) The aggregate amount of performance pay awarded to members of the Senior Foreign Service under this section during any fiscal year may not exceed the greater of—

"(A) the amount equal to 3 percent of the aggregate amount of basic pay paid to members competing for performance pay under subsection (a) during the preceding fiscal year; or

"(B) the amount equal to 15 percent of the average of the annual rates of basic pay paid to such members during the preceding fiscal year.".

(b) PAYMENT OF AWARDS.—Section 405(b) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 3965(b) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2) by striking out "exceed" and inserting in lieu thereof "be less than 5 percent nor more than"; and

(2) in paragraph (4)—

(A) by inserting "(A)" after "(4)"; and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraphs:

"(B) Any amount which is not paid to a member during a fiscal year because of the limitation under subparagraph (A) shall be paid to that individual in a lump sum at the beginning of the following fiscal year.

"(C) Any amount paid under subparagraph (B) during a fiscal year shall be taken into account for purposes of applying the limitation under subparagraph (A) with respect to such fiscal year.

"(D) Any amount under this section which is unpaid because of the death of a member shall be paid in the manner provided for similar unpaid amounts under subchapter VIII of chapter 55 of title 5, United States Code.".

SEC. 115. APPOINTMENTS TO THE SENIOR FOREIGN SERVICE BY THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

(a) LIMITED APPOINTMENT TO SENIOR FOREIGN SERVICE IN DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.—Section 305 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 (22 U.S.C. 3945) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c)(1) Appointments to the Senior Foreign Service by the Secretary of Commerce shall be excluded in the calculation and application of the limitation in subsection (b).

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), no more than one individual (other than an individual with reemployment rights under section 310 as a career appointee in the Senior Executive Service) may serve under a limited appointment in the Senior Foreign Service in the Department of Commerce at any time.

"(3) The Secretary of Commerce may appoint an individual to a limited appointment in the Senior Foreign Service for a specific position abroad if—

"(A) no career member of the Service who has the necessary qualifications is available to serve in the position; and

"(B) the individual appointed has unique qualifications for the specific position.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 2403(c) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 3901 note) is repealed.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall take effect on October 1, 1985.

SEC. 116. SPECIAL AGENTS.

(a) AUTHORITY RELATING TO INVESTIGATIONS, PROTECTION, ARRESTS, AND CARRYING FIREARMS.—Title I of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 is amended by redesignating section 37 as section 38 and by inserting the following new section 37 after section 36:

"SEC. 37. SPECIAL AGENTS.

"(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—Under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, special agents of the Department of State and the Foreign Service may—

"(1) conduct investigations concerning illegal passport or visa issuance or use;

"(2) for the purpose of conducting such investigations—

"(A) obtain and execute search and arrest warrants, and

"(B) obtain and serve subpoenas and summonses issued under the authority of the United States;

"(3) protect and perform protective functions directly related to maintaining the security and safety of—

"(A) heads of a foreign state, official representatives of a foreign government, and other distinguished visitors to the United States, while in the United States;

"(B) the Secretary of State, Deputy Secretary of State, and official representatives of the United States Government, in the United States or abroad;

"(C) members of the immediate family of persons described in subparagraph (A) or (B); and

"(D) foreign missions (as defined in section 202(a)(4) of this Act) and international organizations (as defined in section 209(b) of this Act), within the United States;

"(4) if designated by the Secretary and qualified, under regulations approved by the Attorney General, for the use of firearms, carry firearms for the purpose of performing the duties authorized by this section; and

"(5) arrest without warrant any person for a violation of section 111, 112, 351, 911, 970, 1001, 1028, 1541, 1542, 1543, 1544, 1545, or 1546 of title 18, United States Code—

"(A) in the case of a felony violation, if the special agent has reasonable grounds to believe that such person—

"(i) has committed or is committing such violation; and

"(ii) is in or is fleeing from the immediate area of such violation; and

"(B) in the case of a felony or misdemeanor violation, if the violation is committed in the presence of the special agent.

"(b) AGREEMENT WITH ATTORNEY GENERAL AND FIREARMS REGULATIONS.—

"(1) AGREEMENT WITH ATTORNEY GENERAL.—The authority conferred by paragraphs (1), (2), (4), and (5) of subsection (a) shall be exercised subject to an agreement with the Attorney General and shall not be construed to affect the investigative authority of any other Federal law enforcement agency.

"(2) FIREARMS REGULATIONS.—The Secretary of State shall prescribe regulations, which shall be approved by the Attorney General, with respect to the carrying and use of firearms by special agents under this section.

"(c) SECRET SERVICE NOT AFFECTED.—Nothing in subsection (a)(3) shall be construed to preclude or limit in any way the authority of the United States Secret Service to provide protective services pursuant to section 202 of title 3, United States Code, or section 3056 of title 18, United States Code, at a level commensurate with protective requirements as determined by the United States Secret Service. The Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall enter into an interagency agreement with respect to their law enforcement functions.

"(d) TRANSMISSION OF REGULATIONS TO CONGRESS.—The Secretary shall transmit the regulations prescribed under this section to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate not less than 20 days before the date on which such regulations take effect.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 32 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2704) is amended by striking out "security officers" and inserting in lieu thereof "special agents".

(c) REPEAL OF EXISTING AUTHORITY.—Section 4 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide authority to protect heads of foreign states and other officials" approved August 27, 1964 (22 U.S.C. 2667), and the Act entitled "An Act to authorize certain officers and employees of the Department of State and the Foreign Service to carry firearms" approved June 28, 1955 (22 U.S.C. 2666), are repealed.

SEC. 117. EXTRAORDINARY PROTECTIVE SERVICES FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

(a) PERMANENT AUTHORIZATION.—Title II of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 4301 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 214. EXTRAORDINARY PROTECTIVE SERVICES.

"(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—The Secretary may provide extraordinary protective services for foreign missions directly, by contract, or through State or local authority to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary in carrying out this title.

"(b) REQUIREMENT OF EXTRAORDINARY CIRCUMSTANCES.—The Secretary may provide funds to a State or local authority for protective services under this section only if the Secretary has determined that a threat of violence, or other circumstances, exists which requires extraordinary security measures which exceed those which local law enforcment agencies can reasonably be expected to take.

"(c) CONSULTATION WITH CONGRESS BEFORE OBLIGATION OF FUNDS.—Funds may be obligated under this section only after regulations to implement this section have been issued by the Secretary after consultation with appropriate committees of the Congress.

"(d) RESTRICTIONS ON USE OF FUNDS.—Of the funds made available for obligation under this section in any fiscal year—

"(1) not more than 20 percent may be obligated for protective services within any single State during that year; and

"(2) not less than 15 percent shall be retained as a reserve for protective services provided directly by the Secretary or for expenditures in local jurisdictions not otherwise covered by an agreement for protective services under this section.

The limitations on funds available for obligation in this subsection shall not apply to unobligated funds during the final quarter of any fiscal year.

"(e) PERIOD OF AGREEMENT WITH STATE OR LOCAL AUTHORITY.—Any agreement with a State or local authority for the provision of protective services under this section shall be for a period of not to exceed 90 days in any calendar year, but such agreements may be renewed after review by the Secretary.

"(f) REQUIREMENT FOR APPROPRIATIONS.—Contracts may be entered into in carrying out this section only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

"(g) WORKING CAPITAL FUND.—Amounts used to carry out this section shall not be subject to section 208(h).".

(b) SECRET SERVICE NOT AFFECTED.—Section 204(e) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 4304(e)) is amended by striking out "section" and inserting in lieu thereof "title".

(c) REPEAL OF EXISTING AUTHORITY.—Section 605 of the Foreign Missions Amendments Act of 1983 (97 Stat. 1042) is repealed.

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1985.

SEC. 118. PROTECTING UNITED STATES INTERESTS UNDER THE FOREIGN MISSIONS ACT.

(a) DETERMINATIONS RELATING TO TREATMENT TO FOREIGN MISSIONS.—Section 201(c) of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 4301(c)) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof ", as well as matters relating to the protection of the interests of the United States".

(b) CLARIFYING THAT THE SECRETARY CAN REQUIRE A FOREIGN MISSION TO FOREGO A BENEFIT.—Section 204(b) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 4304(b)) is amended by inserting "to forego the acceptance, use, or relation of any benefit or" after "(B)".

(c) CONSIDERATIONS RELATING TO REAL PROPERTY.—Section 205(b) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 4305(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) where otherwise necessary to protect the interests of the United States.".

SEC. 119. PEACEFUL RESOLUTION OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES.

Title I of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (as amended by section 116 of this Act) is further amended by redesignating section 38 as section 39 and inserting after section 37 the following new section 38:

"SEC. 38. EXPENSES RELATING TO PARTICIPATION IN ARBITRATIONS OF CERTAIN DISPUTES.

"(a) INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS.—The Secretary of State may use funds available to the Secretary for the expenses of United States participation in arbitrations and other proceedings for the peaceful resolution of disputes under treaties or other international agreements.

"(b) CONTRACTS ABROAD.—The Secretary of State may use funds available to the Secretary for the expenses of United States participation in arbitrations arising under contracts authorized by law for the performance of services or acquisition of property, real or personal, abroad.".

SEC. 120. IMPROVEMENTS TO PASSPORT AND CONSULAR SERVICES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) United States consular and passport facilities and services benefit the United States by promoting trade and tourism, providing protection and assistance to Americans abroad, and protecting the national security through overseas regulations of entry into the United States;

(2) consular and passport facilities and services are severely taxed by a rapidly increasing workload, and as a result the quality and timeliness of service to the public has declined;

(3) the Secretary of State is currently required or authorized to collect fees for many of the consular and passport services the Department of State provides;

(4) the imposition and collection of fees for these services is an appropriate charge to the users of consular and passport services;

(5) the American public at the same time is entitled to expect that the fees they pay will be used to support and improve the service for which they are charged; and

(6) fees paid by the users of consular and passport facilities and services should be applied to the improvement of those facilities and services in a timely and direct manner.

(b) CONSULAR AND PASSPORT SERVICES FUND.—The Secretary of State shall establish a fund to be known as the Consular and Passport Services Fund (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Fund"). All fees and charges collected for passport and consular services performed by the Department of State shall be deposited into the Fund.

(c) OFFSETS AGAINST AUTHORIZATIONS.—The amount authorized to be appropriated for "Administration of Foreign Affairs" for a fiscal year shall be deemed to be reduced by the amounts in the Fund which are made available for obligation for that fiscal year in accordance with subsection (d).

(d) AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS.—Amounts in the Fund shall be available for obligation only to such extent as is provided in advance in appropriation Acts. Such amounts shall remain available until expended by the Secretary.

(e) USE OF FUND.—The Fund shall be available for—

(1) supplies and equipment for, and contractual services by, the Department of State which are necessary to maintain and operate consular and passport services;

(2) the acquisition, modernization, repair, or furnishing of consular facilities abroad; and

(3) the acquisition, modernization, repair, or furnishing of passport and despatch facilities.

(f) PLAN FOR USE OF AMOUNTS IN FUND.—

(1) For each fiscal year, the Secretary of State shall develop semiannual management plans for the proposed funding and estimated costs of plans and projects to be carried out under paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (e).

(2) Before October 1 and April 1 of each year, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on the management plan developed under paragraph (1) for the six-month period beginnng on that date. Such reports shall include—

(A) the allocation of the proposed funding and estimated costs for—

(i) each region (for areas outside of the United States), and

(ii) each consular and passport facility located within the United States; and

(B) a statement describing how the proposed funding and estimated costs of the management plan relates to the foreign buildings program.

(3) Amounts in the Fund may not be obligated or expended for a six-month period until 30 days after a report with respect to that period is submitted under paragraph (2).

(g) LIMITATIONS ON TRANSFER.—The Secretary of State may transfer out of the Fund—

(1) not more than 40 percent of the amounts available for obligation in each fiscal year to the appropriation chargeable for the expenses described in subsection (e)(2), and

(2) not more than 20 percent of the amounts available for obligation in each fiscal year to the Administrator of General Services, or as otherwise authorized, for the purpose described in subsection (e)(3).

(h) REPROGRAMMING TREATMENT.—Amounts made available from the Fund under this section shall be treated as a reprogramming of funds under section 34 of the State Department Basic Authorities Act of 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2706) and shall not be available for obligation or expenditure except in compliance with the procedures applicable to such reprogramming.

(i) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Amounts deposited into the Fund shall not be available for obligation before October 1, 1985.

SEC. 121. AUSTRALIAN BICENTENNIAL.

(a) FINDING.—The Congress finds that the American-Australian Bicentennial Foundation, a private, nonprofit corporation established in 1983 for the purpose of coordinating all United States official and private participation in the 1988 Australian Bicentennial celebration, deserves and needs financial support to effectively carry out that purpose.

(b) GRANT TO AMERICAN-AUSTRALIAN BICENTENNIAL FOUNDATION.—From the amounts authorized to be appropriated by section 102(1) for the "Administration of Foreign Affairs", the Secretary of State may make a grant in each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to the American-Australian Bicentennial Foundation in support of its programs and operations to prepare for United States participation in the Australian Bicentennial celebration.

(c) AUTHORITY OF USIA NOT AFFECTED.—Subsection (b) shall not be construed to affect the authority delegated to the Director of the United States Information Agency under section 102(a)(3) of the Mutual Education and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2452(a)(3)).

SEC. 122. RESPONSIBILITY OF UNITED STATES MISSIONS ABROAD.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States is faced with increasingly larger trade deficits every year;

(2) section 104 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 provides that the members of the Foreign Service shall represent the interests of the United States in relation to foreign countries;

(3) section 207(c) of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 provides that each chief of mission to a foreign country shall have as a principal duty the promotion of United States goods for export to that country; and

(4) the promotion of United States business interests abroad is a fundamental aspect of United States relations with foreign countries.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Congress that it is imperative, and in the national interest of the United States, that each United States mission to a foreign country provide such support as may be necessary to United States citizens seeking to do business in that country.

SEC. 123. STRENGTHENING THE PERSONNEL SYSTEM OF THE BUREAU OF INTERNATIONAL NARCOTICS MATTERS.

No later than 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of State shall report to the Congress on the status of proposals implemented or under consideration to improve the staffing and personnel management in the Bureau of International Narcotics Matters. This report shall explicitly discuss whether a narcotics specialist personnel category in the Foreign Service is an appropriate mechanism to serve these purposes and, if not, what alternatives are contemplated.

SEC. 124. INFORMATION SHARING CONCERNING DRUG TRAFFICKERS.

(a) REPORTING SYSTEMS.—In order to ensure that foreign narcotics traffickers are denied visas to enter the United States, as required by section 212(a)(23) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1182(a)(23))—

(1) the Department of State shall cooperate with United States law enforcement agencies, including the Drug Enforcement Administration and the United States Customs Service, in establishing a comprehensive information system on all drug arrests of foreign nationals in the United States, so that that information may be communicated to the appropriate United States Embassies; and

(2) the Secretary of State and the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration shall agree on uniform guidelines which would permit the sharing of information on foreign drug traffickers.

(b) REPORT.—Not later than six months after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of State shall submit a report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on the steps taken to implement this section.

SEC. 125. EXTRADITION TREATIES.

The Secretary of State shall increase United States efforts to negotiate updated extradition treaties relating to narcotics offenses with each major drug-producing country, particularly those in Latin America.

SEC. 126. ESTABLISHMENT OF A TRAVEL ADVISORY ON MEXICO.

(a) VIOLENCE AGAINST AMERICANS.—The Congress—

(1) deplores the brutal murder of Drug Enforcement Administration agent Enrique Camarena Salazar, and the disappearance of numerous other Americans, in Mexico; and

(2) finds that the violence perpetrated by drug traffickers and other lawless elements in Mexico constitute a danger to the safety of United States citizens traveling in Mexico.

(b) TRAVEL ADVISORY.—The Congress, therefore, directs the Secretary of State to issue a travel advisory warning United States citizens of the dangers of traveling in Mexico. Such travel advisory shall remain in effect until those responsible for the murder of Drug Enforcement Administration agent Camarena have been brought to trial and a verdict has been obtained.

SEC. 127. COORDINATING COMMITTEE ON EXPORT CONTROLS.

(a) FUNDS FOR COCOM FACILITIES.—No funds other than funds appropriated to the Department of State may be used to alter, repair, expand, or modernize, or engage in any other additional construction of, the facilities of the Coordinating Committee on Export Controls.

(b) ASSIGNMENT OF MEMBERS AND ADVISERS TO UNITED STATES DELEGATION.—No officer or employee of any department or agency other than the Department of State may—

(1) be assigned to be a member of the United States permanent delegation to the Coordinating Committee on Export Controls, or

(2) be permanently assigned to the Coordinating Committee as an adviser to the United States permanent delegation to the Coordinating Committee.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to give a brief review of where we are on this legislation which has been pending before the House now for the third straight week.

We have, as indicated, completed general debate on this bill. Let me stress that we are talking about the State Department authorization bill. This is not the foreign aid bill. That will be coming up I understand later this week or next week. But this is the State Department authorization bill. Last week I read from a letter Secretary Shultz wrote with regard to the support of the administration and the State Department on the approaches we have taken in this bill. As I recall, he said quite appropriately that this is a good bill in harsh times. The bill contains very few new initiatives.

We have tried to address the concerns that we think are vital for the diplomatic functions of this Nation and for our security functions abroad, particularly in protecting our embassies overseas and those who serve America outside of its borders.

Also, we are addressing some of the tremendous concerns that have been brought to this committee with regard to the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty.

In my opening remarks several weeks ago I indicated that we are transmitting international radio broadcasts with transmitters that are decades old. We are using facilities that by any standard are outdated. One particular transmitter that we use for the Voice of America was captured from the Nazis in World War II. The parts are antiquated, the equipment and the technology is antiquated. We have tried to make some changes and to address this need for modernization in a responsible way.

Let me say at the onset that I know the feeling of this House with regard to a budget freeze and the freeze movement on spending that has been prevailing in this body.

First, the committee approached this bill by saying that we would report out a bill no larger than the President's request. In fact we were very pleased when the deliberations were completed that we were reporting out a bill almost $40 million less than the administration's request.

At the appropriate time in the legislation in title II our ranking minority member from Maine, Ms. SNOWE, and myself, will offer a complete freeze amendment on this legislation. It will not only be the $40 million less than what the administration requested, but an additional reduction, I believe, of $27 million.

We think we have acted responsibly. We think that it is a bill essential to our foreign policy concerns.

However, there are some 25 amendments, we expect, to this legislation. We feel that we have worked out agreement on 21 or 22 of those 25 amendments.

I would just close by commending my ranking minority member, Ms. SNOWE, and acknowledge her work and her effort and say that without her we would not have been able to craft a bill that has had the unanimous support of both the majority and the minority on the subcommittee.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE].

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I, too, want to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks because he does make a very good point. We worked closely with the administration and all members of the subcommittee and the full committee to develop legislation that would address the views and the concerns of all members on the committee as well as the administration. I think we have taken the most balanced and rational approach to all the requests and positions espoused by Members of the House. In addition, as the gentleman has suggested, a freeze amendment will be offered to freeze the overall aggregate funding levels for the State Department, the U.S. Information Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have done a good job in trying to reduce and control Federal expenditures with respect to this legislation.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentlewoman from Maine and, Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. YOUNG OF MISSOURI

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have three amendments at the desk which I offer, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not intend to object, but I reserve the right so that Chairman YOUNG might give the House an explanation as to what is contained in the three amendments.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SHAW. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the first provision amends section 214 of H.R. 2068 by merely clarifying Federal agency authorities to provide necessary protection to foreign missions in the United States. At this time, title III of the United States Code contains the principal authorizing provisions for the secret service, which is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation. Section 202(7) and 208 of title III provide for Federal protective assistance for missions to international organizations outside of Washington, DC. Pursuant to title III, such protection of missions can be made available by the U.S. Secret Service Uniformed Division or on a reimbursable basis by State and local governments. This amendment adds to the authority by permitting protective services to be provided by contract when municipal or State resources are not available on a reimbursable basis, no change in the authorization level of $7 million annually being made available for reimbursement of protective services will be affected by this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the second provision of the amendment inserts a new section 128 entitled Foreign Service Institute Facilities whereby authority is granted to the Administrator of the General Services to construct a consolidated training facility for the Foreign Services Institute on a site outside of the District of Columbia but within reasonable proximity to the Department of State. The Secretary of State is authorized to transfer a maximum of $61 million to the General Services Administration providing for such construction. However, for fiscal year 1986 and 1987 a maximum of only $11 million may be made available for design and site acquisition. Construction funding would occur in years thereafter. Secretary Schultz has testified to the urgency in providing the necessary funding for this construction project in view of the fact the foreign service institute is currently housed in expensive inadequate leased space in Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, the third provision of the amendment would authorize the Department of State to complete the International Diplomatic Center project in Washington, DC which has been authorized by our committee and which is currently under development, by constructing an administrative facility at the International Center in conjunction with the General Services Administration. The International Center enclave will ultimately contain over 20 foreign missions, some of whom are high-security concerns and effective security for such a large concentration of diplomatic missions can only be provided through an onsite facility. This will also significantly reduce the cost of such security. This administrative facility which is entirely within an existing federally owned site, will be approximately 50,000 square feet and will be used to provide necessary onsite security facilities for law enforcement agencies charged with protection of foreign missions. Additional support operations, such as maintenance offices will also be housed in the administrative building. The building estimated to cost $6 million will be funded, like the Center, through proceeds of foreign missions leases and reimbursements from users. Therefore, no request for authorization for appropriations is necessary. Existing law already authorizes use of lease proceeds for Federal security and maintenance.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the amendment.

□ 1500

Mr. SHAW. I thank the gentleman from Missouri for his explanation.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendments being offered by our distinguished chairman, ROBERT YOUNG, of the Public Works and Transportation Committee, and State that the minority has no objection to the amendments.

An earlier reported version of this bill (H.R. 1931) contained provisions similar to the amendments being offered and those provisions related to matters under the jurisdiction of the Public Works Committee.

I would like to commend Chairman FASCELL and subcommittee Chairman DAN MICA for their cooperation and their acceptance of these amendments to H.R. 2068.

The first amendment is technical in nature and relates to the extraordinary protective services afforded to international organizations and foreign missions located in the United States.

This amendment would allow the State Department to provide protective services by contract with private security firms in locations authorized under section 202(7), title III, of the United States Code.

Further, this amendment would clarify the applicability of the protective services which may be afforded to foreign missions under section 117 of this bill and the protective services provided under sections 202(7) and 208 of title III, United States Code.

Specifically, Mr. Chairman, the amendment would prohibit the State Department from providing extraordinary protective service under the authority being authorized by section 117 where the same protective service could be provided under section 202(7) of title III of the United States Code.

Both statutory programs are necessary, Mr. Chairman, in order to help assure that the necessary extraordinary protective services afforded to international organizations and foreign missions in the United States are comparable to security provided by foreign governments to U.S. missions abroad.

The second amendment, Mr. Chairman, authorizes the Secretary of State to construct a training facility for the State Department's Foreign Service Institute which offers training in foreign affairs and languages to more than 30 U.S. Government agencies.

Based on studies commissioned by the State Department and the General Services Administration this special purpose facility would contain approximately 342,000 occupiable square feet of space and cost an estimated $61 million to construct.

The State Department's training facilities are now located in roughly 185,000 occupiable square feet of leased space.

The construction of this new facility would result in the elimination of this leased space by consolidation into a single Government-owned building, would provide additional space for the growing responsibilities of the Foreign Service Institute, and it would save the Government roughly $45 million over the next 30 years of expected useful life of the building.

As currently proposed, the facility would be constructed in northern Virginia within close proximity to the State Department's headquarters in Washington.

Mr. Chairman, based on information supplied by the State Department, the committee understands that officials in Arlington County, VA, have discussed this matter with the State Department and support the location of the facility on a site in the neighborhood of Arlington Hall Station.

The amendment further provides that the State Department would be exempt from the payment of GSA's standard level user charge as required by section 210 (J) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949.

However, the State Department would be responsible for all costs associated with operations, maintenance, repairs, and alterations at the facility.

In many instances the authority for operations and maintenance has been delegated by GSA to agencies occupying a building, and the committee feels it would be appropriate for, and would encourage, GSA to delegate this authority to the State Department as long as they occupy the facility.

Mr. Chairman, the final amendment being offered adds a new section at the end of title I.

This amendment would permit the State Department to construct a security and maintenance facility at the State Department's International Center located in northwest Washington, DC.

This facility would be constructed with funds made available through proceeds of foreign mission leases and reimbursements from users at the center in the manner currently authorized in the International Center Act.

The estimated cost of construction of this facility is $6 million.

The amendment also provides that the House Committees on Foreign Affairs and Public Works and Transportation and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations be periodically advised on the construction of this facility.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the chairman and subcommittee chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for their cooperation and assistance in the preparation of these amendments and I would urge its adoption.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. YOUNG of Missouri: Page 16, line 17, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", except that the Secretary may not provide under this section any protective services for which authority exists to provide such services under sections 202(7) and 208 of title 3, United States Code.".

Page 18, after line 9, insert the following new subsection:

(c) AUTHORITY TO PROVIDE CERTAIN PROTECTIVE SERVICES BY CONTRACT.—Section 208(a) of title 3, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "The Secretary of Treasury may carry out the functions pursuant to section 202(7) by contract.".

Page 18, line 10, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)".

SEC. 128. FOREIGN SERVICE INSTITUTE FACILITIES.

(a) PURPOSE.—The purpose of this section is to promote comprehensive training to meet the foreign relations and national security objectives of the United States and to provide facilities designed for that purpose to assure cost efficient training.

(b) CONSTRUCTION OF TRAINING FACILITIES.—The Administrator of General Services may construct a consolidated training facility for the Foreign Service Institute on a site made available by the Secretary of State or acquired by the Administrator of General Services. Such site shall be located outside the District of Columbia but within reasonable proximity to the Department of State. The Administrator of General Services may carry out this subsection only to the extent that funds are provided in advance in appropriation Acts to the Department of State and are transferred to the Administrator of General Services for carrying out this section.

(c) USE OF FUNDS.—

(1) Of amounts authorized to be appropriated to the Department of State for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for "Administration of Foreign Affairs" by section 102(1), a total of not to exceed $11,000,000 may be transferred by the Secretary of State to the Administrator of General Services for carrying out feasibility studies, site acquisition, and design, architectural, and engineering planning under subsection (b) of this section.

(2) Of amounts authorized to be appropriated to the Department of State for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1987, for "Administration of Foreign Affairs", a total not to exceed $50,000,000 may be transferred by the Secretary of State to the Administrator of General Services for carrying out construction under subsection (b) of this section.

(3) Funds may not be obligated for construction of a facility under this section before the end of the period of 30 calendar days of continuous session of Congress beginning on the date on which plans and estimates developed to carry out this section are submitted to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committees on Foreign Relations and Environment and Public Works of the Senate. In determining calendar days of continuous session of Congress for purposes of this paragraph—

(A) continuity of session is broken only by an adjournment of Congress sine die; and

(B) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain are excluded in the determination.

If both Houses of Congress are not in session on the day any plans and estimates are submitted to such Committees, such submittal shall be deemed to have been submitted on the first succeeding day on which both Houses are in session. If all such Committees do not receive a submittal on the same day, such period shall not begin until the date on which all such Committees have received it.

(d) CUSTODY AND CONTROL.—The facility constructed under this section and the site of such facility shall be under the exclusive jurisdiction and control and in the custody of the Administrator of General Services.

(e) OPERATION, MAINTENANCE, ALTERATION, AND REPAIR.—The Administrator of General Services shall be responsible for operation and maintenance of, and repairs and alterations to, the facility constructed under this section. Upon request of the Secretary of State, the Administrator of General Services may delegate any of such responsibilities to the Department of State.

(f) EXEMPTION FROM PAYMENT OF CHARGES.—

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the Department of State shall be exempt from the charges required by section 210(j) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 for the use of the facility constructed under this section for the Foreign Service Institute.

(2) The Administrator of General Services shall charge the Department of State under such section 210(j) for the costs of any operation, maintenance, repairs, or alterations of such facility carried out by the Administrator of General Services.

Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. INTERNATIONAL CENTER.

The International Center Act is amended—

(1) in section 2—

(A) by striking out "Administrator of General Services" and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary of State, in consultation with the Administrator of General Services,"; and

(B) by striking out "conveyed pursuant to" and inserting in lieu thereof "described in"; and (2) in section 4—

(A) by redesignating clauses (a) through (e) as clauses (1) through (5), respectively, and by redesignating clause (f) as clause (7);

(B) by inserting "(a)"after "Sec. 4.";

(C) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (5), as redesignated by subparagraph (A), and inserting after such clause (5) the following: "(6) facilities for security and maintenance, and"; and

(D) by adding at the end of such section the following new subsection:

"(b) The Secretary of State shall periodically advise the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committees on Foreign Relations of the Senate on construction of facilities for security or maintenance under this section.".

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I would just like to say that the committee will accept these amendments and also point out that the three amendments were originally part of the legislation that was approved by the subcommittee and full committee.

We later deleted these provisions because of jurisdictional questions. We wanted to do everything in our power to assure very clean, clear lines of jurisdiction. We are very pleased to accept these amendments.

If the ranking minority Member has any comment, I would be happy to yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. We have no problems with the amendments that have been put forth by the gentleman. They closely resemble the language that was originally accepted by our committee. So I would urge adoption of all three amendments.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. YOUNG] contains three provisions which amend H.R. 2068, the State Department authorization bill for fiscal years 1986-87. Similar provisions to these amendments were contained in H.R. 1931, the original bill reported by the House Foreign Affairs Committee on April 11, 1985, authorizing appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes.

H.R. 1931 was sequentially referred to the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation which has primary jurisdiction over three sections of that bill. Namely, first, a provision affecting the protection of foreign missions to international organizations by the U.S. Secret Service; second, a provision providing for the construction of a new Foreign Service Institute facility to be located outside of the District of Columbia but within reasonable proximity to the Department of State which would replace existing inadequate leased facilities provided by the General Services Administration to house the Institute; and third, a provision to complete the international center project by providing for the construction of a security and maintenance facility with funds made available for such construction through proceeds of foreign mission leases and reimbursement from users in the manner currently authorized in the International Center Act.

In order not to delay consideration by the House of the State authorization legislation, a subsequent bill, H.R. 2068, was reported favorably by the Foreign Affairs Committee which deleted the three aforementioned sections in recognition of the primary jurisdiction of the Public Works Committee which had not yet completed its review of those sections. The amendment I am offering today in behalf of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation I believe has been agreed upon by the House Foreign Affairs Committee and it is the intention of our committee to continue to carry out oversight over activities of the Department of State in connection with each of these amendments and to reaffirm the fact that these activities are under the basic jurisdiction of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

Mr. Chairman, at this time, I would like to commend Chairman FASCELL and subcommittee Chairman DAN MICA for their cooperation in this matter.

Mr. Chairman, the first provision of the amendment, which I understand is acceptable to the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, to section 214 of H.R. 2068, clarifies Federal agency authorities to provide necessary protection to foreign missions in the United States.

The U.S. Government is obligated by treaty, and by international reciprocity, to provide a special level of protection to these missions, just as our Government is urgently requesting such protection at our many American missions abroad. Since this level of protection often exceeds what is available through State or municipal law enforcement on a reimbursable basis, Federal agency assistance is necessary for extraordinary protection.

This is provided through two statutory programs, and this amendment both preserves and strengthens these programs.

Title III of the United States Code contains the principal authorizing provisions for the Secret Service, which is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation. Sections 202(7) and 208 of title III provide for Federal protective assistance for missions to international organizations outside of Washington, DC. This authority, while available for any city with over 20 such missions, has been applied principally for United Nations missions in New York, because of the unique concentration of such missions in that city and the special obligation of the United States as the host country for the United Nations. With respect to New York, primary protective services are provided by the New York City Police Department on a reimbursable basis pursuant to authority contained in title III. Secret Service officials have testified that it would double the cost to the Federal Government if protective services were provided by U.S. Secret Service Uniform Division.

This amendment assures that oversight over this important protective function will continue without change. In addition, this amendment adds to the authority under title III to permit protective services to be provided by contract when municipal or State resources are not available on a reimbursable basis.

Section 214, as amended, then goes on to assure that all other missions, such as consulates in the various cities of the United States, may be provided protective assistance where necessary under the Foreign Missions Act of 1982, which is administered by the Secretary of State.

Both statutory programs are necessary, Mr. Chairman, in order to assure that necessary special levels of security may be provided, which has a direct impact on the security of American missions abroad, and I recommend favorable action by the House on this amendment.

The second provision of the amendment would authorize the Administrator of the General Services Administration to construct a consolidated training at a maximum cost of $61 million for the Foreign Service Institute on a site made available by the Secretary of State or acquired by the Administrator of General Services. The site is to be located in the District of Columbia but within reasonable proximity to the Department of State. Further, the Administrator of General Services may only carry out the proposed construction project to the extent that funds are provided in advance in appropriation acts to the Department of State and are transferred to the Administrator of General Services. The amendment provides that $11 million may be transferred by the Secretary of State to the Administrator of General Services for carrying out feasibility studies, site acquisition, and design, architectural, and engineering planning for fiscal year 1986 and 1987. Funds in the amount of $50 million necessary for construction shall not be made available until fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1987, and further, after the plans and estimates developed to carry out the construction are submitted to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Public Works and Transportaiton of the House of Representatives and the Committees on Foreign Relations and Environment and Public Works of the Senate for a 30-day review period.

Mr. Chairman, under normal procedure, this project would be subject to the terms of the Public Buildings Act of 1959, as amended, whereby the General Services Administration would transmit to the Congress a prospectus to be approved by the House Public Works and Transportation Committee and the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee prior to any appropriation being made available for such construction. However, in light of the fact, Secretary

Shultz has emphasized the high priority he attaches to obtaining proper facilities for the Foreign Service Institute to conduct its training classes the committee has agreed to allow for the State Department to fund the project which will be constructed and under the exclusive jurisdiction and control and in the custody of the Administrator of General Services. In addition, the State Department will not be charged rent by the General Services Administration since they are providing funds for the construction. And lastly, it is anticipated that upon completion of the project, the General Services Administration will delegate operation and maintenance of the facility to the Department of State.

The Foreign Service Institute of the Department of State was created by the Foreign Service Act of 1946 to train officials of the United States assigned to overseas duty, and to foreign affairs and national security agencies and today trains personnel from over 20 agencies of our Government. The Federal Service Institute is now located in increasingly costly leased facilities that are neither designed nor adequate for the language training, country studies, and other academic training that FSI provides.

The Secretary of State has testified that the essential training needs of the foreign affairs and national security agencies continue to expand, but the ability of the Institute to meet the growth in demand in leased space, currently in Rosslyn, VA, is severely limited. The limitations of existing facilities and the requirements to meet known and anticipated demands are documented in two studies produced for the State Department upon the recommendation of the General Services Administration. The most recent and comprehensive study, which includes detailed economic data, was prepared under a GSA contract and supports fully the purpose of this amendment.

Both studies conclude that for 1990 the Institute will require twice the occupiable square footage it has now in order to meet previously established training requirements, and known increases scheduled for training programs over the next 3 years. The economic analysis shows that the U.S. Government would save $45 million over 30 years by building a special purpose educational facility compared to leasing a comparable amount of square footage in office space, which is neither designed for nor adaptable for Federal training.

Senior State Department officials have testified as to the need for additional space and the cost benefits associated with dedicated facilities.

Finally Mr. Chairman, I want to note that a final decision on a specific site will not be made until completion of environmental analyses which are authorized by this amendment.

To conclude, I am inserting as part of the record a letter I recently received from the Department of State in support of this project.

The third provision of the amendment will authorize the Department of State to complete the International Diplomatic Center project in Washington, DC, which has been authorized by our committee and which is currently under development, by constructing an administrative facility at the International Center in conjunction with the General Services Administration. This administrative facility, which is entirely within an existing federally owned site, will be limited to approximately 50,000 net square feet, and will be used to provide necessary onsite security facilities for law enforcement agencies charged with protection of foreign missions, including the Secret Service, State Department security, the Federal Protective Service and the metropolitan police. Additional support operations, such as maintenance offices, will also be housed in the administrative building.

The International Center enclave will ultimately contain over 20 foreign missions, some of whom are high security concerns—such as Israel and Jordan. Effective security for such a large concentration of diplomatic missions can only be provided through an onsite facility. This will also significantly reduce the cost of such security.

The building will be funded, like the Center, through proceeds of foreign missions leases and reimbursements from users. Therefore, no request for authorization for appropriations is necessary. The existing law already authorizes use of lease proceeds for Federal security and maintenance.

The International Center is an important diplomatic project in our Nation's Capital providing space for foreign missions and international organizations on which to build chancery and official diplomatic facilities space. The Center will truly be a landmark in terms of aesthetics. In addition, it will allow missions to construct functional and affordable chancery space in our Nation's Capital, and the Center provides an increasingly important avenue for the United States to obtain reciprocal treatment for our missions overseas.

The International Center was originally established by Public Law 90-553, and was later amended in 1982 through Public Law 97-186 to provide additional space. We originally established the site for 14 chanceries and the headquarters for the Organization of American States. The amendments to the International Center Act created a total of 23 sites and allowed the Department of State to lease land to the International Telecommunications Satellite Organization, an organization of 108 member states, in lieu of the OAS.

Thus far, there are seven leases signed and four chanceries are already occupied at the International Center. The Department of State will be signing leases with two additional governments shortly. Intelsat has completed and occupied the first phase of its headquarters building. The State Department is currently negotiating with two governments to lease chancery space in the Intelsat portion of the project, thus increasing the Federal capacity to obtain highly secure space for this purpose. Intelsat will complete its second and final phase in approximately 18 months. This will provide the United States with additional space which can be made available to foreign missions, international organizations, and to GSA.

The Center is now an important element in our international relations and fulfills our responsibilities as a host government. As you are aware, security is playing an ever increasing role with respect to the location of these missions, both here and abroad. Our primary goal is the efficient and effective conduct of foreign policy, as well as efficient use of available Federal land in the capital region that cannot be done overseas without a safe and secure facility in which these nations can be represented in the United States. In addition, the issue of reciprocity as a tool for acquiring adequate facilities overseas has become extremely important.

The Department of State, along with the Secret Service, are the principal agencies charged with protecting foreign diplomatic missions. The International Center is a model for security and thus fulfills our obligation under the Vienna conventions. Requests by our Government for adequate facilities and security at our missions overseas are increasing daily. The proposed amendment will facilitate the security of chanceries here in our Capital.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to note that this amendment will not change the requirement, upon completion of this Federal project, that the Department of State reimburse the Treasury for the original $2.2 million startup appropriation.

This project is important to the overall success of the Center and I recommend that the amendment be adopted. I am advised, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague, Chairman Fascell of the Foreign Affairs Committee, fully supports this amendment.●

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to the State Department authorization bill to authorize construction of Federal buildings for the Foreign Service Institute, and would like to comment on the possible location of the Institute within the 10th District of Virginia which I represent.

State Department officials have noted that the new Foreign Service Institute should be situated within a few minutes driving time from Washington, DC, therefore the northern Virginia area is most attractive to their planners. Recently, Ed Derwinski, Counsel to the State Department, notified me of the Department's interest in attaining the Arlington Hall site now occupied by Army intelligence.

Since the State Department informed me of their tentative plans to develop the Foreign Service Institute at Arlington Hall, I have been involved in ensuring that the concerns of the people of Arlington County would be considered by the State Department planners.

At my request, the State Department has agreed to provide Arlington County with access to 7 to 8 acres east of the intersection of George Mason Drive and Sixth Street South for recreation purposes. The State Department is also aware of the county's interest in construction of police, communications or fire department facilities west of George Mason Drive. Finally the Department has noted the county's concerns that constructed facilities adhere to local zoning requirements and be made available for county use as much as possible.

It is my hope to ensure that the needs and concerns of Arlington County are met. As plans for the development of the Foreign Service Institute proceed I will continue in this effort.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. YOUNG].

The amendments were agreed to.

Amendment offered by Mr. MICA.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to protect the interests of foreign missions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MICA of Florida: Page 18, after line 22, insert the following new subsection (b):

(b) EXPANDING THE DEFINITION OF FOREIGN MISSION.—Section 202(a)(4) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 4302(a)(4)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "official mission to" and inserting in lieu thereof "mission to or agency in"; and

(2) by inserting before the comma at the end of subparagraph (B) "or which engages in some aspect of the conduct of the international affairs of such territory or political entity".

Page 19, after line 13, insert the following new subsection (e):

(e) MANDATORY NOTIFICATION WITH RESPECT TO REAL PROPERTY DEALINGS OF FOREIGN MISSION.—(1) The first sentence of section 205(a)(1) of such Act (22 U.S.C. 4305(a)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "may" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall"; and

(B) by inserting ", including any mission to an international organization (as defined in section 209(b)(2))," after "foreign mission".

Page 18, line 23, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)"; and Page 19, line 3, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)".

Mr. MICA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to just briefly explain this amendment. We are trying to clarify the definition of foreign missions, which now allows so-called unofficial missions of foreign governments, which can be very large and long term, to perform certain activities for which the United States may have great concern.

Essentially, what we are talking about is unofficial delegations from other nations operating in this country and remaining outside the laws and rules and regulations that cover official foreign delegations in this country.

We have found that other governments, particularly Soviet block nations, are using this loophole to locate delegations in sensitive areas in the United States. For example, without this amendment, they might locate near military bases or near government facilities, so that they can in effect watch us at close range.

My amendment would expand the definition that gives the Secretary the privilege to identify these types of delegations and take the necessary actions to bring them under the rules and regulations that would apply to official delegations.

I would yield for any comment to our ranking minority member, Ms. SNOWE.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the gentleman's amendment. As the gentleman has explained, this amendment would assure that the Foreign Missions Act of 1982 will cover unofficial missions as well as those missions of governments that we officially recognize.

In addition, it will clarify the intent of the Foreign Missions Act to specify that prior notice must be given by foreign governments when they plan to take any action such as building or leasing concerning property.

So I think it is an important loophole to close by clarifying the intent of this act.

I thank the gentleman and would urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MICA. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MICA

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment Offered by Mr. MICA of Florida: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. RESPONSIBILITIES OF UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES TO INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) international organizations of which the United States is a member are increasingly involved in the consideration of proposals that may have a significant impact on the interstate or foreign commerce of the United States; and

(2) these proposals are not always adequately publicized or considered pursuant to open and fair procedures available to interested persons.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the United States representatives to United Nations-related agencies and to other international organizations should oppose the adoption of international marketing and distribution regulations or restrictions which unnecessarily impede the export of United States goods and services; and

(2) the Secretary of State, to the extent practicable, shall provide interested persons with timely notice and an opportunity to comment on such regulations and restrictions under consideration in international organizations as the Secretary determines may significantly affect—

(A) the interstate or foreign commerce of the United States;

(B) the policies or programs of the United States Government; or

(C) any State significantly affected by interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. MICA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICA. This is a very basic amendment, Mr. Chairman. Essentially what we say is that we are asking our delegates to the United Nations not to accept regulations affecting U.S. products and U.S. exports that may be set forth on a worldwide basis through international organizations.

What we have found is that oftentimes there are meetings of international bodies that set forth rules and regulations with regard to trade, items that are shipped, and the content of those items.

I do not object to these types of rules in general, but we are trying to provide an atmosphere in which, together with the Secretary of State and the Department of Commerce, the private sector can have some input.

We are asking that in international bodies these types of agreements be opposed. The Secretary of State maintains the flexibility to enter into these agreements after we have had a chance to make sure what the effects would be, particularly on our international trade.

I would be happy to yield again to the gentlewoman from Maine for any comments.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the Chairman. I certainly support this amendment that has been offered by the Chairman, because I think it is important that any time that U.S. representatives to international organizations are making policy and are advocating policy that might otherwise restrict the export of our commodities, that, indeed, they should inform the affected parties, especially when we have an enormous trade deficit. It seems to me that it only makes sense to move in this direction by directing these representatives to inform the individuals or the companies as they would be affected by these policies.

So we support the amendment.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentlewoman, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LUJAN

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUJAN: Page 28, after line 25, add the following new section:

SEC. 128. INTER-AMERICAN COOPERATION IN SPACE, SCIENCE, AND TECHNOLOGY.

The Secretary of State shall conduct an in-depth study of the feasibility and the economic and political benefits of the establishment of a major initiative in Inter-American Cooperation in Space, Science, and Technology. Not more than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Congress on the findings of such study and shall include recommendations for implementing such an initiative.

Mr. LUJAN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman my amendment to H.R. 2068 directs the Secretary of State to study the feasibility and benefits of a major initiative in "Inter-American Cooperation in Space, Science and Technology." In this case, "Inter-American" refers to the countries of the Americas—Latin America and the Caribbean.

At the present time, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration deals directly with only 5 of the 34 Latin American and Caribbean countries and I feel we need to recognize that space, science, and high technology are clearly instruments of foreign policy. My amendment would require the Secretary of State to study benefits of expanding the U.S. cooperation in Latin America and the Caribbean and to report his findings to Congress within a year.

Latin American and Caribbean countries are regions which have been neglected in the past, both in terms of developing and more developed countries and with regard to space and technology ventures and support from the United States. Increasing American-led activity in space, science, and technology in this region of the world would generate economic and geopolitical benefits not only for the United States but also for other freedom-loving countries of the world.

In addition, increased international cooperation in this region would also directly advance U.S. technical leadership in space, science, and high technology by: Stimulating scientific and technical contributions from Inter-American countries; enlarging the potential for development; providing access to foreign areas for tracking and contingency shuttle landing sites; enhancing satellite experiments with foreign scientific supporting data; and, developing cost-sharing and complementary space, science, and high technology programs.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not create a commission or agency for this study. It is my intention that this study be handled as an internal function of the Department of State, so the amendment does not require any additional funding.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUJAN. I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I have examined the amendment of the gentleman from New Mexico, and I certainly support it. It directs the Secretary of State to conduct a feasibility study in this area, and as the gentleman has suggested, it would be an internal function of the State Department. Nor would it require additional funding.

I think any time that we can enhance the development in the Latin American and Caribbean region we should do so. I also think that particularly in this area of space, science, and, technology, if we were to develop our capabilities, it could certainly be led by American research and enhance our own developmental capabilities as well.

So I support the gentleman's amendment, and look forward to the findings that will be reported to the Congress.

Mr. MICA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUJAN. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MICA. I would also like to say that I would support this amendment and accept it readily and commend the gentleman for offering it.

If ever there were a time in this Nation's history when we need to build relations in this hemisphere in a peaceful way and hopefully we can do it not only on Earth but in space, this is the time.

So we would be happy to support this amendment.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for his support, and I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1510

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. LUJAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GILMAN

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILMAN: Page 20, strike out line 8 and all that follows through line 8 on page 24, and insert in lieu thereof the following new section:

SEC. 120. CONSULAR AND PASSPORT FACILITIES AND SERVICES.

Not later than December 15, 1985, the Secretary of State shall conduct a study and submit a report to the Congress on United States consular and passport facilities and services. Such study shall address the following concerns:

(1) The extent to which United States consular and passport facilities and services benefit the United States by—

(A) promoting trade and tourism;

(B) providing protection and assistance to Americans abroad; and

(C) protecting the national security through overseas regulations of entry into the United States.

(2) Whether consular and passport facilities and services are able to respond to a rapidly increasing workload, and whether the quality and timeliness of service to the public has declined.

(3) Whether fees paid by the users of consular and passport facilities and services should be applied to the improvement of those facilities and services, including—

(A) the provision of supplies and equipment for, and contractual services by, the Department of State which are necessary to maintain and operate consular and passport services;

(B) the acquisition, modernization, repair, or furnishing of consular facilities abroad; and

(C) the acquisition, modernization, repair, or furnishing of passport facilities.

(4) A comparison of methods which could accomplish the objectives stated in paragraph (3).

(5) The personnel positions necessary to accomplish improvements to consular and passport facilities and services.

Page 2, line 10, strike out the comma and all that follows through "Fund)" in line 12.

Mr. GILMAN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is twofold. First, it strikes the entirety of section 120, as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in the bill. This will remove concerns that may have existed as to the budgetary effects of that section. That section, Mr. Chairman, would have established a fund for passport and consular operations of the Department of State, capitalized by fees required from persons utilizing these services both within and outside the United States.

While, therefore, this statement will strike that provision, I do want to note that, had it been adopted, full and adequate congressional reviews and oversight would have been insured.

In addition to requiring appropriations action on all requests to have utilized funds under that section, prior review by both the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Public Works Committee of all plans and estimates would have also been required on a semiannual basis before any of the funds could have been obligated.

Mr. Chairman, what this amendment would now substitute, in order for Members of the House to fully review the problem, is a requirement for the Secretary of State to review and report to Congress on various measures that could be considered. This review must address the means to both keep pace on a cost-efficient basis with the rapidly changing needs of American nationals who need passport services in the United States and consular assistance abroad and at the same time upgrade the economic and security functions served by reviewing and screening foreign nationals access to our own Nation.

The amendment would require submission of the report not later than December 15 of this year in order for the Congress to be able to fully consider the matter before the conclusion of this session.

Mr. Chairman, accordingly, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I would like to say that the committee will accept the amendment. We have reviewed the amendment. But I would like to point out for the record that this was a request to the committee from the Department of State. It was an offsetting revenue neutral approach to bring the fees in to be used for the services that are rendered to collect those fees. It was not until the bill was already reported out by the committee and in fact headed for the floor that we received word that there was objection. So we think the idea has merit. We would endorse the amendment as structured by the gentleman. But it was an idea that was conceived at State and now being removed I think.

Mr. GILMAN. I think the gentleman for his supportive remarks, and that certainly is the precise situation.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAZZOLI. I appreciate the gentleman from New York yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have been listening with some interest to the discussion. As chairman of the House Immigration Subcommittee and as one who has certain oversight hearings on the consular and passport activity of the Department of State, it has occurred to me over the years that we may not be charging what we should be charging for the services which we are rendering, in many cases free. We are talking about trying to save Federal dollars, and in many cases we are giving them away in big globs, which we think we could recapture in the form of proper fees.

Now, may I ask the gentleman what his amendment does with respect to ascertainment of the correct charges for services which we render to foreign nationals and to U.S. citizens?

Mr. GILMAN. Well, while the amendment does not specifically address that question, it does, I believe, provide an opportunity for a full-scale review of consular fees and how they should be applied.

Mr. MAZZOLI. If the gentleman's amendment had not been offered and apparently accepted by the committee, would there have been impositions of charges of any sort?

Mr. GILMAN. Is the gentleman inquiring if there would have been a revision?

Mr. MAZZOLI. Would there have been imposition of any charges under the existing bill?

Mr. GILMAN. I would like to defer to the chairman of our subcommittee with regard to his understanding of the original proposal.

Mr. MICA. If the gentleman will yield, it was my understanding that the original proposal would just have simply left the fees intact but the funding would have been transferred to a special account to go back and pay for those services and the cost of those services rendered.

But I must say that I agree with the concept that many of these services are underpriced. I have not seen a study on it. It certainly is worthy of a study. But I have had some concerns myself about this. The issue itself was that the State Department felt they could better handle these funds by collecting the fees, keeping them internally, to use for the very services that are collecting the fees, and they felt it would be revenue neutral. The committee felt it was worth looking at, approving, and we did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] has expired.

(On request of Mr. MAZZOLI and by unanimous consent, Mr. GILMAN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAZZOLI. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I appreciate the time, and I appreciate what my friend, the gentleman from Florida, has said. I do very much believe that while we have an opportunity and an obligation to make entry and access and egress from the Nation relatively simple and smooth, I think we have certainly the opportunity and the right to collect reasonable fees for that.

May I ask the gentleman this: Would the study which this amendment seems to authorize deal with proper fees and funding? Is that any part of the study?

Mr. GILMAN. The general language in subparagraph (3) which reads, "Whether fees paid by the users of consular and passport facilities and services should be applied to the improvement of those facilities and services. . . ." is, I believe, broad enough to include a review of the consular fee schedule.

Mr. MAZZOLI. I hope that our having this discussion may nail it down with respect to legislative history.

Mr. MICA. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to point this out: It is my understanding that the State Department now has legislative authority to raise passport fees. And because this issue was raised, and I think it is a good issue, I will, as chairman, send a letter immediately asking that they review that and report back to us. I think it is a legitimate concern.

Mr. MAZZOLI. I salute the chairman. I think he has made a very fine contribution to the whole question of reducing Federal deficits and still providing adequate services.

Last but not least, I think I join with all of my friends who serve on this committee in saluting the consular officers. Many, many times the men and women of the consular service may not have the sort of opportunities, though I think they should, with respect to promotion to ambassadorial rank from that cone of consular service, but I will tell you that they perform yeoman service, they serve this Nation very well under very difficult circumstances, which my friend from New York has seen firsthand abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] has again expired.

allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. I will conclude by saying that I hope that we might over the period of years ahead while we serve together make it a very attractive service for the men and women who would enter foreign service and to give these men and women the opportunity of doing the job that we know they need to do correctly, and that is to screen ahead of time those who should and should not enter.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman for his supportive remarks and join with him in commanding our consular officers throughout the world for their exemplary services.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I, too, support the gentleman's amendment. Originally, I did have some concerns about establishing the separate fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] has again expired.

(On request of Ms. SNOWE and by unanimous consent, Mr. GILMAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. GILMAN. I further yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman.

The intent of the State Department, too, was to ensure that by establishing the fund, the consular services provided are offset by the revenues raised with respect to those services rendered by the consular officials.

In addition, I think it would be more appropriate to study and review this matter. After that time, Congress would welcome a recommendation regarding a separate fund for these purposes.

Again, I think it is an issue that has to be addressed as soon as possible.

Mr. GILMAN. That is the precise purpose of this study and I thank the gentlewoman for her support.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GLICKMAN

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GLICKMAN: At the end of title I of the bill, add the following section:

It is the sense of the Congress that, pursuant to title XVII of Public Law 98-525, nominations to the Board of Directors for the United States Institute of Peace should be submittted to the Senate without delay to permit implementation of the Congressional mandate.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, today, I rise to offer a noncontroversial amendment which I understand the committee has accepted. I want to thank Mr. MICA, and Ms. SNOWE for their support, and also my colleague, Mr. GINGRICH, for his help on this issue. My amendment reads as follows: It is the sense of the Congress that, pursuant to title XVII of Public Law 98-525, nominations to the Board of Directors for the U.S. Institute for Peace should be submitted to the Senate without delay to permit implementation of the congressional mandate.

Let me provide my colleagues with a little background on why this amendment is being offered. Efforts to establish a U.S. Institute of Peace were realized last fall when the proposal to establish the Institute was included in fiscal year 1985 Defense authorization bill. More than 170 of my colleagues had cosponsored that proposal, and a majority of our Senate colleagues had cosponsored similar legislation. The proposal had the endorsement of educators, military personnel, and members of the diplomatic corps.

As signed into law last October, the Institute's authorization directed the President to submit to the Senate, not later than 90 days after his swearing-in, a slate of 11 nominees to the Board of Directors of the Institute of Peace. This submission of nominees is the first step in the actual establishment of the Institute. Once the governing board is confirmed, the organization of the Institute can proceed and the Institute's work can begin, that work being education, research and informational services in conflict resolution for Americans in Government, private enterprise, and voluntary associations.

Unfortunately, those 90 days have passed and the statutory deadline of April 20 has come and gone without the President sending up his nominations. Therefore, I am offering this amendment to remind the President of his responsibility to submit his nominations in a timely manner, so that the establishment of the Institute can proceed.

□ 1520

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that the committee has reviewed, and from our side we have no objection to this amendment.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as a supporter of the U.S. Institute of Peace, I endorse the gentleman's amendment. We are halfway through the fiscal year; it is important that these appointments are made to the governing board for the Institute so that it can go forward with its mandate.

I think this is a proper amendment by urging the administration to make these appointments forthcoming without delay.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I thank my colleague, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MURPHY

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY: On page 9, beginning on line 2, strike all after "United States" through line 6.

Also on page 9, beginning with line 11, strike through line 18.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to strike two provisions in this bill which would remove individuals hired to provide personal contracts abroad from coverage under the Defense Base Act and place them under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act. As now written, this bill would for the first time extend coverage under FECA to private sector employees.

Mr. Chairman, jurisdiction over FECA rests with the House Committee on Education and Labor, and therefore I believe it is essential that any changes in coverage must originate in the committee and be fully debated by the members of the Committee on Education and Labor.

I have discussed this amendment with my colleagues on the Committee on Education and Labor, of both parties, as well as with the staff of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I am sure that Mr. PETRI and the members of the Committee on Education and Labor understand that there may be a need to review the coverage of those hired to perform services overseas and you may be assured that the Subcommittee on Labor Standards is willing to begin consideration of this dilemma immediately following House passage of H.R. 2068.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, the committee has attempted in every way possible to fashion approaches that would be agreeable to the majority of the Members here.

I would say with regard to this particular amendment, it did come up in the latter stages of our consideration. With the gentleman's assurance that there will be hearings on this issue, we will not object.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PETRI. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to rise to support the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Labor Standards Subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee, and to support the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment addresses two provisions in the bill pertaining to independent contractors retained by the State Department under the Migrant and Refugee Assistance Act and, essentially, security personnel under the State Department Basic Authorities Act.

The committee bill extends coverage of the Federal Employees Compensation Act [FECA] to these individuals and authorizes the Secretary to settle tort claims against such individuals.

My understanding is that this language does not reflect the administration's position, and the amendment would strike this incompatible language.

The purpose of the bill's language is to provide protections to independent contractors normally accorded to Federal employees—that is, workers compensation coverage under FECA and authority for the Secretary to settle claims against the United States for the torts of employees acting within the scope of their employment.

However, extending FECA to independent contractors for the first time would mark a conceptual leap in FECA that would have a potentially adverse precedental impact far beyond this bill. Furthermore, these contractors already enjoy workers compensation protections through the Defense Base Act—an extension of the Longshoremen and Harbor Workers Compensation Act. Although concerns about the cost of Defense Base Act coverage are not without merit, the same claim could be made by any other Federal agency whose contractors are covered by the Defense Base Act. Moreover, FECA already includes generic authority for coverage on a case-by-case basis, where an individual renders personal services to the United States similar to the services of an employee. My understanding is that the Labor Department has granted coverage in the past to such individuals at the request of the State Department.

In other words to the extent cost is a legitimate factor, there is a less radical means for addressing this problem than amending FECA.

With respect to the Secretary's authority to settle tort claims against employees, the bill's extension of such authority to independent contractors, again, raises precedental questions. Has this been done before? What precedent is being set for later extending such protections to other independent contractors? Frankly, I do not know the answers to these questions, but I do understand that the administration has objections.

Given all these considerations I believe we should strike this language and reserve any remaining questions for the Senate, which bill has included the same provisions.

I understand that this amendment is acceptable on both sides of the aisle and by the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SOLOMON

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SOLOMON: Page 2, line 16, strike out "$572,519,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$520,167,800".

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering is very straightforward. It simply reduces by 15 percent the amount of money that will be authorized under this bill to pay our assessed contribution to the United Nations in fiscal year 1987. This amendment will mean a savings to the American taxpayers of $52,352,000.

I had intended originally to offer an amendment that would reduce our U.N. contribution for both years that are covered under this bill—fiscal years 1986 and 1987. However, after consultations with colleagues and in the interest of keeping this issue from becoming a contentious point during the consideration of this bill, I have decided to go with an amendment making the reduction effective only in fiscal year 1987.

Let me say that I appreciate the interest that has been shown by many of my colleagues for this amendment. And I greatly appreciate the cooperation by the gentleman from Florida and the gentlelady from Maine, as floor managers of this bill.

Let me also say that, as the ranking Republican on the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, I take very seriously our country's participation in the United Nations. And I am second to none in support of those principles on which the United Nations was founded, most notably the universal declaration of human rights. But all of that is not at issue today what is at issue is the administration of the United Nation.

The time has come to address the subject of how the United Nation is managed—and this amendment does just that. My amendment would leave fully intact our commitment to U.N. peacekeeping operations, and would focus intead on the U.N. secretariat—on the operating budget of the United Nation.

Mr. Chairman, as long ago as 1969 the Comptroller General of the United States began issuing warnings about excessive growth in the U.N. budget and serious shortcomings in the auditing system that monitors that budget. Since those initial warnings 16 years ago, the U.N. budget has more than tripled.

About three-fourths—75 percent—of the U.N.'s operating budget is consumed by administrative and personnel costs, benefits that flow tax-free—let me repeat tax-free—to 52,000 U.N. employees and annuitants worldwide.

In preparing my amendment, I assumed a differential of 20 percent between the level of compensation for U.N. employees over and against what their counterparts in the U.S. civil service are receiving. A differential of 20 percent is a modest assumption. The International Civil Service Commission has estimated over the last 3 years that the differential is in the range of 16 to 18 percent. But a closer examination reveals that the ICSC does not include certain fringe benefits for U.N. employees in its calculations, such as shorter work weeks and longer vacations. The administration estimates that the differential in favor of U.N. employees is actually between 35 and 40 percent. And remember, all of this guaranteed tax free.

So what I have done is to take that 75 percent of the U.N. budget that goes for administrative and personnel costs, divide it by one-fifth, or, in other words 20 percent, the compensation differential I mentioned, and I came up with a figure of 15 percent.

And that leads to a very interesting point. By reducing our support for the U.N.'s operating budget by 15 percent, we are saving the American taxpayers about $52 million a year. Believe it or not, an amount at least that great—at least $50 million a year—in our assessed contribution to the United Nations, is going to reimburse American employees at the United Nations for their tax assessments. In other words, at least $50 million in our U.N. contribution goes not into the administration of the United Nations but into a shell game that enables American employees there to maintain tax-free incomes.

I will not belabor that point. But the time has come to simply ask what is going on at the U.N. Secretariat——

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am having trouble following the gentleman. Is the gentleman telling me that anybody who works at the U.N. in the Secretariat, including American citizens, do not have to pay any taxes on the money that they get?

Mr. SOLOMON. That is exactly what I am telling the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. And that the taxpayer is picking up the cost of American citizens who are working there for their taxes?

Mr. SOLOMON. The gentleman is absolutely correct. I did not believe that myself until I got into it this past week and verified it with the State Department.

Mr. WALKER. Well, how do we possibly justify that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SOLOMON was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. SOLOMON. Let me continue because I think we will find something more interesting to the gentleman as we go along.

Mr. WALKER. I would appreciate that.

□ 1530

Where is the money going? Why are 200 officials in the Secretariat drawing tax-free salaries higher than what the Vice President of the United States makes?

Why are there staff members in the Secretariat drawing tax-free salaries higher than what U.S. Cabinet members or Members of Congress are making?

Why has the Economist magazine in Great Britain described the United Nations as a "Patronage Racket"?

Why can a senior offical in the Secretariat retire in January 1984, collect $390,000 in cash, tax-free, as a severance payment, and then be back on the payroll at full salary in less than a week?

Mr. WALKER. Now, wait a minute, if the gentleman would yield.

He collected severance pay of $400,000.

Mr. SOLOMON. $391,000 to be exact.

Mr. WALKER. $391,000, slight short of $400,000 and is back on the payroll the next week?

Mr. SOLOMON. One week later.

Mr. WALKER. He gave back the money then, did he not?

Mr. SOLOMON. No. He has it in a Swiss bank account.

Mr. WALKER. He collected severance pay, so he is back on the payroll now the next week. Certainly he gave back the money. Is not some of that our taxpayers' money?

Mr. SOLOMON. I asked whether or not he had paid the money back, whether he was obligated to, and the answer was no, he has not paid the money back, and no, he was not obligated to. It was perfectly legal.

Mr. WALKER. And we are permitting that?

Mr. SOLOMON. We are permitting that unless we adopt my amendment here today.

Let me continue, if I might. I have to ask:

Why has a diplomat from Sierra Leone, the former Assistant Secretary-General for Personnel Services, described the U.N. Secretariat as a "Dumping Ground for Officials Unwanted at Home?"

Why has Arkady Shevchenko, the Soviet defector who held the position of Under Secretary-General for Political and Security Council Affairs at the United Nations, made the observation that the U.N. Secretariat could do a more efficient and effective job with one-fourth as many people as are there now? And I need not even go into his revelations about KGB activity and other such pasttimes in the Secretariat.

Finally, why did the United Nations find it necessary to sponsor 11,000 conferences last year? That's right—11,000 conferences. The paralysis of analysis has reached epic proportions. You know, some of us here in Congress have been critical of certain U.N. activities that are detrimental to private enterprise and free-market economics. But I guess that criticism must now be modified because with 11,000 conferences, the United Nations must be keeping any number of airlines and hotel chains solvent today, so at least they are doing something good.

Let me just conclude, Mr. Chairman, by saying that I agreed to modify my original amendment in the hope that these and other problems can be addressed. We have a new Ambassador, Vernon Walters, for whom I have tremendous respect, and a new team going up to the United Nations. By delaying the 15-percent cut until fiscal year 1987, our Ambassador and his associates will be given the room they need to deal with these problems and to try to get things under control.

Certainly, if a year from now or some other time, Ambassador Walters and the administration report to us here in Congress that progress is being made and that a supplemental request for the United Nations is justified, I will consider that request very seriously, as I know every other Member of Congress will, too.

And so I offer this amendment today in good faith, in the hope that the message it will send will be positive. The work of the United Nations is too important, and its resources are too limited, to be squandered in the outrageous and outlandish manner that is going on today.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, would my distinguished friend yield to me?

Mr. SOLOMON. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman would tell us what the position of the State Department is on his amendment as originally offered, and as amended?

Mr. SOLOMON. The State Department was opposed to my original amendment, which would have actually cut the U.N. budget in both fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. WEISS and by unanimous consent, Mr. SOLOMON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SOLOMON. After due consultation and because it could have created an administrative problem in the fiscal year 1986, I agreed to compromise, although I was not too anxious to do so, to make it effective just for the fiscal year 1987 so that the gentleman from New York and I can discuss this a year from now and see if progress has been made.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for his answer.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in reluctant support of the amendment.

I might first commend my colleague for altering the effective date of the amendment and simply say this: that we on the committee have done our best in this bill to defend legitimate concerns about America's diplomacy, our overall diplomatic efforts, our security, our agreements, and our treaties.

Defending the United Nations on the floor of the House of Representatives in this day and time, and in light of some of the statistics that were mentioned here, is surely a difficult task for anyone. Handling this bill, some say, is a difficult task.

We have tried to take into consideration the agreements that this Government-President Reagan, Secretary Shultz, the entire State Department, all of our diplomatic corps have entered into in working with nations around the world.

I have expressed concern over implementing this provision immediately because those agreements would have bound us to make those payments, bound us to keep our contracts. However, we could not have done so because of this legislative constraint.

We also have not had an opportunity to investigate what a 15-percent cut would do to these United States obligations notwithstanding other problems at the United Nations, or salary abuses or retirement abuses. Finally, there was an objection to the original legislation by the administration, by the Secretary of State, by those who deal with it on a daily basis.

So I commend the gentleman in this respect: that we will have a year now to look at the effect of those agreements and our commitments. We will have an opportunity to see who would be helped or hurt by this type of action, and I am hopeful that it will help to bring about some change, but also that we do not have to move in the most heavy handed way on the floor of the House without hearings on this type of reduction.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I would be very happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to thank the gentleman. He has certainly been one of the most reasonable Members. Sometimes we spend a great deal of time in this Chamber patting each other on the back and handing out accolades, but I just want the gentleman to know that he is one of the outstanding subcommittee chairmen on our Foreign Affairs Committee and has done a tremendous job with this bill.

I, for one, from this side of the aisle, appreciate the job he has done, and certainly the same holds true for the gentlewoman from Maine [Mrs. SNOWE].

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentleman.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the remarks made by the gentleman. We do have an obligation through the treaties that we belong to with respect to the mission that is provided by the United Nations. Indeed, I think we all acknowledge that mission is a difficult one.

On the other hand, I think the gentleman from New York has raised some important points with respect to the personnel and administrative costs associated with the operations of the United Nations. Since the United States is the maximum donor, since we do provide the maximum assessment, we also have an obligation to insure that fiscal restraint is applied to the costs associated with the functioning of the United Nations.

So, if 75 percent of the operations of the United Nations is associated with personnel costs and administrative costs, then clearly we have an obligation to address those issues.

I want to make one final point that I think is also important.

The review of the assessments is undertaken every 3 years, and in 1985 such a review will take place. It seems to me that we are at an important crossroads with respect to the costs of operating the United States. Perhaps our representatives will take into consideration the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from New York as they begin to reformulate those assessments.

Indeed, we have an obligation to insure that fiscal responsibility applies to the United Nations as well. I would urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE CHAIRMAN

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind all Members that when any Member is recognized under the 5 minute rule, he or she must remain on his or her feet, even though he or she yields time to another Member.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York indicated that we do spend some time applying accolades to distinguished Members of this House, and I think that is only just and right. I would like to commend the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] for the sincerity of his work and his endeavor in this House, as well as the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], who is always most sincere and hard working. I also want to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON] for inserting this amendment and asking that it be adopted, because I do rise in support of his amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the gentleman's amendment to reduce U.S. contributions to the United Nations by 15 percent beginning in fiscal year 1987.

As we look toward making the cuts in spending necessary to bring the deficit under control, the U.N. is an excellent place to begin cutting.

The U.N. has failed its responsibilities of maintaining international peace, and encouraging respect for human rights and freedoms. Since its founding in 1945, it has been unable to prevent some 140 military conflicts in which up to 10 million people have died. It is currently unable to do anything about the 100,000 Soviet occupation troops in Afghanistan, the brutal campaign by the Vietnamese against Cambodia, or Nicaragua's efforts to destabilize its neighbors and spread communism throughout Central America. It has been unable to do anything about the disaster in Lebanon, the Soviet downing of a Korean airliner or international terrorism.

The U.N.'s support for self-determination of peoples is one-sided at best. It supports so-called national liberation movements, but only when they're sympathetic to Soviet interests. The U.N. does next to nothing to support self-determination for Soviet-dominated Estonia, Lithuania or Latvia, or the respressed nations of Eastern Europe.

The General Assembly's voting habits reveal the far-reaching anti-American bias of the organization. In 1981, the United States was in the minority on 77 percent of all recorded votes; on 84 percent of the votes in 1982; and on 81 percent of the votes in 1983. By contrast, the so-called nonaligned nations sided with the Soviet Union about 85 percent of the time.

The American taxpayers contribute 25 percent of the U.N.'s budget. Why should this continue when the organization is simply used as a forum for anti-American propaganda and cannot effectively resolve international conflicts?

Why should we continue to subsidize the Soviets's use of the organization as a base for espionage throughout the United States. We know from Dr. Arkady Shevchenko of the Soviet Union, who served as U.N. Undersecretary General for political and security council affairs until his defection in 1978, that about a third of all Communist bloc nationals at the Secretariat are officers of their respective secret police with direct ties to the KGB. They use the U.N. for everything from recruiting new agents to gathering intelligence about sensitive high technology.

U.S. contributions to the U.N. should be cut at least 15 percent, maybe more, and we should begin reconsidering our participation in the organization altogether. I urge adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. RESPONSIBILITY OF UNITED STATES MISSIONS TO PROMOTE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS ABROAD.

The United States chief of mission to a foreign country in which there is not respect for freedom of the press shall actively promote respect for freedom of the press in that country. As used in this section, the term "respect for freedom of the press" means that a government—

(1) allows foreign news correspondents into the country and does not subject them to harassment or restrictions, and

(2) allows nongovernment-owned press to operate in the country, and

(3) does not subject the press in the country to systematic censorship.

Mr. WALKER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is fairly self-explanatory. What it attempts to do is assure that the missions abroad in those nations where totalitarian societies are not permitting free press access are given the assignment of trying to promote and insure that access insofar as possible.

What is particularly aimed at in this amendment is to insure that foreign news correspondents in those countries have some access to the nations, but it is also aimed at trying to make certain that our missions in those nations allows the non-government-owned press to operate in the country or at least try to get the governments of those nations to so allow, and also that the governments of those nations do not subject the press in those countries to systematic censorship.

In a world where information has become extremely important, where the worldwide flow of information is so important, it is extremely important to us as free nations to understand that disinformation campaigns by totalitarian nations are aimed directly at us. The one way of assuring that the disinformation does not become pervasive in free societies is to assure free access of information—truth, if you will—to be the order of the day.

So what this amendment is aimed at doing is seeing to it that our missions in nations abroad are trying to promote, insofar as they can, the free press access that is so vitally needed by free societies, to get the information that we need to act intelligently in matters of foreign policy that come before us and act intelligently on our world affairs.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to confirm with the gentleman the fact that there are no funds provided for in this amendment.

Mr. WALKER. That is absolutely correct. There is no money allocated in the amendment. It is something that I think the chiefs of missions can do in their respective assignments without additional dollars.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, let me just say, if I may, that I commend the gentleman on this particular amendment. This subcommittee held numerous hearings on UNESCO, and I might say in that regard that one of the greatest concerns we had was the attempt of some international organizations to license journalists. I think this expresses a very, very natural concern over that.

If I may have just an additional moment, I might just go on to commend the editors of the American newspapers who joined together for the first time on this issue to say that we will fight it worldwide, that we do not want to see any system on the face of this Earth that would provide for the licensing and in effect the censorship of journalists.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I think his hearings were extremely valuable in that regard because I think they do make the point very clear. This amendment is certainly designed in that spirit, and I would hope that the House will accept it.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment on this side.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the gentleman that I, too, support the gentleman's amendment.

As I understand it, this instruction is already incorporated in the State Department's human rights annual report which instructs the Ambassadors to make this point clear to their host governments. It is a principle that we have to continue to promote to the host governments.

A free press obviously plays a very vital role in democratic governments, and truly strong and representative governments have no fear from freedom of the press. So I would urge that the Ambassadors promote that view to their host governments.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his amendment because he makes a very important point.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER.].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PETRI

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PETRI: Page 28, after line 25, add the following new section:

SEC. 128. AN OFFICIAL RESIDENCE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

(a) PROHIBITION.—Until the Congress expressly authorizes such acceptance by law, the United States may not accept a gift of any residence or other structure for the purpose of providing a place of official residence for the Secretary of State or any other official of the Department of State.

(b) STUDY AND REPORT.—The Secretary of State shall conduct a study of any offer of a gift described in subsection (a). Such study shall include an examination of the costs to the United States associated with accepting such gift which relate to the proposed acquisition, maintenance, security, and daily operation of a residence. The Secretary shall transmit the report of any study conducted under this section to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate.

Mr. PETRI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple amendment. It just prevents a civil servant from making on his own a very important decision that ought to be made by the Congress. The decision is whether or not to acquire, through private donation, an official residence for the Secretary of State.

There are several reasons why the Congress should reserve the right to make any such decision. In the first place it sets a very important precedent. If the Secretary of State has a grand mansion provided free of charge, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the CIA, and every other high official will want and get this nice perk too.

I personally don't feel it's appropriate in a democracy to have high officials holding forth like great lords in princely palaces all over the Capital, but at least we should not allow that to happen without consideration by the Congress.

In the second place, while a donated residence might be free of charge to the State Department, except for maintenance costs, it is definitely not free to the taxpayers. After all, a wealthy donor is less likely to give away his mansion out of altruism than because he is financially better off giving it away than selling it. Suppose you own a mansion you'd like to unload. You put it on the market for a while at $5 million and nobody bites. You're afraid you might have to drop down to around $3 million to sell it, which might net you $2.2 million after capital gains taxes and transaction costs. But if you give it away and value the contribution at $5 million, you net $2.5 million in tax savings. You are $300,000 better off and you get praised as a wonderful person in the bargain.

The rest of our Nation's taxpayers, on the other hand, are out $2.5 million in lost revenues, plus the half million or so you might have paid in capital gains taxes if you had sold the mansion, for a grand total of $3 million. The country would be better off if we went out and bought a house directly.

51-059 O-86-36 (Pt. 8)

At least then we would be in control of what we were doing, and we might well decide that some lesser dwelling would serve our purposes. Surely the Congress ought to look at this kind of decision, rather than leaving it to an official who is not charged with looking out for the overall interests of the taxpayers.

There is a third reason the Congress should consider any proposal to get us further into the official residence game. If we do decide to provide residences, God forbid, there may be better ways to do it than any agency official might propose on his own. For example, we might decide to use some houses the Government already owns. Or, since security is the main justification for these residences, we might use dwellings on military bases, which are already secure.

Mr. Chairman, clearly the official residence question is one that should be reserved for the Congress to decide. This amendment would do that in the case of the State Department, and I urge all my colleagues to support it.

□ 1550

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. Yes.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I support the gentleman's amendment. I think he raises an important point and makes a suggestion of reviewing this proposal, studying it and reporting back to the Congress. I think that is a wise suggestion before we establish a precedent and create unnecessary cost with respect to accepting a residence for the purpose of providing a home for the Secretary of State.

We could be creating a precedent for other Cabinet members as well and also incurring other unnecessary costs. So I think the gentleman has raised an appropriate point.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for her support. I would remind her that they will certainly want to have a house for the Secretary of State as grand as that as any Ambassador. You look around town at the British Ambassador and God knows they all live in some pretty grand places; so we are not just talking about a little bungalow down the street.

Ms. SNOWE. The gentleman is correct and I think for that reason we need to study it before we proceed with any kind of project of the nature that is suggested by the State Department.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I would also accept the amendment. I have reviewed it, and maybe for a little different reason.

I cannot condone the accepting of a gift like this that might require maintenance funds. We had a situation in my own area where the Government took over a $14 million mansion and then did not appropriate maintenance money and for 5 years it fell apart and we eventually had to give it back.

I think if the Congress makes a determination that we should have a residence and hopes to fund that residence, that is a different story, but just to accept the gift, I would agree with the gentleman and accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SILJANDER

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SILJANDER: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. COMPLIANCE WITH THE SULLIVAN PRINCIPLES BY THE UNITED STATES EMBASSY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

(a) REQUIREMENT FOR COMPLIANCE.—The President shall ensure that United States diplomatic and consular missions in South Africa comply with the employment principles set forth in subsection (b) with respect to their foreign national employees. The President may waive the requirement for such compliance with respect to any such employment principle if the President determines that it is in the interest of United States national security to do so.

(b) STATEMENT OF EMPLOYMENT PRINCIPLES.—The principles referred to in subsection (a) are as follows:

(1) DESEGREGATING THE RACES.—Desegregating the races in each employment facility, including—

(A) removing all race designation signs;

(B) desegregating all eating, rest, and work facilities; and

(C) terminating all regulations which are based on racial discrimination.

(2) EQUAL EMPLOYMENT.—Providing equal employment for all employees without regard to race or ethnic origin, including—

(A) assuring that any health, accident, or death benefit plans that are established are nondiscriminatory and open to all employees without regard to race or ethnic origin; and

(B)(i) implementing equal and nondiscriminatory terms and conditions of employment for all employees, and (ii) abolishing job reservations, job fragmentation, apprenticeship restrictions for blacks and other nonwhites, and differential employment criteria, which discriminate on the basis of race or ethnic origin.

(3) EQUITABLE PAY SYSTEM.—Assuring that the pay system is equitably applied to all employees without regard to race or ethnic origin, including—

(A) assuring that any wage and salary structure that is implemented is applied equally to all employees without regard to race or ethnic origin;

(B) eliminating any distinctions between hourly and salaried job classifications on the basis of race or ethnic origin; and

(C) eliminating any inequities in seniority and ingrade benefits which are based upon race or ethnic origin.

(4) MINIMUM WAGE AND SALARY STRUCTURE.—Establishing a minimum wage and salary structure based on the appropriate local minimum economic level which takes into account the needs of employees and their families.

(5) INCREASING BLACKS AND OTHER NONWHITES IN CERTAIN JOBS.—Increasing, by appropriate means, the number of blacks and other nonwhites in managerial, supervisory, administrative, clerical, and technical jobs for the purpose of significantly increasing the representation of blacks and other nonwhites in such jobs, including—.

(A) developing training programs that will prepare substantial numbers of blacks and other nonwhites for such jobs as soon as possible, including—

(i) expanding existing programs and forming new programs to train, upgrade, and improve the skills of all categories of employees, and

(ii) creating on-the-job training programs and facilities to assist employees to advance to higher paying jobs requiring greater skills;

(B) establishing procedures to assess, identify, and actively recruit employees with potential for further advancement;

(C) identifying blacks and other nonwhites with high management potential and enrolling them in accelerated management programs;

(D) establishing and expanding programs to enable employees to further their education and skills at recognized education facilities; and

(E) establishing timetables to carry out this paragraph.

(6) IMPROVING LIFE OUTSIDE THE WORKPLACE.—Taking reasonable steps to improve the quality of employees' lives outside the work environment with respect to housing, transportation, schooling, recreation, and health, including—

(A) providing assistance to black and other nonwhite employees for housing, health care, transportation, and recreation either through providing facilities or services or providing financial assistance to employees for such purposes, including the expansion or creation of in-house medical facilities or other medical programs to improve medical care for black and other nonwhite employees and their dependents; and

(B) participating in the development of programs that address the education needs of employees, their dependents, and the local community.

(7) FAIR LABOR PRACTICES.—Recognizing labor unions and implementing fair labor practices, including—

(A) recognizing the right of all employees, regardless of racial or other distinctions, to self-organization and to form, join, or assist labor organizations, freely and without penalty or reprisal, and recognizing the right to refrain from any such activity;

(B) refraining from—

(i) interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees, in the exercise of their rights of self-organization under this paragraph,

(ii) dominating or interfering with the formation or administration of any labor organization, or sponsoring, controlling, or contributing financial or other assistance to it,

(iii) encouraging or discouraging membership in any labor organization by discrimination in regard to hiring, tenure, promotion, or other condition of employment,

(iv) discharging or otherwise disciplining or discriminating against any employee who has exercised any rights of self-organization under this paragraph, and

(v) refusing to bargain collectively with any organization freely chosen by employees to represent them;

(C)(i) allowing employees to exercise rights of self-organization, including solicitation of fellow employees during nonworking hours, (ii) allowing distribution and posting of union literature by employees during nonworking hours in nonworking areas, and (iii) allowing reasonable access to labor organization representatives to communicate with employees on employer premises at reasonable times;

(D) allowing employee representatives to meet with employer representatives during working hours without loss of pay for purposes of collective bargaining, negotiation of agreements, and representation of employee grievances;

(E) regularly informing employees that it is company policy to consult and bargain collectively with organizations which are freely elected by the employees to represent them; and

(F) utilizing impartial persons mutually agreed upon by employer and employee representatives to resolve disputes concerning election of representatives, negotiation of agreements or grievances arising thereunder, or any other matters arising under this paragraph.

(8) INCREASED ACTIVITIES OUTSIDE THE WORKPLACE.—Increasing the dimension of activities outside the workplace, including—

(A) supporting the unrestricted rights of businesses owned by blacks or other nonwhites to locate in the urban areas of South Africa;

(B) attempting to influence other companies in South Africa to implement equal rights principles;

(C) supporting the freedom of mobility of black and other nonwhite employees to seek employment opportunities whenever they exist, and making possible provisions for adequate housing for families of employees near the place of employment; and

(D) supporting the termination of all apartheid laws.

(c) MONITORING COMPLIANCE.—The Inspector General of the Department of State and the Foreign Service shall monitor compliance by the United States diplomatic and consular missions in South Africa with the employment principles set forth in subsection (b). The Inspector General shall submit an annual compliance report to the Congresss.

(d) DEFINITION OF SOUTH AFRICA.—As used in this section, the term "South Africa" includes—

(1) the Republic of South Africa;

(2) any territory under the administration, legal or illegal, of South Africa; and

(3) the "bantustans" or "homelands", to which South African blacks are assigned on the basis of ethnic origin, including the Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Venda, and Ciskei.

Mr. SILJANDER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am very proud to offer this amendment to the bill, as this is the very first opportunity we in the Congress will have to deal with the apartheid issue in South Africa, to speak out in a bold and firm way our unequivocal opposition to the apartheid policies in that country.

The intent of my amendment is to make clear that Congress intends to see that our U.S. Embassy complies with the Sullivan principle. The U.S. Embassy and our State Department have consistently advocated that U.S. firms should be signatories of the Sullivan principle, a principle which has helped blacks in South Africa, contributed to over 120,000 jobs since 1977 and over $100 million for black housing, black education, black health, and black scholarships.

Black South African employees in the Embassy today have very few benefits. They do not have medical disability, retirement benefits, training opportunities, housing assistance, union rights, and true opportunities for advancement.

The Embassy does not comply fully with the principles; however, our Embassy does on balance comply with some of the principles embodied in the Sullivan code; but my colleagues, that is not enough. Our Embassy should practice what it preaches and should be a full signatory to the Sullivan amendment. American companies doing business there are expected to do more than our own Embassy is doing.

Can we really justify in our Embassy that a black is being paid $4—not an hour, $4 a day? That is 50 cents an hour. That is an insult.

Regardless of South African law, the U.S. Government should not be identified with these types of principles and policies.

Today, for example, a black African that works in our Embassy, has worked there over 20 years and he is not entitled to one retirement benefit. He will get a handshake and a send-off and that is it.

A U.S. company if it acted in that way would be ridiculed and judged very harshly and we should judge ourselves equally.

Now, I agree this is just a first step. The Sullivan principles are important for all U.S. firms to comply with, and I have introduced a bill, H.R. 2288, that does specifically that, requiring all U.S. companies, present and new potential firms, to comply fully with the Sullivan principles.

So yes, this is a step in the right direction. It is only a step in that direction. I would hope that this Congress would adopt this amendment as a beginning, as a first signal to that government that we do mean business and we are serious when we say that the policies of apartheid that are abhorrent to our values, that are abhorrent to the values of human beings, that are causing a cultural crisis in that nation and placing it in the hands of revolutionaries, it is time that the white Afrikaner Government hear the heart of the American people.

So I would urge the Congress to adopt this first step, small step, but an important one in a long series of needed action to make sure that the Government policies change in South Africa.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I would be more than happy to yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the gentleman from Michigan for raising this important issue of adherence to the Sullivan principles. I believe adherence to the Sullivan principles, beyond what the gentleman's amendment does today, is very important in the larger effort to bring change to the system of South Africa, which denies to the majority of the inhabitants their most basic and human civil rights.

It is unfortunate at this point that the State Department is not a signatory to the Sullivan principles with respect to our Embassy in South Africa. I know in their opposition they say it would establish an unwise precedent for differing employment practices around the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

(At the request of Ms. SNOWE, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SILJANDER was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I know that the State Department has concerns about establishing different employment practices around the world, but here we are talking about a country that has established a legal code that denies rights on the basis of race. Therefore, we need to treat South Africa differently.

The gentleman has suggested in his support of going further, and I certainly would advocate that, I do believe we should have mandatory compliance for American companies located in South Africa to the Sullivan principles.

The fact is if you look at the voluntary code at this point, that American firms are moving in the wrong direction. Of the 350 firms that are located in South Africa, only 123 comply with the Sullivan code. That is a drop from 146. So it is clear the voluntary code has not improved the present situation.

We need to do more. It has to go beyond the gentleman's amendment.

Yes, it is a step in the right direction, but it should be an indication of our indication to begin that journey to express our abhorrence, our opposition, and to do what is necessary, in fact, rein in U.S. support of the South African economy if that is what it is going to take.

So I thank the gentleman for raising this very significant issue.

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for her comments.

As I said, I have introduced a bill which we will talk about in another forum and in another appropriate situation which does precisely what the gentlewoman advocates regarding all firms, American firms complying with the Sullivan principles.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SILJANDER. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, just for purposes of information again, would the gentleman explain, does the State Department right now support the amendment as it is presently written?

Mr. SILJANDER. I am not sure, but I would doubt it.

Mr. MICA. The State Department does not?

Mr. SILJANDER. They were concerned with unionization, which I feel is not a legitimate concern from my point of view. They were concerned with security, and we have added a provision regarding security interests of the United States, and I have not personally heard back since then.

□ 1600

Mr. MICA. Let me just say as one who has totally endorsed the use of the Sullivan principles by our private sector, the chairman would accept the amendment. But I do have concerns as to why we do not have acceptance from the State Department, and we may choose to have additional hearings on this subject.

Mr. SILJANDER. Just for the gentleman's point of reference, I am not sure where they stand on it today, but to me what is important is where you and I stand on it today.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SILJANDER].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. GINGRICH

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GINGRICH: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. SOVIET AND COMMUNIST DISINFORMATION AND PRESS MANIPULATION.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION.—In order to determine the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office of Soviet and communist disinformation and press manipulation and to provide information to the public on the issue, the President shall establish a commission to investigate the extent of Soviet and communist disinformation and press manipulation with respect to the United States.

(b) MEMBERSHIP.—The commission shall consist of nine members appointed by the President, three of whom shall be journalists, three of whom shall be academics, and three of whom shall be officers or employees of the executive branch of the Government.

(c) REPORT.—Not later than December 31, 1986, the commission shall report to the President and the American people on the results of its study. The report shall include a recommendation on the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office of Soviet and communist disinformation and press manipulation.

(d) DISSEMINATION OF REPORT.—In order to ensure public access to its report, the commission shall distribute copies of that report to schools, libraries, and other appropriate recipients.

(e) FUNDING.—There are authorized to be appropriated $1,500,000 for fiscal year 1986 for the expenses of the Commission in carrying out this section, which amounts are authorized to remain available until expended.

Mr. GINGRICH (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a second amendment and ask unanimous consent they be considered en bloc, and I will explain both amendments at the same time, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GINGRICH: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. SOVIET AND INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST BEHAVIOR.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION.—In order to determine the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office to study Soviet and international communist behavior that violate the concepts of national sovereignty and peace between nations and to provide information to the public on the issue, the President shall establish a commission to investigate the nature of Leninism and the degree to which Leninist parties and Leninist governments systematically develop low intensity conflict activities, including international subversion, terrorism, and guerrilla warfare across national boundaries without a declaration of war.

(b) MEMBERSHIP.—The commission shall consist of nine members appointed by the President, three of whom shall be journalists, three of whom shall be academics, and three of whom shall be officers or employees of the executive branch of the Government.

(c) REPORT.—Not later than December 31, 1986, the commission shall report the results of its study to the President and the American people. The report shall include a recommendation on the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office to study Soviet and international communist behavior that violate the concepts of national sovereignty and peace between nations.

(d) DISSEMINATION OF REPORT.—In order to ensure public access to its report, the commission shall distribute copies of that report to schools, libraries, and other appropriate recipients.

(e) FUNDING.—There are authorized to be appropriated $1,500,000 for fiscal year 1986 for the expenses of the Commission in carrying out this section, which amounts are authorized to remain available until expended.

Mr. GINGRICH (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. GINGRICH. Both of these amendments, Mr. Chairman, call for the State Department to establish a commission composed of nine people, three from the executive branch, and in the first case on Soviet disinformation programs, three from the news media, and three from the academic world.

The purpose of the two amendments is to establish two commissions, each to study whether it would be appropriate for the U.S. Government in the State Department or some other agency to have a permanent agency that is dedicated in a public way to studying Soviet and Leninist behavior. In the first case on press disinformation and the Soviet techniques of manipulating the press there have been a number of examples in recent years in which there is a systematic effort by the KGB and others to manipulate press across the planet. And it seems only appropriate there be some agency which monitors and in a historical manner makes available to the press and to the country information about Soviet and other Communist types of disinformation practices.

In the second case it is very obvious from the Grenada papers and other documents that Leninism is a very real doctrine which a number of Communists groups believe in and in fact practice in Communist countries and that understanding the language and the style of Leninism is a very important step toward appreciating the way in which we are competing with the Soviet Union in tyranny in this planet. And so the second commission would look into the issue of whether or not it would be appropriate in the long run to have a public agency in the State Department or some other branch of the executive branch systematically looking at the establishment of Leninism in the Soviet system, the way in which Leninism works, and the language Leninists use and what it means when translated more accurately into English in democratic societies.

I think these two commissions are important first steps, and they are very minimal steps. They do not commit us to any long-term structure at this time but they focus attention on two areas I think we in this country need to be concerned about and allows us to begin to look at the issue of the way in which the Soviet Union works, both in the press and in establishing Leninist systems of thought and Leninist parties.

Mr. MICA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to yield to the distinguished chairman.

Mr. MICA. Would the gentleman explain again? I hope I did not miss this, but are the provisions for funding removed from this?

Mr. GINGRICH. It is our understanding in the amendment as the committee will adopt it, in the initial offering I had provided for money, but as I understand it the committee is willing to accept an amendment that provides that the Secretary of State needs to find the funding within his aggregate authorization rather than adding new money.

Mr. MICA. It does not designate the amount of funding?

Mr. GINGRICH. No. The amendment as offered would not designate an amount of money.

Mr. MICA. I must say that I understand the gentleman's concern. The only concern that both minority and majority raised on this amendment was to put this type of funding in a bill where we have cut so much, if a study can be conducted with available resources and we do not designate an amount, then we would have no objection.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me just say, if I might for a second, it is my belief, looking at for example the number of senior Foreign Service officers who are available in Washington right now, and looking at the number of agencies in this country that I think would be willing to, if necessary, donate senior staff, that it should be possible to establish this kind of commission in each of these two topics and very profitably have them report.

Ms. SNOWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I support the gentleman's amendment. As the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] indicated, we did have some concerns about requiring additional appropriations. But if it could become an internal function of the State Department then I would support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that the committee staff be allowed to revise the two specific versions I put up here to ensure, I know there is a copy, that technically it has the right language, and I would want that to be the copy for the official printing.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] kindly restate his unanimous consent request?

Mr. GINGRICH. My unanimous-consent request was that the copies of the amendment submitted for the official RECORD be those approved by committee staff as being worded technically correctly to ensure that they do not exceed the authorization and that they not add new moneys.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to entertain the request without the specific language of a modification being present at the desk.

Would the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] withdraw his request for the moment?

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to withdraw my request.

Mr. WEISS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Would the gentleman please advise as to whether he has discussed this matter with the Department of State and what the Department's position on the amendment is?

Mr. GINGRICH. I have discussed it with some people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] has expired.

(On request of Mr. WEISS and by unanimous consent Mr. GINGRICH was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GINGRICH. I have discussed it with some people in the State Department.

Frankly, their position was that if there was additional money they were happy. So they think it is a useful topic and something worth pursuing. I suspect that without the additional money they will be less happy, but I happen to agree with the chairman of the subcommittee who has done a fine job of trying to bring this in under budget and I think it is better for the Secretary of State to find a way to remanage his resources.

Mr. WEISS. If the gentleman will yield further, am I to understand his response as being that he has not discussed this matter with the Secretary of State and that the Secretary of State has taken no position on the amendment as it is presently offered?

Mr. GINGRICH. That is correct.

Mr. WEISS. But that as it was originally, initially offered, the Secretary of State would have supported additional funding?

Mr. GINGRICH. No, I did not talk directly with the Secretary of State, but I did talk with people both in the committee and the State Department who accepted the principle of the two commissions, but would prefer that there would be additional funding. They accepted the principle, that it is well worth our looking at both Soviet disinformation systems, and it is well worth our looking at Leninism.

Mr. WEISS. Would the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MICA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. If I might yield first to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MICA. I would like to explain to the gentleman that apparently a difficulty has arisen. The amendment the gentleman filed at the desk does contain the money. I think it would be appropriate, if I understand the parliamentary situation, if the gentleman ask unanimous consent to withdraw those and submit the corrected amendments at this time.

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the version initially submitted and to submit the technically corrected versions as revised by the committee staff, which I believe are available.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments are withdrawn.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. GINGRICH

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I now offer amendments as revised.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. GINGRICH: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following new section:

SEC. 128. SOVIET AND COMMUNIST DISINFORMATION AND PRESS MANIPULATION.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION.—In order to determine the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office of Soviet and communist disinformation and press manipulation and to provide information to the public on the issue, the President shall establish a commission to investigate the extent of Soviet and communist disinformation and press manipulation with respect to the United States.

(c) REPORT.—Not later than December 31, 1986, the commission shall report to the President and the American people on the results of its study. The report shall include a recommendation on the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office of Soviet and communist disinformation and press manipulation.

(d) DISSEMINATION OF REPORT.—In order to ensure public access to its report, the commission shall distribute copies of that report to schools, libraries, and other appropriate recipients.

(e) FUNDING.—Amounts authorized to be appropriated for "Administration of Foreign Affairs" by section 102(1) may be made available by the Secretary of State to the commission for its expenses in carrying out this section.

SEC. 128. SOVIET AND INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST BEHAVIOR.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION.—In order to determine the advisability of establishing, within the Department of State, a permanent office to study Soviet and international communist behavior that violate the concepts of national sovereignty and peace between nations and to provide information to the public on the issue, the President shall establish a commission to investigate the nature of Leninism and the degree to which Leninist parties and Leninist governments systematically develop low intensity conflict activities, including international subversion, terrorism, and guerrilla warfare across national boundaries without a declaration of war.

(d) DISSEMINATION OF REPORT.—In order to ensure public access to its report, the commission shall distribute copies of that report to schools, libraries, and other appropriate recipients.

(e) FUNDING.—Amounts authorized to be appropriated for "Administration of Foreign Affairs" by section 102(1) may be made available by the Secretary of State to the commission for its expenses in carrying out this section.

Mr. MICA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. MICA. I would just like to point out to the gentleman, although we share some of the same concerns, when this amendment came to our attention we had been looking at alternatives to address this problem. Certainly the way we are proceeding now, without the funding, would be acceptable. But I would like to draw the gentleman's attention to the situation that occurs at the USIA where similar work is being done. However, because of U.S. prohibitions it cannot be released at home.

The committee has indicated, and I have discussed this with the minority, that we may look at possible free standing legislation, if indeed it is appropriate, which would allow this particular work to be disseminated regarding this subject here at home on a permanent basis.

Now we cannot give a commitment as to how we would act on it. But in looking to address this without spending additional funds and where there might be duplication, we have come up with this thought and we will pursue it.

□ 1610

Mr. GINGRICH. I want to thank the chairman [Mr. MICA] and commend him because frankly if we can find a permanent solution like that then it is possible this kind of commission would lead to that proposal, I would be very honored to cosponsor that kind of legislative change.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to inquire for the record if the gentleman could tell us with whom in the State Department he discussed this subject?

Mr. GINGRICH. We discussed it with a number of people largely in the Office of Central American Affairs.

Also I will say to the gentleman I have talked off the record, and I do not have—if the gentleman is asking do I technically have the official approval of this administration for these amendments, the answer is no.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman. I was seeking to get clarification of that point.

Mr. GINGRICH. Thank you.

What I did do, I will say to the gentleman, is I specifically asked down there: "If you are a typical citizen could you find this information, where could you find it?" And I further said, "Would the State Department have any objection to this amendment?" And the answer was "Frankly, we much prefer it would be in an additional authorization" but I accept the chairman's position and the gentlewoman's position as ranking Republican, that they are trying to hold the entire bill under the authorization limit and they are trying to get the Secretary to manage his resources wisely.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I do not have any specific problem with the gentleman's suggestion that the information he seeks is probably useful. The first amendment, as I listened to him describe it, seemd to me to be creating a commission that would gather some information that I would have normally thought would have been gathered routinely by the State Department and, if significant, dispensed routinely to those who might want to see it.

Could the gentleman describe why it is necessary to create a commission to get at that?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes; I think there is some controversy frankly in the American intellectual news media community over the degree to which the Soviet Union and its allies systematically engage in disinformation and in press manipulation.

There is one wing of the news media community and of the academic community that argues there is a very widespread systematic and sophisticated disinformation program.

There is another wing which says well it is really not very important and it really does not do very much.

I think it is important that we establish a historic record that it is relatively easy for either a private citizen or an academic community member or a member of the news media to determine, whether it is as the chairman suggests the USIA or the State Department, and to routinely have access to regular reports on what is happening, what is the historical evidence and what have we learned about both our own susceptibility to disinformation and the Soviet propensity to do that.

So that is the framework. It comes out of a combination of intellectual studies on disinformation, specific examples also. For example, there was a forgery in early 1981 that is now widely regarded as a KGB dissemination effort. It also come from the Grenada papers in which there are fairly specific references to the systematic manipulation of the American news media.

So my thought was simply that a commission composed of, as I said earlier, three people from the news media, three academics, and three people from the executive branch, to look in and report back in the next year on whether or not we need a permanent process of educating ourselves, was an important first step toward this. And the gentleman is correct, there are random places that study this. If you go in as a Member of Congress you can find the right people. I suspect if you went in as an average newspaper reporter or an average citizen, you would find it very difficult to get an adequate briefing on this material.

I thank the chairman very much for accepting this.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have no specific problem with the substantive aim of the legislation, the proposed amendment. It seems to me that in all likelihood that kind of information, as a matter or routine, should be collected and probably is being collected.

The problem I have is with the process. As the gentleman from Georgia was good enough to indicate during the course of our colloquy, the State Department officially has not only taken no position on this proposal, it has not even been given an opportunity to take a position on this proposal.

Now it seems to me that the appropriate process would provide that when you have something such as this matter coming forward that you would have occasion to have the appropriate subcommittee, the subcommittee on which I serve, be given the chance to conduct some hearings or at least some discussions with official representatives of the State Department to determine whether in fact: First, the Department feels that it it important and essential that this information be collected; and second, whether in fact that information is or is not being collected already by the Department or some other agency of Government.

We are in the process right now of discussing a budget deficit of some $225 billion. Even though there is no specific moneys involved in these particular proposals, if in fact there are State Department or other governmental personnel whose time is going to be taken, those people get paid by the Federal Government. It seems to me that we ought to be concerned about the possibility of duplication. Certainly the matter, as important as it may be from the perspective of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] or any of us, is not of such immediate urgency that we should bypass the normal processes of the committee and of the House.

Therefore I would suggest that on the basis of process alone the gentleman ought not to press this, especially since the distinguished chairman of the sucommittee has already indicated that he would like to really explore this in the State Department or see whether in fact there is or is not this information available. The question is, How do you provide for dissemination of the information?

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

Mr. GINGRICH. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Let me just reassure the gentleman that in the conversation that I had earlier with the chairman, and I think this gentleman, as a student of the State Department, would agree there are more than enough senior Foreign Service officers on detached service in Washington at any given time that three of them could be deputized to each of the two commissions. There are more than enough sophisticated news media personnel in the city who I think as a matter of patriotism would be interested at very deep levels in serving on such a commission.

There are more than enough intellectuals that fit into the academic description of these two reports.

I am willing to report to the gentleman that I think with all the different things going on around the planet, with things such as the debate we are having on a variety of topics, that having asked that only as a first step we establish a commission, not asking for a permanent structure, that it would be imprudent to wait an additional year on each of these topics.

I can assure the gentleman that as a former history teacher I have checked and I am quite confident and am willing to assert to this House that on these two topics we very badly need to have a better structure in the Government to make it easier for the American citizenry and American news media to reach this information.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding me this time.

Mr. WEISS. I have been pleased to yield to the gentleman.

I must say as I read the summarization of the second amendment:

> To investigate the nature of Leninism and the degree to which Leninist parties and Leninist governments systematically develop low-intensity conflict activities, including international subversion, terrorism, and guerrilla warfare.

I would be astounded, I would be astounded if the Central Intelligence Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency, and any number of other security agencies of this Government are not already developing that information as a matter of regular course.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WEISS. I would be delighted to yield to my colleague.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this and I guess it is going to be accepted, but I would hope that the subcommittee would evaluate it. What this amendment says on the face of it to me, and I do not know otherwise, is that the private exchange of information in the various news media capacity, both print and television and radio and so forth, does not have a historic memory or institutional memory that they can keep track of what is going on in terms of the Soviet Union, that somehow the National Government, our National Government has to set up a commission with people appointed from the academic world, people from the State Department and so forth to actually keep this institutional record of what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. WEISS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. WEISS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

So I think we should become very concerned about this. I think there is a responsibility that we do keep accurate information for our purposes in terms of diplomacy, in terms of our intelligence gathering, our military activities. But I question the fact that we are fostering and doing this now or propose to do it for the consumption of the free press in this country and in Western democracies. There is a question with regard to the reliability of the information and so forth, I understand. But I am very concerned about this that somehow we think we can frame this information in such a way so that I think it would be in the final analysis somewhat of a statement that is sort of arrogant with regard to the ability of the free press in this country and in the Western World to properly interpret information of what is going on.

□ 1620

So, I think I have some concerns here, and I hope that the subcommittee will consider the concerns of the gentleman from New York and myself.

Mr. WEISS. I am pleased to yield to my distinguished friend from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I am impressed by the fact that the gentleman seems to be concerned about what the State Department thinks about this amendment. I had not noticed that concern on his part before, particularly.

Mr. WEISS. If the gentleman will allow me to, and I will yield back to him again.

Now, it just seems to me that that kind of comment is really out of line. I asked a legitimate question of the gentleman from Georgia, which he legitimately responded to.

Now whether in fact the gentleman agrees with the State Department's position, that is, the gentleman from Georgia, or I agree with the State Department's position is one thing.

The question was, Had the State Department been consulted? And the answer was that in fact it had not been officially consulted.

I am pleased to yield to the gentleman once again.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I would think the gentleman would support this amendment, in that what it seeks to do, as I understand it, is to provide information on which we and the American people can act or react to.

(On request of Mr. LAGOMARSINO and by unanimous consent, Mr. WEISS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. WEISS. I would be pleased to yield to my colleague once again.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. We have debates almost daily it seems about what our policy is and what it should be, and there is a lot of criticism, that you hear from time to time, that our policy in certain areas is only military; that we should be battling with ideas.

Well, I think this is perhaps a very good place where we can accumulate information for that battle, and I would agree with those who say we should face the Soviets and others in the arena of world opinion.

Mr. WEISS. Would my colleague from California not agree with me that in all likelihood, the question of subversion, terrorism, and guerrilla warfare by Leninist parties and governments is not already collected by the various intelligence agencies of the Government?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Yes. Most of that is classified, however.

Mr. WEISS. Right.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the last word.

The gentleman from New York, and I serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, we recently in the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee had a report presented to us regarding human rights violations in Central America.

To my mind, it was a classic example of disinformation, and had it not been for somebody bringing to many members of the committee's attention at the last minute, the origin of this report, we might not have found out that it was paid for at least in large part by the Communist Sandinista Government of Nicaragua.

This report was commissioned by a law firm in Washington, DC. called Reichler & Applebaum. This firm received the equivalent last year of about $320,000 in legal fees from the Communist Nicaraguan Sandinista government.

They sent, from Reichler & Applebaum, a group of people down to Nicaragua to do a human rights study to point out that the majority of the human rights violations were being perpetrated upon the people of that country by the freedom fighters.

Well, they went down and they were housed, they were transported, their food was provided by the Communist Sandinista government. They came back with a report that was in favor of the Communist Sandinista government and against the freedom fighters, and said that the freedom fighters were perpetrating all kinds of atrocities upon the people of Nicaragua.

To verify this report, to make sure they would distance themselves from it, Reichler & Applebaum then commissioned a second group to go down and verify what the first group did. The second group contained a lawyer from Washington, DC, and obviously he came back and verified what the first report said.

Now this gentleman came back, and one of our colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee had a news conference, and at that news conference, the Washington Office on Latin America, signing on to this report and publishing it, they had a big, lavish press conference and at this press conference they pointed out all the atrocities that had been perpetrated upon the people of Nicaragua by the freedom fighters.

This received national publicity; it was on I think CBS Television, Dan Rather's report, for about 2½ minutes. The people of the United States received, in my view, a bunch of Communist disinformation, designed to make the freedom fighters look like the bad guys, while the Communist Sandinista government look like the good guys.

Now that, my friends, is disinformation in my view. I think Congressman GINGRICH's amendment deserves our attention, because the Communists are masters at disinformation and misleading the American people so that they can achieve their goals in our hemisphere.

This is but one example that I am citing today. I think that this amendment deserves our serious consideration, and I urge you to support it.

Mr. RUDD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I will be glad to yield to my colleague from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. On the front page this morning you probably noticed that the Sandinista government has pinpointed its propaganda machine toward the Congress again.

The point is that it appears from everything that is going on that they have a tremendous propaganda machine and a lobbying group that comes right into the Congress of the United States.

When they offer to send 100 Cubans home, everybody seems to be delighted, and it looks like there is peace in our time. I wonder if this, what you are talking about here, is not the basis for that propaganda effort that is made here in Washington, DC, not only on this instance but day after day, which convinces the people here that the Sandinistas are on the right track and that they are good and pure, and that the freedom fighters are bad.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I think my colleague makes a good point. We know there are between 6,000 and 8,000 foreign troops and individuals down in Nicaragua right now whose sole purpose is to help the Communist Sandinista government stay in power and to subvert those countries that adjoin it, like El Salvador and Honduras and Guatemala.

This disinformation takes many forms, and I think you point out a valid case in point. They are sending 100 Cubans home when they have several thousand there, and it really is not making a dent in what is going on, and yet the American people are led to believe that they are taking a giant step toward conciliatory action on the part of the Sandinista government.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

The amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LUNGREN

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LUNGREN: Page 6, strike out line 1 and all that follows through line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following new section:

SEC. 108. LIMITATIONS ON USE OF MIGRATION AND REFUGEE ASSISTANCE FUNDS.

Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated for "Migration and Refugee Assistance" under section 101(4), not more than $2,000,000 for the fiscal year 1986 and not more than $2,000,000 for the fiscal year 1987 may be used for enhanced reception and placement services.

Mr. LUNGREN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, this is a simple amendment. It seeks to eliminate section 108(A) of this bill which, unintended result, I think, would have been to deny those of us on the Judiciary Committee in this House the flexibility to reduce what are totally unacceptable welfare dependency rates among the refugee population.

Unfortunately, as we established the refugee program to assist those who had fled what occurred in Southeast Asia, we made a decision to try and not duplicate the already-existing spending mechanisms or beneficiary mechanisms, and as an unintended result, we have exposed those who come here almost as their first exposure to the welfare system.

For this reason, and others, we have had a welfare dependency rate that is astronomical, particularly when you realize what population we are talking about, a population of people who are basically family oriented, work oriented, goal oriented, and certainly not coming here with a predisposition toward welfare. Unfortunately, at the present time, nationally, for those who are, as they call, time eligible, that is, who have arrived in the United States within the first 3 years, their welfare dependency rate at present is 53.8 percent. In my home State of California, unfortunately, where 40 percent of the total refugee population now resides, unfortunately the dependency rate there is 85.4 percent of those people within the first 3 years of having been here in the United States.

There is a host of problems that these people face, but there is no reason why we should increase the problems that they face when they come here. As a result, those of us on the Immigration Subcommittee, those of us on the full Committee on the Judiciary, have tried to work with the voluntary agencies in order to promote some sort of understanding among ourselves, that is, with the voluntary agencies, with the State and local governments, with the Federal Government, as well, to try and move these people in a manner which will not make welfare so enticing and in fact will not make welfare dependency almost a mark of how you become acculturated to the American experience.

As I said before, that was not the intention of the Congress or this administration or previous administrations. In fact, we acted out of a spirit of help for these people, also out of a spirit of saving money by not duplicating already existing systems. And, unfortunately, as I said, we have had this welfare dependency result.

I believe that the excision of this section of the bill will result in an ability for us to work. I might say that just within the last week I have reached an understanding with the voluntary agencies, with their umbrella organization, as to proper language that we adopted in the refugee authorization bill just this week, which I think will go a long way toward solving the problems that I know we all wish to solve.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. I want to thank the gentleman for his amendment because in no way is it the intent of the committee to preclude the possibility of future consideration of his amendment that is under consideration by the Judiciary Committee which would expand the refugee resettlement from 30 to 90 days.

I would hope that the pilot program that is included in our bill before the committee today would help us in determining the basis for the 90-day period, with the enhancement of placement and reception services, and how the State Department's program would interface with the Department of Health and Human Services Office of Refugee Resettlement.

So I think it will give us a basis for understanding but at the same time I would hope that we could work with the gentleman in the consideration of his legislation because the gentleman's thrust is correct, we need to do everything we can to prevent refugees becoming welfare dependent. So the gentleman's concern is a legitimate one. I support him in his endeavors now and in the future.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take just a few moments on this amendment, hopefully, not too much time, to say that I do have no objection with the striking of 108, section (a).

We had designed that, hopefully, to address the situation that was occurring in other committees. We did not mean to create a problem. However, that problem has long since passed us by, and this does not create any concerns for us.

Yet I would like to express some concern over 108(b), which is not amended by this amendment but would have a $2 million cap on additional funding for testing new models for refugee resettlement. My concern is this: I have no problem allowing for testing and new approaches in handling this refugee problem, and in fact I would commend the gentleman and the Judiciary Committee and other committees of the Congress who are doing everything they can to find better ways to deal with the problem. But my own State of Florida, as well as States such as Texas and California, are very, very cautious about allowing or supporting legislation in this House or in the other body that might inadvertently put a greater burden on individual States. So that when we are talking about measures that might shift the legal responsibility for taking care of refugees away from the Federal Government—and, my friends, it is a Federal responsibility—when we are talking about shifting that to a voluntary agency and in any way saying they would be legally and financially responsible and we, the Federal Government, wash our hands of it, I disagree with that. I would, if amendments come forward on other legislation, oppose very vocally that type of approach.

So I will accept this amendment. The majority would accept this amendment. But I did want to express the concern that any move that would say in any way that the Federal Government is not responsible is not only counter to my feeling but counter to the feeling of most Americans.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. For the gentleman's information, the language that I have worked out with the voluntary agencies with respect to that point eliminates the words "legally and financially responsible."

I think those words are misinterpreted as they appeared in the original Lungren amendment in the last Congress in the Refugee Act. It was never my intention to take the Federal Government off the hook. It was, rather, to say that since the Federal Government is going to pay one way or the other, either through voluntary agencies or the reimbursement that now exists during the 3-year time period for a number of programs and beyond that for other programs, would it not be better to channel those funds to the resettlement program through the voluntary agencies, as opposed to funneling them through the welfare, because one of the things we have found is if you take a refugee landing on our shores and say to him or to her, "In order to be eligible for the assistance that we want through the refugee program, you have to go down to your local welfare department," and then the local welfare worker, acting in all sincerity, says, "By the way, you have these other rights, these other programs that you can get," when that person goes back to the voluntary agency and the voluntary agency says, "We have set up a program to start you on a work schedule, we will help you get a job over here and that will begin you on the path toward meaningful employment," and they get a discordant signal from the local welfare office, we defeat our purpose.

It was never my intention whatsoever to say that the obligation would fall on local government. It was to say since we are paying one way or the other, what is No. 1, more efficient for the Government, and No. 2, probably more importantly, what is the more effective way of assisting these now welfare recipients, these refugees, toward getting into the mainstream of America, which I do not believe and I know the chairman does not believe is welfare dependency.

So I agree with the comments of the chairman, and I just want to reiterate that it was never my intention to take the Federal Government off of the hook in this regard.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAZZOLI. I thank the gentleman for yielding. And while my friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN] is still here, let me take a moment to commend him for the excellent work he has done as the ranking minority member on the subcommittee. As the gentleman from California knows, and since he is from California, a very heavily affected State, as the chairman's State of Florida, it is very difficult for the gentleman to sometimes deal with these problems because of the obvious push and pull and the pressures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] has expired.

(At the request of Mr. MAZZOLI and by unanimous consent, Mr. MICA was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. If the gentleman will yield further, I just simply wish to say that I think the gentleman has really done yeoman services in establishing the original Lungren amendment and the follow-ons to it, which I think will help get the refugees off welfare, and, hopefully, not on it, in the first place.

Mr. MICA. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words for the purpose of engaging our chairman in a brief colloquy.

Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that this legislation calls for one additional State Department position to monitor the Department's reception and placement grants provided to voluntary agencies who resettle refugees. This reception and placement officer, as I understand it, would bring the total complement to four permanent officers who would be devoting full time to monitoring and evaluating the performance of voluntary agencies in resettling refugees under this grant. Can the gentleman from Florida, our chairman, advise me whether my understanding is correct?

Mr. MICA. The gentleman is absolutely correct and the bill now under consideration would call for one additional reception and placement officer in the Bureau of Refugee Programs.

Mr. MAZZOLI. As the gentleman may know, under the authority of the Refugee Act of 1980, as amended, the Judiciary Committee has closely monitored the activities of the voluntary agencies [volags] as they carry out their responsibility for resettling refugees under that act I have closely followed the volag's activities and can state that progress indeed has been made, partially in response to legislative requirements under the Refugee Act. However, I continue to believe that the State Department must carefully monitor these R&P funds, reception and placement funds, which under this bill is $42.8 million. I believe that there must be an increase in the number of full-time, permanent positions in the Refugee Bureau hired to oversee R&P grants. Until this happens, can the chairman assure me as to his committee's intention with regard to staffing for this purpose and whether the chairman and his distinguished subcommittee will support efforts to assure that adequate personnel in the State Department will be made available so that these grants can be administered more effectively and efficiently?

Mr. MICA. Let me fully assure, if I may, the gentleman from Kentucky that our committee does share his concerns. We have discussed these with regard to the administration of R&P grants and the accountability of the voluntary agencies. It is a concern that I personally share. The committee intends that adequate personnel be provided for the purpose of monitoring voluntary agencies' performance under the State Department's reception and placement grants. I assure the gentleman that I will work in an effort to make certain that the State Department provide adequate personnel for this purpose.

Again, let me state that I share the gentleman's concern and will certainly work with him in monitoring this program. I appreciate this point.

□ 1640

Mr. MAZZOLI. Let me salute the chairman on a job well done. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COURTER

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COURTER: Page 28, after line 25, insert the following:

SEC. 128 SOVIET EMPLOYEES AT UNITED STATES DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR MISSIONS IN THE SOVIET UNION.

(a) PROHIBITION ON EMPLOYMENT OF SOVIET CITIZENS.—After September 30, 1986, no citizen of the Soviet Union may be employed as a foreign national employee at United States diplomatic or consular missions in the Soviet Union.

(b) ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO HIRE UNITED STATES CITIZENS.—The Congress hereby expresses its willingness to provide additional funds to the Department of State for the expenses of employing United States citizens to replace Soviet citizens at United States diplomatic and consular missions in the Soviet Union.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted the amendment read because it is a very short one, and a very simple one. I certainly have had the chance to talk to a number of people relative to the amendment.

The amendment is dictated by the fact that at the present time inside the Soviet Union there are anywhere between 200 and 230 Soviet employees working in our consulate in Leningrad and in our Embassy in Moscow. It would not be bad, I would not be here, if it was just another country. I would not be here if they were an ally; I would not be here, in fact, if they comported themselves as many other totalitarian countries do.

In my mind, and I think the minds of many people, this poses a totally unacceptable security risk for our Embassy. As you know, in embassies, there is a lot of conversation; there are friendships that are made; embassies deal with the confidential information. There is no doubt in the author's mind; I am sure there is no doubt in your mind that some of the Soviet personnel that in fact work in our embassies are agents of the KGB.

I am sure that some of you here have had the chance to read Arkady Schevchenko's book "Breaking With Moscow." In that book he indicates the fact that even Soviet diplomats, high-ranking diplomats, and he was the highest ranking diplomat at the United Nations in New York City. He was constantly followed by KGB agents during the entire time that he lived in the United States.

Everybody I think will concede, I believe that it will be stipulated, that some of the Soviet workers that indeed work inside our Embassy are KGB agents. I think we are placing our employees under a great deal of pressure in an environment where there are KGB agents walking around.

As a matter of fact, not long ago it was revealed that during probably the years 1982 to 1984, it was then later discovered that during that period of time, some of our typewriters were in fact bugged. That means the typewriter had a mechanism in it which would be able to determine which letter was being used. That information was relayed to a sensor inside the wall inside the U.S. Embassy, and therefore what was written on those secured typewriters would therefore be channeled and directed to KGB agents outside the Embassy.

Getting the bug inside the wall would require a plasterer, a laborer, a workman inside the Embassy that was obviously a KGB agent that planted the bug itself. It was determined not long ago, I think about a year ago, that the telephone operater that worked in our Embassy was a Soviet national; was a Soviet employee. Could you imagine being a dissident in the Soviet Union or an individual that was thinking asylum, calling up the U.S. Embassy, being greeting by the voice of a fellow citizen of the Soviet Union?

Auto mechanics are Soviet citizens. Drivers for example. It is my understanding that not long ago the drivers of our automobiles over there that drove around our diplomats were Soviet citizens. What type of confidential conversation could you possibly have if you suspected that the driver of your vehicle was working for the Government of the Soviet Union?

How much confidence would Speaker TIP O'NEILL have driving around Washington, having confidential conversations with the majority leader if he knew the driver was a Soviet citizen and possibly an agent of the KGB?

That is the situation that is going on right now at our Embassy inside the Soviet Union. So my amendment simply banishes and prohibits Soviet citizens from working inside our consulate in Leningrad and our Embassy inside the Soviet Union.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman for his amendment because I believe that his amendment raises some very valid concerns regarding the practice of employing Soviet nationals in our Embassy and our consulate in the Soviet Union.

I have no problem with the usual practice of hiring foreign nationals in our Embassies, but I think the situation in the Soviet Union is far from usual. For the past few decades, for example, the security threat to our Embassy and consulate in the Soviet Union has been constant and unmatched elsewhere in other parts of the world.

As the gentleman has indicated through his illustration of the bugging of the typewriters, I think it is a prime example.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER] has expired.

(On request of Ms. SNOWE and by unanimous consent, Mr. COURTER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I continue to yield to the gentlewoman.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman.

As the gentleman indicated thr ugh his illustration of the bugging o1 the typewriters, I think it is a prime example of the problems we are facing in our Embassy and Consulate where we do hire Soviet nationals.

I know that the solution that the gentleman is proposing might add additional expenditures, but I do think it is an expense that we can afford because we cannot afford, in my opinion, to accept the status quo. The fact is that at the Soviet Embassy here in this country, they do not employ other nationals; they do not employ Americans.

So I think that we should follow, for once, the Soviet lead and to end this dangerous disparity. So the gentleman raises, in my opinion, a very valid and legitimate point with his amendment, and one that should be accepted by the House.

Mr. COURTER. I thank the gentlewoman for her contribution.

I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman on his amendment. A little while ago we were debating my amendment which quoted Arkady Shevchenko and some of the remarks that he has made in his book that he has made to Members of this Congress. He reported that when he was the Undersecretary General for Political and Security Council Affairs at the U.N., that some 7 of the 13 Russians that he supervised in the Secretariat were operatives of either the KGB or the GRU, the Soviet Military Intelligence. If you can expect that in the U.N., what can you expect with 230 or whatever was mentioned employees? I assume that these employees are not just truck drivers or chauffeurs or whatever, that they actually work inside the U.N. and the Embassy as well. Is that correct?

□ 1650

Mr. COURTER. That is correct. Many of them physically work inside the embassy itself.

Mr. SOLOMON. I would just like to point one thing out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER] has expired.

(On request of Mr. SOLOMON and by unanimous consent, Mr. COURTER was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. SOLOMON. In supporting the gentleman's amendment, we are going to have graduating from our colleges and our universities across the country in the next 2 or 3 weeks hundreds of thousands of young men and women, many of whom have put in applications already to the Foreign Service to serve in capacities very similar to this. When people scoff and say there is no chance that there could be any spying going on in our embassies in the Soviet Union and elsewhere, let me tell you that just is not the truth.

I think we would not be doing ourselves a favor as far as national security is concerned, but we might even be helping the young people in this country, many of whom would love a job like. Sure, it is difficult when perhaps a family man has to go with his wife and children to live in the Soviet Union, in Moscow, but it does not have to be a family man. It can be younger people, too, to serve in those capacities.

I think we ought to adopt the gentleman's amendment. At least it would give us time to talk about this in conference with the Senate, and maybe even refine the amendment a little bit more. It is a very good amendment, and I support it 100 percent.

Mr. COURTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McEWEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I appreciate his yielding for this reason: That I would just like to augment the example that he used, and that is the transmitter that was placed within the very mechanism of the typewriters. That hollowed bar that had the transmitter inserted operated on batteries that had to be replaced on a regular basis. It meant that the cleaning personnel or someone had to have access to the typewriter on a regular, ongoing basis.

As we know, from press accounts it was built into the typewriter in such a manner that even if the secure conversations could be protected, once those conversations were then transcribed, the private, secure conversations were transcribed through a transmitter that then went to the KGB reception facilities. That could only have been maintained on a constant, ongoing maintenance basis by having KGB personnel, whether they be gardeners, or whether they be light-bulb changers or waste-basket emptiers or whatever the terminology is, as to why it is beneficial for these KGB agents to be crawling around our Embassy.

I think it is a very good amendment and it should be supported. A simple rule of thumb would be to ask the Soviet Union how many American personnel it permits in its Soviet installation here in Washington, DC. You readily understand that they feel that it is important to them and it is a risk to their interest, to have American personnel in their embassies. It is a risk to our interest to have Soviet personnel in our Embassy in Moscow.

Mr. COURTER. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution.

Mr. Chairman, the answer to the gentleman's hypothetical question is the fact that they do not permit any Americans in their Embassy in the United States. They are well known for that. I might add that if you do have Soviet personnel in our Embassy, it is a massive counterintelligence burden that is placed on our people over there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. WEISS and by unanimous consent, Mr. COURTER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman advise me as to whether he has consulted with the State Department on this matter and what the State Department's position is?

Mr. COURTER. It is my understanding that the State Department wants some refining in the language, to be perfectly honest with you. I am not sure precisely what that refining is.

Their sentiments are with me. They recognize the security breaks, but if your question is are they endorsing my amendment, they have not indicated any endorsement.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first amendment on which we have not been able to work out an agreement on a bipartisan basis. I regret that, but let me just say, first, I totally agree with the gentleman's assessment that we have a security problem in Moscow. I must add as chairman with jurisdictions over embassies, that we have a security problem, in numerous embassies all over the world. We have agents and counteragents and agents on top of agents infiltrating our embassies throughout the world.

I would say that we would be happy to deal with this in a closed session of the committee in relation with the Foreign Missions Act and to try to work something out that we think would be effective in dealing with this matter. It is not easy to come to the floor and oppose an amendment that, in effect, says we do not want Soviet agents in our Embassy.

But what I have learned, and let me just share this, and I think Members should be alerted, there problably is going to be a vote on this. I was appointed by the President, this President, and Secreary Shultz to the Inman Commission on International Terrorism and Embassy Security. We have been having meetings for months now about this very problem. We recognize there is a very delicate situation here.

For instance, the types of Americans that we would have to commandeer to do the jobs that we would have to have done, such as custodians and janitors and chauffeurs to be sent to Russia for any length of time, some of our own intelligence people indicate could be more of a target to the Russians than the personnel we already have there resulting in a greater danger.

We know full well who these agents are. We have a pretty good idea of the whole gamut of this operation. The State Department indicated to the chairman, at any rate that they did not want an across-the-board amendment. They would love a sense of the Congress amendment because they agree with the idea that we have to do something and they agree with the idea that there is a problem. However, if we do it across the board, we may create more problems for ourselves. We are dealing with the other problem on the Inman Commission. It requires us to bring hundreds of new Americans into Russia and to place them into housing. How do we secure that housing? Then we are not just talking about bugs and about plants and about spies in the U.S. Embassy; we are talking about every house, every apartment, every facility, every automobile our Americans use. We expand the network. We expand the American presence to a point where our intelligence people have real concerns that we may be creating a bigger problem.

For 7 years I have consistently, supported every measure to tighten our intelligence community, to support our CIA, to try to make these efforts real and not just talk on the floor of the House. But I have real concerns that if we move in this direction right now with a flat law across the board on the books, we will, in effect, be creating problems.

I might just say that the Inman Commission I mentioned, is now talking, because of the sensitivity of this issue, of not producing one public report, but producing 2 or 3 reports, the first one being public and the others being classified, and highly classified at that. I wish it were appropriate and the time were available to bring all of the Members of the House together in secret session and discuss with them the very delicate problems of even trying to create a bubble in a secure situation in Geneva or in other areas where we have reviewed it, let alone an entire embassy.

So I agree with the gentleman in purpose. I agree with the gentleman in goal. But to add, without some real careful thinking, 200 or 300 new Americans and all of their housing and all of their facilities and eventually all of their families to the network that we are already trying to secure, I think would be an error.

So I do object to the amendment. I will oppose it and I would ask Members to oppose this. It is a very sensitive situation and one that should be dealt with at the highest levels of our intelligence community and our security community, in cooperation with the State Department, our military and diplomatic personnel, not an across-the-board amendment on the floor of the House. Let me tell you, the problem does not just stop.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. SMITH of Iowa and by unanimous consent, Mr. MICA was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. MICA. The problem does not stop just in the Soviet Union. If we start this, and I think we need to start on some road to correct our security leaks everywhere. But if we start it in this fashion, this gentleman could list embassy after embassy where, if this were the cure, we would want to use it, and I do not think we would.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we do have security problems, as you mentioned, all over the world, including the new facilities in Moscow, but I think it would be wrong to leave the impression here, as I think may be the case by the record, that these Russian employees, Russian citizens, are all over the embassy. They just are not. They are in certain places where there is not classified material. They just do not run all over the Embassy, and they are used in very specific ways.

The idea that the bugs have to have the batteries replaced is just simply not so. I am not going to get into a great discussion as to how it works, but that is just totally untrue.

Mr. MICA. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think we are raising specters here that do not exist. The objective is good, but the record does not reflect the situation in Moscow.

Mr. MICA. The gentleman is correct, and I might just add that it should be noted in the record that the Secretary of State is as concerned with this right now as any individual I know of.

□ 1700

They have already set forth a plan to improve Embassy security in Moscow and to reduce the number of Soviet employees, which I fully support and which the chairman of the committee has been encouraging.

I just simply say again, in looking at this in a very, very careful way, that the way we are approaching this could be much more hurtful to our intelligence needs than if we thought this out and did it in a more constructive way.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was a little concerned about the remark the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] just made on the bugging of typewriters and whether or not they were battery operated, whether that was true, because obviously the statement had already been made on the floor that that did occur.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman will yield, it is not true. They are not battery operated at all.

Ms. SNOWE. On what basis does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have access to the total information the gentleman is talking about, and the gentleman has, too.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, let me say that this gentleman could cite numerous instances of bugging and of espionage activities, not only at the Moscow Embassy but at embassies around the world. As I indicated, I have been sitting on this commission, and I think they are doing an outstanding job. My only objection is the way this is broadbrushed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] has expired.

(On request of Ms. SNOWE, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MICA was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, my only objection is certainly not to try to eliminate Soviet employees at our Embassy there or to addressing this intelligence problem, but aimed at the way we are doing it now. On the basis of the knowledge I think this gentleman has, that would be available to Members if they would attend some classified briefings on our situation, it could be more damaging than helpful by expanding the area that we would have to secure.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and I appreciate his comments.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] for his workmanlike statement, and it seems to make sense. But I cannot agree with him because if we were to have our own personnel over there, perhaps there would be a reduction of personnel in our Embassy, as well as a reduction in their personnel in their Embassy here.

It is true that around the world in all our Embassies we employ from two-thirds to three-fourths nationals in our Embassies to work in those Embassies. But I have to rise in support of the amendment. I know that our Nation was outraged, those who read about it in the 1950's, when it was discovered that a listening device had been placed in the Great Seal of the United States over the door of our Embassy in Moscow.

We have made serious errors. In building a new Embassy for ourselves, we are in a hole somewhere, but since 1950 no one has done anything about it. In the 1950's we granted permission to the Soviets to build their Embassy on high ground in our own city here. It seems like sheer idiocy that that could happen.

The Soviets employ no foreign nationals in any of their embassies anywhere in the world. Why should we employ their people in our facilities, in the facilities we use in Moscow? I cannot see really why we should, even though there might be some danger. But can we not trust our people? Can we not reduce our numbers to the point where they are manageable?

A few weeks ago we discovered something about the typewriters which had been kicked back and forth here having been implanted with so-called bugs, possibly as long ago as 1982, giving the Soviets an insight into most sensitive diplomatic communications and causing a very significant breach in security.

You can bet that any Soviet working in a U.S. Embassy has some connection with the KGB or he would not be or she would not be in our Embassy there, and they would provide whatever intelligence they might gather to the KGB on our activities there.

Remember that we are dealing with a nation that has already demonstrated a total lack of respect for humanity, shooting down an unarmed Korean aircraft, which also included a Member of this House as a passenger; the murder of a military liaison group member in Potsdam, including the typewriters that have been bugged. And here in the United States they have turned the United Nations into a forum for Soviet propaganda and a base for espionage activities throughout the United States.

We know from the former Under Secretary General for Political and Security Affairs at the United Nations, Arkady Shevchenko, who has been mentioned here before and who defected to the United States in 1978, that about a third of all Communist-bloc nationals in the U.N. Secretariat are officers of their respective secret police and are under the guidance of the KGB. I think that figure might even be low.

If the Soviets are willing to engage in all these things, they are no less capable of placing spies in support and maintenance staff positions in our Embassy. And in fact you can be very sure that is exactly what happens.

Our personnel already work under difficult conditions. Let us not make it easier for the Soviets to undermine U.S. security and interests by allowing Soviets to hold employment in our Embassy in Moscow.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, it is a very difficult position for me to be in here because I cannot disagree with anything the gentleman has said. I know all that has been said, but I would simply add this:

President Reagan, Secretary Shultz, and our intelligence officers on the Inman panel are all working at this very moment on this problem in a way that, they feel, not only can solve the problem but assist us intelligencewise. I say to the gentleman that they feel that this approach is in error.

That is all that I can say because I agree with everything that is being attempted to be done on this floor today; I totally agree.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I respect the gentleman from Florida, as he well knows. But why not pass this amendment and hurry them along a little bit? We help them in all kind of other ways.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

I wish to just put a cap on my presentation in support of this amendment and just state again that there may have been some misunderstanding as to exactly what was discovered in the Soviet Embassy and in the typewriters involved. I wish to emphasize again that the type of transmitter that had been installed was of such a nature that it required maintenance, that is, replacement of the batteries. That created a major concern not only for our State Department but also for our intelligence community in particular, because of a threat that even though secured conservations were protected, if they were transcribed on a typewriter, the transcription was then placed in jeopardy. This sort of thing could place individuals at great risk.

I feel that there is no need to do this by having an unnecessary number of Soviet citizens at the Embassy. I believe that this amendment, while it may be strong and potent, nevertheless is appropriate in order to begin a prompt negotiation and resolution of the dilemma that is accentuated by the discussion we have had here today.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VENTO

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VENTO: Strike section 126 and insert the following:

SEC. 126. ESTABLISHMENT OF A TRAVEL ADVISORY ON THE STATE OF JALISCO, MEXICO.

(a) VIOLENCE AGAINST AMERICANS.—The Congress—

(1) deplores the brutal murder of Drug Enforcement Administration agent Enrique Camarena Salazar, and the abduction and disappearance of numerous other Americans, including John Clay Walker, Alberto Radelat, Dennis Carlson, Rose Carlson, Benjamin Mascarenas, and Patricia Mascarenas; and

(2) finds that the violence perpetrated by drug traffickers in Mexico constitute a danger to the safety of United States citizens living and traveling in the State of Jalisco, Mexico.

(b) TRAVEL ADVISORY.—The Congress, therefore, directs tne Secretary of State to issue a travel advisory warning United States citizens of the current dangers of traveling in the State of Jalisco, Mexico. Such travel advisory shall remain in effect until those responsible for the abduction or murder of any of the aforementioned United States citizens have been brought to trial and a verdict has been obtained.

Mr. VENTO (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I know that my colleagues are generally familiar with the facts surrounding the tragic kidnaping and murder of Enrique Camerena Salazar, a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent who was killed in the line of duty earlier this year. Mr. Camarena was kidnaped in broad daylight on a streeet in Guadalajara, Mexico, only a few blocks from the U.S. Consulate. Mr. Camarena was a dedicated DEA agent who worked to stem the flow of illegal drugs into the United States from Mexico. I know that my colleagues share a common sense of outrage over the despicable kidnaping, torture, and murder of Mr. Camarena and his friend pilot, Mr. Zavala, who was also killed. I want to commend the subcommittee chairman, Mr. MICA, for his inclusion in this measure, a provision which directs the Department of State to issue a travel advisory. My amendment really attempts to perfect that initiative.

I wish to draw my colleagues' attention to the abductions and disappearances of at least six other American citizens from the area of Guadalajara, Mexico. One of these men is 36-year-old John Clay Walker of Roseville, MN; a Vietnam veteran and a father of two young children. Mr. Walker was living temporarily in Guadalajara and was writing a book when he and a companion, Alberto Radelat of Fort Worth, TX, were abducted and tortured in a restaurant in Guadalajara. It is believed that both men may have been killed shortly after their abduction although efforts by police and U.S. consular officials have thus far been unsuccessful in locating the whereabouts of their bodies.

In additon to Mr. Walker and Mr. Radelat, four other U.S. citizens have been the victims of violent abductions since December 1984. These persons include: Dennis and Rose Carlson of Redding, CA, and Benjamin and Patricia Mascarenas of Ely, NV. The Carlsons and the Mascarenases were working as Jehovah Witness missionaries in Guadalajara when they were abducted on December 2, 1984.

Mr. Chairman, I have followed the disappearance of my constituent John Walker for over 3 months now. Throughout this period, I know that Mr. Walker's wife, Eve, his mother, Florence, and the rest of his family have been persistently frustrated by the lack of credible progress in the investigation into his disappearance. John Walker's wife, Eve, has traveled to Guadalajara on several occasions and has met with our consular officials as well as the Mexican police. Mrs. Walker has even met with U.S. Ambassador to Mexico John Gavin to express her frustration about the lack of progress in this case. Mr. Speaker, I share that frustration which I know the Walker family has encountered as well as all of the other families of U.S. citizens who have recently disappeared in the Guadalajara area. It is clear that these are serious problems with the ability of the Mexican authorities to pursue these cases in an efficient and effective manner. Recently, in fact, a Guadalajara police officer who was involved in the investigation of Mr. Walker's disappearance, was himself arrested and charged with involvement in the kidnaping and murder of Mr. Camarena. Other police officers are also alleged to have been involved in that case as well.

When American citizens visit a foreign country, they expect to be protected by local police. When crimes are in fact committed against U.S. citizens in a foreign country, we must rely upon that country to vigorously and effectively pursue the case; through the stages of investigation, arrest, prosecution, and sentencing. When a foreign country cannot meet these obligations for one reason or another or chooses not to meet this obligation, then our government has a duty to our own citizens to advise them of serious problems which they may encounter or which they should be especially alert to.

It is well known that there has recently been an unusual level of criminal activity in the Guadalajara area; most of it associated with illegal drug trafficking. Clearly, the local Mexican authorities are dealing with a dangerous situation which has reached beyond their control. I am hopeful that President de la Madrid's recent call for a reorganization of his country's police forces will be carried out at the earliest opportunity. Meanwhile, however, I believe that it is important that we do what we can here to protect American citizens before they may become victims.

The amendment which I am introducing today to the State Department authorization bill directs the Secretary of State to issue a travel advisory for the State of Jalisco, Mexico because of the current dangers in that region. This amendment would maintain such a travel advisory until those responsible for any one of the abductions or murders of any of the six U.S. citizens which were mentioned earlier are brought to trial and a verdict is obtained. The current violence being perpetrated by drug traffickers in Guadalajara and the surrounding State of Jalisco is a danger to U.S. citizens who may live or visit this area. This problem must be corrected. I hope that the adoption of this amendment will make clear our sense of concern for these missing Americans in Mexico.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I would be happy to yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to tell the gentleman that we are prepared to accept this amendment on our side. We have reviewed the amendment. It does narrow the approach. It appears to be very thoughtfully worded and reflects the situation as it is. We understand the gentleman's concern. The committee has had a number of concerns brought to its attention by other Members of this body on the same subject.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I would be happy to yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman and I rise in support of the gentleman's amendment as well.

I strongly supported the provision that was currently in this legislation, but I have no problem with making it very specific to the State of Jalisco, particularly including the city of Guadalajara.

There is no question that we have a problem and we have an obligation and a responsibility of the Government to warn innocent Americans who are traveling to that country at this time, particularly because of the situation with the drug traffickers, particularly in more recent times with the murder of our drug enforcement agent, Mr. Camerena.

The gentleman suggested with reference to his own constituents, there is the disappearance of more than six Americans that are not accounted for in that country.

The situation is problematic in Mexico with respect to the lax enforcement of law enforcement officials at all levels of the Mexican Government.

With respect to the fact that they represent a danger to Americans traveling to Mexico, I think this is precisely the situation that a travel advisory is designed to address, to warn Americans and provide the kind of information that is necessary.

Unfortunately, these are not isolated incidents, as has been the case, because most of the individuals who have disappeared have been mistaken for drug enforcement agents.

So I do think that we have a clear obligation to warn Americans who are traveling to that country, so I support the gentleman's amendment and I also would urge its adoption.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to commend the gentleman from Minnesota for raising this issue. While many of us would have preferred to have a general travel advisory because of the problems in Mexico, we realize that most of the problems have been concentrated in the State of Jalisco, particularly this area where there has been so much violence that has been perpetrated by the drug traffickers.

I think it is important that we warn our U.S. citizens of the dangers and I hope that Mexico will recognize that this is a reaction by the Congress to a problem that has not been properly addressed by that nation. We hope that Mexico will address the problem in the future in a more effective manner.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I think the major point here is that we are nudging the State Department and the Mexican Government to recognize this important problem that Congress is concerned with.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I just want to commend him for this amendment and say that I support the gentleman wholeheartedly.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

The amendment was agreed to.

● Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to draw the attention of the House to an obscure provision of the State Department authorization bill before us today, which was struck in an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I commend the Committee on Foreign Affairs for agreeing to the amendment which I think maintains integrity in the congressional budget process.

Section 120 of H.R. 2068 created a trust fund by earmarking an existing revenue source to support an ongoing function of the Government. In this case, passport fees—long counted as part of the total general revenues and receipts of the Federal Government and available to fund all Government programs—would henceforth be segregated out of the general revenue pool and available specifically and only to fund the passport operations of the Government.

Now at first glance, you might question why this is something anyone should be concerned about. After all, isn't this pay-as-you-go in action? Isn't this action, taking the fees persons pay for passports and consular services and using them to fund the Passport Office's activities, a good idea? After all, we have all heard about user fees and the need to charge fees commensurate with the cost of providing special services used by narrow groups within the population.

The problem is that in recent years, the tendency has not been to go out and levy a new tax or increase an existing tax to fund closely identifiable services, but rather simply to divert fees, tariffs, or taxes already on the books to particular ends. General revenues are reduced thereby and a particular service or program benefits from its access to revenues it has generated.

Each time we do this we reduce the pool of general revenues available for general Government. The classic example of this was, of course, general revenue sharing in the early seventies. Without new taxes being levied, a new trust fund was created and general revenues for the rest of Government reduced. Obviously, if this practice were carried to its logical conclusion, there would be a substantially reduced pool of revenues available to fund programs very general in nature, without easily identifiable, closely related revenue sources. Those general programs include defense, foreign affairs, criminal justice, food and nutritional assistance, education, training and employment, general science and basic research, and veterans housing. Obviously, the squeeze would be on programs like these programs and not on others which generate some receipts and see those receipts earmarked for their operations.

Then, of course, while some programs are left to face the pressure and uncertainty of an annual struggle for funding, pressure of a different sort builds up, from the advocates of those programs with earmarked funds, for full funding—to the extent of the moneys in the trust fund—and finally, for going off-budget altogether, to be really exempt from budget scrutiny.

In the opinion of many, that is one of the concerns that was in the minds of those who drafted the original Budget Act in 1974. As chairman of the Budget Committee, I have to be concerned about the growing popularity of this practice in recent years in spite of the Budget Act. Subjecting these earmarked revenues to annual appropriations—as this bill would do—in my opinion does not really eliminate the concerns I have just outlined. In my opinion all new trust funds should be carefully considered, and only passed in the most compelling cases—particularly when existing revenues are involved, but even when new revenues are involved.

A few years ago, attempts were made to earmark and spend what was then a new tax—the windfall profits tax. Only because the conferees could not agree on what programs would get special treatment was the decision to allow the new revenues to reduce the deficit made by default.

Again, last year, a measure died in conference which would have earmarked a significant amount of annual customs collections—up to $2 billion a year—to fund port improvements and dredging around the country. This year, we are already hearing talk about earmarking the cigarette tax for health programs. If that is successful, it would make just as much sense to earmark the alcoholic beverage tax in the same manner and, indeed, some are advocating just that.

In bringing this situation to your attention today, I indicate a desire to work with all the committees of the House to develop either an overall policy or work things out on a case-by-case basis. As one of those who worked on the pay-as-you-go concept in the past, I suggest that the concept was not a call for earmarking existing revenues, but rather raising sufficient general revenues to fund new initiatives. In light of the potential conflicts I have outlined, I think it is incumbent upon us to be aware of the funding mechanism which was contained in this bill and to consider whether such an earmarking is appropriate in our budget-making deliberations.●

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I move the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. HEFNER) having assumed the chair, Mr. PEASE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

IN HONOR OF REV. JOHN J. NACCA

(Mr. HORTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday night I attended a retirement party, at which over 800 friends, members of the clergy, and parishioners gathered to pay honor and respect to Father John Nacca. It was a truly joyful occasion.

Father Nacca served the parishioners of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Auburn, NY, with dedication, courage, and sensitivity for over 36 years. He will be sorely missed by all of us who work with and for the people of Auburn.

The Parishioner's Committee of St. Francis of Assisi Church and I have prepared a proclamation in honor of Father Nacca. In honor of his service to God and to the people of Auburn, I insert the proclamation into the RECORD immediately following these remarks:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, Father John J. Nacca was born in Rochester, New York, on May 15, 1915, the son of the late Pasqualino Nacca and Alfonsina D'Angelo Nacca; and

Whereas, Father Nacca attended Holy Rosary Elementary School, Aquinas Institute High School (at which he was Valedictorian of the Class of 1933), St. Andrew's Minor Seminary, and St. Bernard's Major Seminary; and

Whereas, He was ordained to the holy priesthood on June 7, 1941, by the late Bishop James E. Kearney; and

Whereas, He served first as assistant pastor at St. Francis d'Assisi Church in Auburn; then as assistant pastor at St. Francis Xavier in Rochester; only to return to Auburn on the illness of its pastor, Monsignor Gabbani. He then served at St. Mary's of the Assumption in Fairport and in 1949, upon the death of Monsignor Gabbani, Father Nacca was appointed as pastor of St. Francis Church in Auburn. At age 34, he was the youngest pastor in the Diocese of Rochester and now has the longest tenure as paster in the Diocese; and

Whereas, As a result of Father Nacca's outstanding capable and faithful leadership his parishioners have responded on many occasions with an outpouring of generosity in building a new school; a Shrine dedicated to Our Lady of Lourdes; a new church building and extensive renovations to the rectory and church grounds; and

Whereas, Father Nacca has also guided and encouraged his parishioners and friends to fund the establishment of six mission churches including one in Africa, two in South Vietnam and three in India; in addition to providing a "jeep" for the Redemptorist Missions in Paraguay and providing tuitions for sixteen seminarians; and

Whereas, He encouraged his parishioners to annually donate tons of clothing as part of the Thanksgiving Day appeal; and

Whereas, On October 9, 1979, he was honored at testimonial dinner as "Man of the Year" by the Christopher Columbus Commerative Committee; and

Whereas, In 1980, when a major earthquake rocked Central Italy, Father Nacca encouraged and guided his parishioners in raising over $10,000 in cash and collecting several tons of clothing which were rushed to aid the victims of the disaster in Italy; and

Whereas, On June 7, 1981, Father Nacca celebrated his 40th Jubilee of his ordination to the priesthood and was honored by his parishioners and friends; and

Whereas, Father Nacca is also concerned with the needs of the youth of his parish and teaches religion to grades 1 to 12; and

Whereas, In October, 1984, Father Nacca was instrumental in obtaining an imported marble statue of Christopher Columbus with donations from friends and parishioners. The statue was erected in Columbus Park opposite the Church on Clark Street. The monument stands as a memorial to honor all immigrants of all countries who worked so hard and so perseveringly to change a land of wilderness into fertile fields, super highways and gleaming skyscrapers; and made a home free from tyranny and oppression. The memorial was dedicated in impressive ceremonies on October 21, 1984; and

Whereas, On November 12, 1984, Father Nacca was appropriately honored by the Italian Heritage Society of Auburn and Cayuga County for his recognition and concern for the contributions of the Italian immigrants, and all immigrants, in the founding and establishment of our nation, our community and our Parish church; and

Whereas, On June 25, 1985, Father Nacca will reach a milestone in his career as he reaches the Mandatory Retirement Age of the Diocese of Rochester and will step down from an active role as shepherd of his flock into a less active role; and

Now therefore be it resolved, that, I, Congressman Frank Horton, on behalf of and in full recognition of the tremendous regard that the people of Auburn have for this truly outstanding spiritual and community leader and in recognition for his acts of charity, humility, and generosity; for his concern for the fulfillment and preservation of life and the improvement of the Auburn community, do hereby proclaim my appreciation for Father John J. Nacca and urge all of the people of Auburn to express their gratitude for his efforts on behalf of our community.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 2068, just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of the special order today by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 484. An act to amend the Saccharin Study and Labeling Act.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of sections 276d-276g of title 22, United States Code, as amended, appoints Mr. HATCH as a member of the Senate delegation to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group during the first session of the 99th Congress, to be held in Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Canada, on May 17-20, 1985.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of sections 1928a-1928d of title 22, United States Code, as amended, the Vice President appoints Mr. ROTH and Mr. MCCLURE as members of the Senate delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly Spring Meeting, to be held in Stuttgart, Germany, on May 17-20, 1985.

THE ALLOWABLE COST REFORM ACT

(Mr. NICHOLS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday on behalf of myself, Mr. BENNETT and Mr. HOPKINS, I introduced, H.R. 2397, the Allowable Cost Reform Act. This bill is the outgrowth of a joint investigation by the Seapower and Strategic and Critical Materials Subcommittee and the Investigations Subcommittee into the indirect cost billings of seven major defense contractors. Although our audit work is continuing, we have gathered sufficient information to identify several significant problem areas. During the audit we found that contractors companies had submitted bills to the Department of Defense for, among other things: $1,000 in meals they had with commercial customers; $12,333 for two season passes to the L. A. Forum; $10,713 for a barber shop for senior company executives; and $959 for a golf outing.

While these may be legitimate business expenses for IRS, we must decide whether or not the U.S. taxpayer will foot the bill for expenses such as these on military contracts.

I believe, as a result of our findings, that legislative action is appropriate and necessary to ensure that there is no question what the Government will or will not pay for, and to make it clear that dog kennel expenses will not be paid for by the American taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2397 will:

First, prohibit a contractor from charging the Government for entertainment costs, lobbying costs, alcoholic beverages, dues for any social or dining club, contributions or donations, fines and penalties, defense of fraud proceedings, advertising costs, and the cost of gifts, models, souvenirs and other mementos;

Second, require the DOD to tighten up its regulations and eliminate the gray areas;

Third, penalize a contractor for submitting expressly unallowable costs; and,

Fourth, establish a mandatory rotation every 5 years for the Government representative, the administrative contracting officer, who is the watchdog for the taxpayers' money.

We believe these provisions will go a long way toward correcting the abuses which have been brought to our attention, and I urge my colleagues to join myself and Mr. BENNETT in our efforts to prevent these abuses in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

H.R. 2397

A bill to limit the payment of costs to defense contractors

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Allowable Cost Reform Act".

SEC. 2. ALLOWABLE CONTRACT COSTS.

(a) PENALTY FOR SUBMISSION OF UNALLOWABLE COSTS.—The Secretary of Defense shall require that a covered contract provide that—

(1) if the contractor submits for reimbursement any cost that has been expressly defined as unallowable by statute or regulation—

(A) the cost shall be disallowed; and

(B) the contractor shall be liable to the United States for an amount equal to the amount of the disallowed cost, plus interest; and

(2) if the contractor submits for reimbursement any cost of a type that has been expressly defined as unallowable by statute or regulation and that has been previously disallowed to that contractor—

(A) the cost shall be disallowed; and

(B) the contractor shall be liable to the United States for an amount equal to twice the amount of the disallowed cost, plus interest.

Interest under this subsection shall be computed from the date on which the request for reimbursement of the cost was submitted and at the applicable rate prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury under section———of the Contract Disputes Act of 1978.

(b) UNALLOWABLE COSTS.—The following costs shall not be allowed under a covered contract:

(1) Costs of amusement, diversion, and social activities and any costs directly associated with such costs (such as tickets to shows or sports events, meals, lodging, rentals, transportation, and gratuities).

(2) Costs incurred to influence (directly or indirectly) congressional action on any legislation or appropriation matters pending before Congress.

(3) Defense of any fraud proceeding brought by the United States, unless the contractor is found not to be liable in any way for the alleged fraud.

(4) Fines and penalties resulting from violations of, or failure of the contractor to comply with, Federal, State, or local laws and regulations, except when incurred as a result of compliance with specific terms and conditions of the contract or written instructions from the contracting officer.

(5) Costs of membership in any social or dining club or organization.

(6) Alcoholic beverages.

(7) Contributions or donations, regardless of the recipient.

(8) Advertising designed to promote the contractor or its products.

(9) Models, gifts, souvenirs, or other memorabilia.

(c) REGULATIONS RELATING TO ALLOWABLE COSTS.—(1) Within 120 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall publish proposed regulations to amend those provisions of the Department of Defense supplement to the Federal Acquisition Regulation that deals with the allowability of contractor costs reimbursed under Government contracts. In developing specific criteria for the allowability of such costs, the Secretary shall consider whether reimbursement of such costs by the Government is in the best interests of the United States. The amendments—

(A) shall define in detail and in specific terms those costs that are unallowable under contracts entered into by the Department of Defense; and

(B) shall provide that costs specifically unallowable under one cost principle shall not be allowable under related cost principles.

(2) The amendments under paragraph (1) shall at a minimum clarify the cost principles applicable to contractor costs of the following:

(A) Air shows.
(B) Advertising.
(C) Recruitment.
(D) Entertainment.
(E) Employee morale and welfare.
(F) Social and dining clubs or organizations.
(G) Contributions or donations.
(H) Community relations.
(I) Defense of fraud proceedings.
(J) Fines and penalties.
(K) Dining facilities.
(L) Professional and consulting services.
(M) Compensation.

(3) Such amendments shall require that a contractor be required to provide sufficient documentation to support the allowability of a cost at the time cost and pricing data is submitted to the Government pursuant to section 2306 of title 10, United States Code, or at the time a proposed forward pricing agreement or proposal for final settlement is submitted to the Government. If a claim is not supported by adequate documentation, the cost becomes expressly unallowable and is not subject to negotiation.

(4) Within 90 days of the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives a report identifying—

(A) the nature of the proposed changes to be made to the current cost principles; and

(B) the potential effect of such changes on future requests for reimbursement of contractor costs.

(d) RESOLUTION OF ALLOWABLE EXPENSES.—The Secretary of Defense shall—

(1) require the negotiation and settlement of each item of cost under a covered contract which is challenged by the Government as being unallowable; and

(2) provide that, whenever feasible and practicable, the contract auditor may be present at any negotiation or meeting with the contractor regarding resolution of allowability of costs submitted to the Government for payment.

(e) CERTIFICATION OF ALLOWABLE INDIRECT COSTS.—(1) If a contractor submits a request for reimbursement of indirect costs for final settlement under a covered contract, the contractor shall be required to certify that all indirect costs included in the request are allowable in accordance with the terms of the contract. Any such certification shall be in a form prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

(2) The Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of the military department concerned may waive the requirement for certification under paragraph (1) in the case of any contract in an exceptional case if the Secretary—

(A) determines that it would not be in the interest of the United States to require such certification; and

(B) states in writing the reasons for that determination.

(f) LIMITATION ON LENGTH OF DUTY ASSIGNMENT FOR CERTAIN CONTRACTING OFFICIALS.—The Secretaries of the military departments and Directors of the Defense Agencies shall prescribe regulations—

(1) to limit to five years the maximum tour of duty for which an officer or employee under the jurisdiction of the Secretary may be assigned to represent the Government with a particular contractor in the decision-making position as corporate administrative contracting officer or administrative officer; and

(2) to provide that an officer or employee who has held a position in paragraph (1) may not be reassigned to duty with that contractor for a period of five years after the end of the previous such assignment.

(g) DEFINITION OF COVERED CONTRACT.—For the purposes of this section, the term "covered contract" means a contract with the Department of Defense for an amount more than $25,000—

(1) that is flexibly priced; or

(2) for which cost or pricing data is required under section 2306(f) of title 10, United States Code.

AMBIVALENCE ABOUT SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I have recently attempted to make light of the fact that small business men and women are generally ambivalent about the Small Business Administration. Recent studies and surveys clearly point this out. Furthermore, according to an article published in the May 1985 issue of Inc. magazine, that ambivalence also extends to the various groups entrusted by small business to represent their interests.

The article was accurate in its assessment that there was no unified opposition among small business people to our proposal to dismantle the SBA. In fact, the author stated that "a number of legislators and small business lobbyists even told reporters that the idea had merit" and it "reflected the growing perception that the SBA is a pork-barrel agency laden with wasteful loan and assistance programs."

The author went on to point out that, when Small Business United held its annual leadership conference in January to resolve questions of political identity and strategy, "from the outset, ambivalence about the SBA dominated the strategy debate." The overall conclusion was that "small business could lose an opportunity to help fashion vital national policy if it concentrates on saving the SBA."

This all leads me to ask why so many of my colleagues here in Congress continue to support the use of scarce taxpayer dollars to fund a federal program which has no significant support among the constituency it is designed to serve?

The article from Inc. follows:

BEYOND UNCLE SAM AND HIS GIFTS

(By Steve Coll)

David Stockman, who was girding for a fight, couldn't have anticipated the apathy that greeted his idea. When word leaked out last December that the Office of Management and Budget might propose abolishment of the Small Business Administration, no hasty gatherings of small businesspeople denounced the proposal, and no urgent petitions circulated among members of Congress. A number of legislators and small business lobbyists even told reporters that the idea had merit. The indifferent reaction to Stockman's proposal reflected the growing perception that the SBA is a pork-barrel agency laden with wasteful loan and assistance programs. But it was also a symptom of a political crisis among many small business lobbyists, one that may cripple their effectiveness in the 99th Congress.

The crisis is one of identity and strategy. In the eyes of policymakers in Washington, is small business simply another entry in the dreary list of special interest groups that see Uncle Sam as a source of almost unlimited largesse? Or does small business have a more expansive political identity that describes an essential and dynamic sector of the national economy that has an overriding stake in major economic issues? Perhaps only once in a generation does the opportunity come that exists today to refashion fundamentally the tax system and redefine fiscal policy. Will small business expend its limited political strength by competing for its share of the federal dole, or will it move on to issues that are at the top of the national agenda?

In mid-January, as the Administration's plan to abolish the SBA gathered strength in Washington, more than 100 small business activists met in Scottsdale, Ariz., to resolve these questions of political identity and strategy. The occasion was the fourth annual leadership conference of Small Business United (SBU), an umbrella lobbying organization made up of about a dozen regional small business groups from across the country. The purpose of the conference, which was organized much like a political convention, was to adopt a narrow platform of legislative priorities for the first session of the 99th Congress. For two days, delegates debated the issues before voting on their top priorities.

From the outset, ambivalence about the SBA dominated the strategy debate. Thomas Powers, general counsel of the House Small Business Committee, told the conference, "I think each and every one of you ought to be insulted that anyone would propose to eliminate the SBA." That drew a sharp retort from a Texas delegate. "Every time I go to these meetings and hear people from Washington, they're always talking about how much they're going to lose from their budget," said David Pinkus, a Dallas landscape contractor. "You can't sit down and let every special interest group have their own agency in Washington." Pinkus and other delegates—many of them young and from the Southwest—urged the conference to make tax reform and deficit reduction its top priorities in 1985.

As the conference wore on, though, the traditionalist view that the SBA is small business' most important link to power in Washington began to prevail. "If we lose the SBA, it really will cause a domino effect within the small business community," argued Allen Neece, SBU's Washington counsel. And as the debate reached the height of its passion, Robert Dotchin, staff director of the Senate Small Business Committee, proclaimed to the delegates: "One thing is sacred, and that is this agency! It's going to be maintained."

The vote on the platform perfectly captured the political schisms that threaten to drain the already limited clout of small business in Washington. Tied for first place as SBU's top legislative priorities in 1985 are two contrary objectives: saving the SBA and reducing the federal deficit. Tax simplification finished second in the conference balloting. In its presentation to Congress, scheduled for April, SBU would be in the same untenable position as hundreds of other special interest lobbies in Washington.

The long-term implications of SBU's political identity crisis were not lost on some of the conference delegates. "I worry that we don't have a tremendous number of snazzy new initiatives," reflected Jack Rennie, the immediate past-president of SBU and an active member of the Smaller Business Association of New England. "It's almost like the difference between a long-range plan in business and this year's budget. We seem to churn over many of the same kind of issues, sometimes identical issues. . . . Maybe we need some kind of far-thinking council, or some kind of new group to look beyond the tactical or topical issues."

The leadership vacuum Rennie describes within SBU and similar lobbies has direct political costs. When small business advocates espouse a political vision that is blatantly parochial, they risk the loss of visibility and access in Washington—and, ultimately, a loss of influence.

That lesson was painfully clear even at the Arizona conference. On the same weekend that it was taking place, 21 U.S. senators from both parties were ensconced in hotel rooms less than a 10-minute drive from the meetings. The senators were in town for what a spokesperson described as a "very relaxed" charity tennis tournament. Despite weeks of effort by SBU representatives, only Lowell P. Weicker Jr. (R-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, stopped by the conference—and only for a 10-minute breakfast talk. Gulping down a glass of orange juice before rushing out with his aides, Weicker told the small businesspeople, "I love you all, but I came out here to play tennis."

It would be wrong to lay all the blame for this disheartening state of affairs on the rank and file members of SBU. Building national political leadership, notes SBU president Brad Roller, owner of Swiger Coil Systems Inc., of Cleveland, is "just a really big undertaking for guys who happen to be working and running businesses." The first step toward that goal, however, is to establish political priorities that move such small businesspeople as Roller beyond Uncle Sam's tempting handouts. Until then, as Roller puts it, small businesspeople may continue to be perceived in Washington "as a bunch of lunatics out there who aren't capable of dealing with the political process."

MESSAGE FROM A NICARAGUAN PATRIOT

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, a Nicaraguan citizen, who was a former Sandinista, but then fled her country, has written a letter to Members of the Congress which deserves the attention of all of us. I am inserting it in the RECORD to remind my colleagues of the "Brutal military dictatorship led by the Sandinista National Liberation Front, FSLN."

This Nicaraguan citizen, Mrs. Adriana Guillen, is now a resident in the United States. She has viewed with dismay the extent to which Nicaragua has become a "political" issue in the United States. I understand Mrs. Guillen's concern because she has seen first hand the betrayal of her country and the revolution that threw out the Somoza dictatorship and installed another dictatorship in its place.

We in the United States must recognize the threat from the Sandinista regime, and it is useful to read Mrs. Guillen's letter in order to appreciate how grave that threat is. I urge my colleagues to read the words of this Nicaraguan patriot.

Letter from Adriana Guillen:

April 23, 1985.

MEMBERS OF THE U.S. CONGRESS,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: I am a Nicaraguan citizen who has become an American resident after being granted political asylum in this generous country. I am a Sandinista dissident, my father fought with Sandino at the early age of fifteen; I served in the Sandinista government from July 1979 to February 1980 when I resigned in protest for their totalitarian path and I went to work for LA PRENSA until the Sandinistas accused me of an international plot and sentenced me in absentia—while I was writing a story in Costa Rica.

From the tradition of Sandinismo that my family and I stand for: A representative system, nationalistic and loving of freedom and justice; I did not agree with the role played by the "Marines" in my fatherland nor do I agree with the role played by the Cubans, Soviets and other internationalists today in Nicaragua. This is the force that pushed me to struggle for a Nicaragua free of foreign presence, in peace with its people and its neighbors.

Looking at Capitol Hill today I understand why liberation movements in the Third World have been lost to the Soviet influence; I understand why we in Nicaragua received a bad signal from the U.S.A.; I understand why thousands of repatriates come to this land and will continue to come. Some policy-makers here only care about their next election: To our dismay they have chosen Nicaragua to be the issue, we have lost our cause. But one thing is for sure, the sons of those politicians will have to fight the struggle that they are preventing Nicaraguans from fighting.

U.S. foreign policy towards Nicaragua has consistently supported military dictatorship, corruption and violation of Human Rights; U.S. foreign policy today—as it is presented by the Democratic leadership . . . wants to continue that tradition by supporting a brutal military dictatorship led by the Sandinista National Liberation Front, FSLN, as well as by preventing the indigenous resistance from restoring the Nicaraguan revolution that we won in July 1979.

There is nothing new in the approach proposed by the Democratic leadership; the powerful and developed Establishment does not need to listen to the peasants of Nicaragua who are fleeing by the hundreds of thousands, to the workers who earn $5 dollars a month, to the mothers who are sent to jail because they protest the killing of their sons defending the Sandinista regime that they reject, to the minorities of Indians and Creolles who are victims of Genocide. The Democratic leadership does not remember the violations of International Law they supported in June 1979 on behalf of the Sandinistas, (I thought it was on behalf of the Nicaraguan people but time has demonstrated that it was on behalf of the Sandinistas) and they claim that they should not intervene in Nicaragua so that self-determination would be possible. Let's set the record straight: collective action is fair—as it was at the time of ousting Somoza—when it is done on the grounds of defending Human Rights or when a destabilizing regime is at the bottom-line of the given problem. They know that, they know everything they need to know in order to support the wide-spread resisitance of Nicaraguans. But as Gus Tyler wrote, they [1] are only concerned about the next election.

It is clear to me that the fate of my fatherland is not in our hands, it does not depend on those whose lives are sacrificed in the battlefield and in the Sandinista prisons; it is up to the liberals who claimed to act on moral grounds in 1979 but are decided to save the Sandinistas no matter what they are doing against Human Rights, no matter what they are doing to destabilize the area.

I hope that after killing the support to the Nicaraguan resistence—that means killing thousands of people—they will at least respect the victims they will have created. Insulting Nicaraguans in the way they have been doing is an arrogant attitude; not only North Americans have heroes, Central Americans do have our respected Fathers and they deserve respect; the anonymous mother, the young who rejects the Sandinista regime, the worker, the campseino, the Miskito, the Creolle, are all of them Patriots who should not be insulted. It is not for well-to-do bureacrats to judge the moral values of people whom they do not care to know.

This letter is not to insult anyone. I believe that what I am writing here is the feeling of the majority of Nicaraguans and it is good to convey it to the interested parties and if possible to the people of this country. I respect your values and I know that the majority of the people would support our cause should they know exactly what is going on; I know many Congressmen who act on moral grounds, who were against Somoza in July 1979 and are against the Sandinista in 1985 because they are supporting the struggle for Democracy.

God help my country; God bless your country.

Very sincerely,

ADRIANA GUILLEN.

NEW ZEALAND

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOLINARI] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, it has been 3 months since the Government of New Zealand denied port access to one of our U.S. ships as a result of its ban on nuclear armed and powered ships in their ports. Immediately after the denial of port access to the Buchanan, the United States announced that it was canceling joint military exercises and reducing the amount of intelligence information shared with New Zealand.

We all hoped at that time that, after the dust had settled, the Government of New Zealand would reconsider the ban and start taking steps toward repairing the damage that was done.

Three months later, we have seen no moves by the New Zealand Government, no discussions or demonstrable progress toward even the consideration of restoring port access. At congressional hearings held last March, several members, including myself, discussed the need for legislation here in Congress to respond to the port access ban. Yet we withheld such legislation in the hope that, given time, New Zealand would work with us in resolving the dispute. Unfortunately, this has not happened.

In replying to a cable sent by myself and 140 of our colleagues to Members of the New Zealand Parliament on March 7 requesting that New Zealand reconsider it's ban, Prime Minister Lange stated that, "We have formulated our policy in the strategic interests of New Zealand." When we look at recent strategic developments in the South Pacific, however, one must question the wisdom of his government's course of action.

Today, Camlerahn Bay in Vietnam has been turned into a major Soviet air and naval facility. It is now a home base for Badger bombers, Mig-23 jet fighters and surveillance craft, enabling 25 to 30 Soviet ships to be present each day in the South China Sea. This represents an unprecedented Soviet military presence in the region. It was reported a few weeks ago that the Soviet Union is negotiating a fishing agreement with the Pacific island nation of Kiribati, signifying additional Soviet presence in the South Pacific. Although the threat may not seem to be significant at the present time, I believe there is cause for genuine alarm should this Soviet presence continue to grow in the days ahead.

In addition, the current unrest and rise of anti-American sentiments in the Philippines has raised some concern over the security of Clark Air Base and Subic Bay Naval Base, two key U.S. facilities in the region. Some opponents of President Marcos have pledged that, should they come to power, these two bases would be closed.

Strong defense capabilities and the ANZUS alliance have been effective over the past 34 years in maintaining peace in the South Pacific region. By crippling ANZUS, as New Zealand has done with its port access ban in direct opposition to recent ANZUS Council statements reaffirming the importance of port access, New Zealand has served to significantly damage our mission of preserving the stability and peace now enjoyed in that region.

Polls indicate that while a majority of New Zealanders are still in support of the ban, they also support New Zealand's continued participation in ANZUS. This stand remains confusing as there is support for a mutual security treaty which necessarily imposes risks and burdens on all members of the alliance, but there also exists a certain selective quality about what aspects and responsibilities of the treaty New Zealanders are willing to accept.

The response by the United States to New Zealand's refusal to allow port access to one of our naval ships has been firm but measured, demonstrating our disappointment over the action without making any attempt to bully New Zealand. As I mentioned, specific legislation addressing this issue has been withheld to this point. Yet, now interest is growing for legislation seeking to limit casein imports, one of New Zealand's major exports and a product which is displacing much of our own nonfat dry milk. Patience, which has held back many of these measures, may now be running thin.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for New Zealand to do what's right, both for itself and for its region. We cannot afford to continue with this present state of inaction while the consequences of New Zealand's decision continue to grow more serious.

The United States should not have to hope that New Zealand changes it course, we should expect it.

COMMENDING MINORITY LEADERSHIP FOR MEASURES TO REFORM PROCEDURES OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to congratulate the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] who earlier today were instrumental in bringing to the floor the measure designed to reform the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I think particularly the efforts of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] need to be commended in this regard because this now is the second reform measure that he has brought to the floor in the last couple of weeks. The first reform measure, which allowed for wider television camera coverage during the time when we were voting I think was significant in that it was accepted and that was the first of a series of reform measures that the minority has brought to the floor. That one was accepted. We were disappointed when the next one was rejected. That one was the measure aimed at ending the practice of ghost voting here in the House. The idea that people can go to their committees and hand in a piece of paper and then leave and have that piece of paper voted for them rather than voting is an affront to democracy. It is an affront to the legislative process and it is particularly onerous from the standpoint of the minority who time after time in committee are being voted down by people who are not there but who are in fact being voted as ghosts.

When that measure came to the House floor here last week it was tabled by the majority. So that reform measure, turned down by the House of Representatives, ghost voting, is something that they wanted to continue.

And then today we had before us a measure to assure an accurate CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The gentleman from Mississippi again was in the forefront of bringing that to the floor.

I think the case was made. The case was made that this is not just a short-term problem of a few incidents where the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is distorted but a long-term problem, a problem that has been with us since the 1960's, throughout the 1970's and up to the present day, where we are dealing with a distorted public document where the right of Members to revise and extend has been abused to the point that you cannot rely upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as being an accurate reflection of what takes place in this body.

There was an attempt here today on the floor to begin the process of assuring the public that we could in fact produce an accurate public document here in the Congress. That was turned down as well. Once again the Democratic majority refused to consider the matter that was before us; namely, a change in the rules.

Rather, what they did was try to narrow the issue, try to trivialize the issue, in fact, and sent it to the House Administration Committee where they hope to get an action which will be less than what is needed in order to change the rule around here and get us a verbatim transcript of what takes place on the House floor.

What we are seeing is a systematic effort by the majority to maintain rules that are the antithesis of good legislative practice. We need legislative reform and the effort that has been begun here in the last couple of weeks I think deserves the commendation of all of those across the country who are in favor of good Government.

It is an effort that I believe we will see continue. I think we are going to see a number of reform measures come before the House and I would suggest to some of my Democratic colleagues that they may want to become a little careful about voting with their leadership all of the time on things that are against reform. They have voted blindly here in the last few weeks and there are already many of them on record now as voting for ghost voting and voting against CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reform.

I do not think that that is a record I would want to take to the voters in my district and I think as some of these things begin to pile up, like perhaps junketing reform, perhaps an attendance reform here on the House floor requiring a certain amount of attendance on the House floor, some things like that, they may not want to be on record as voting with their leadership all of the time in these matters.

These are distinct reform measures that deserve the support of not only Republicans but Democrats as well. The Republicans have been voting solidly for reform. It is disappointing that the Democrats thus far have not. Let us hope it changes in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF DEATH OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DWYER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride and sorrow that I join my colleagues in paying tribute to the late Cardinal Mindszenty on the 10th anniversary of his death. His unyielding struggle and commitment to the field of human rights has inspired free Hungarians around the world.

I believe, as we all do, that expressions of support are important in the continuing struggle for equality and human rights. Strong and courageous individuals like Jozsef Mindszenty spent a lifetime pursuing the struggle for liberty. As a result of his outspoken criticism, he was arrested, charged with treason, and eventually imprisoned. Indeed, he was a man of tremendous courage and compassion.

As the Nation to which many others look for guidance on human rights, we must continually strive for the preservation and extension of basic human freedom for all people, regardless of the nation in which they reside. Our tribute to Cardinal Mindszenty today can only reaffirm our longstanding commitment to this struggle.

I wish to take this opportunity to reaffirm my commitment with those in Hungary who suffer from the oppression of totalitarianism. The daily indignities to which Hungarians are subjected to should serve as a constant reminder to us in the free world.

These statements are now an essential ingredient in the worldwide effort to aid the Hungarian people. So today, we the people of the United States, in conjunction with other nations of the world rededicate ourselves to the cause of human rights, democratic self-rule and freedom. I wish to thank my colleague, Congressman HORTON, for bringing this important special order to my attention.●

NATIONAL NUTRITION MONITORING AND RELATED RESEARCH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACKAY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced H.R. 2436, the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Resource Act of 1985, on behalf of 29 of our colleagues. A national nutrition monitoring system is a basic tool necessary to examine the linkages between food consumption patterns, nutritional status, and health status. A national nutrition monitoring system is essential to assure: the safety and quality of the food supply; that the nutritional needs of the public are met; and that an appropriate data base exists for planning and guiding the expenditure of public funds for agriculture, nutrition, and health research, education, and intervention programs.

H.R. 2436 is not a new bill, but a slightly revised version of a bill introduced by GEORGE E. BROWN, JR., DOUG WALGREN, and myself in January 1984 and considered by the House in October 1984. Senator BINGAMAN also introduced a similar bill last year. One of the major purposes of the bill is to make more effective use of Federal and State expenditures for nutrition monitoring and to improve the performance and benefits of current Federal nutrition monitoring and related research activities. Although several components of a national nutrition monitoring system are in place, a coherent, comprehensive, and coordinated system does not exist. Therefore, this bill is designed to establish an identifiable, timely program and a central focus for the coordination, management, and direction of Federal nutrition monitoring activities.

The major difference between the bill considered by the House in the 98th Congress and the bill we are introducing today is the institutional arrangement for achieving a timely and effective nutrition monitoring program. The previous bill established a Directorate for Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research composed of numerous Federal agencies. This arrangement did not fix the responsibility for the program with any one Federal department, and the administration viewed the Directorate as a cumbersome organizational structure. H.R. 2436 places the responsibility for the implementation of the program with the Secretary of Health and Human Services [HHS]. To facilitate the management and coordination of the program an Intergovernment Science Board for Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research is established to advise the Secretary of HHS.

In addition, the bill calls for an interagency budget based on planned priorities. The bill requires that requests for authorization of appropriations for nutrition monitoring by each Federal agency be consistent with the interagency budget and be identified as a specific line item. Thus, for the first time in history, the Congress will know the level of expenditures requested for nutrition monitoring activities and be able to exercise its oversight responsibility in this area. The bill strengthens priorities for nutritional status methods research and technical assistance to state and local governments through an annual authorization of $3 million. However, these priorities are to be incorporated into the comprehensive plan and funds are not authorized until the plan is submitted to the Congress 18 months from the date the bill is enacted. These priorities are necessary to improve both the performance and cost effectiveness of current Federal and State nutrition monitoring activities.

The proper implementation of the bill we are introducing today could serve as a much needed health promotion and disease prevention tool. To date, information on the dietary and nutritional status of the population are collected every 6 to 10 years and some of the data are not analyzed until 5 or more years later. Without the continuous collection and analysis of dietary and nutritional status information, as called for in this bill, it is impossible for health professionals and the Congress to make prudent decisions and policies regarding this Nation's physical and economic well-being.

I encourage our colleagues to join us in cosponsoring H.R. 243, the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act of 1985.●

KIDS FOR AFRICA DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives to the devoted efforts of the students of Washington Junior High School in Salinas, CA. These young people are doing their part to help relieve the suffering of the victims of famine in sub-Saharan Africa. They have proclaimed May 14, "Kids for Africa Day," and are challenging students from across the Nation to join them in donating the equivalent of one lunch to the Red Cross for famine relief.

The recent outpouring of support from young people for relief efforts for the 30 million people seriously at risk in the region seems to contradict the notion that this is a self-centered "me generation." Witness the phenomenal success of the USA for Africa campaign. America's young people are reaching into their pockets to add their contributions to a cause which they take very seriously. There can be no doubt that the suffering will continue if we do not give them our help. I am proud of our young people, who, recognizing the tremendous resources which we as Americans enjoy, are doing their share to help in this devastating crisis.

Today, I am especially proud of the students of Washington Junior High, who have committed their time and talents to an idea which I hope to see spread across the entire country. I wish to commend the students and teachers who have participated in this valuable effort and to encourage Americans of all ages and backgrounds to follow this small but important example of caring.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JOZSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I requested this special order that my colleagues and I might pay tribute to Jozsef Cardinal Mindszenty on the 10th anniversary of his death.

We in Congress focus a great deal of attention on human rights abuses around the world. We write letters urging our counterparts in the Soviet Union to free unjustly imprisoned members of the Jewish community. We pass laws prohibiting the importation of goods made with slave labor. We tie our foreign aid to efforts to eliminate human rights abuses. And we pass resolutions condemning the unjust practices of totalitarian regimes around the world. These efforts are important and they have tremendous impact, but they are not enough. We must also focus the world's attention on those heroic individuals who sacrifice their lives in the struggle to preserve the rights of their countrymen. Cardinal Mindszenty was such a man.

Joszef Mindszenty was born on March 29, 1892, in a small village in Hungary. His father, a small landowner, served the community as village judge, chairman of the local parochial school board, and as president of the parish council. By the life he lived, he taught his young son the importance of serving his fellow man.

Cardinal Mindszenty was ordained a catholic priest in 1915. His selfless work on behalf of wounded Hungarian soldiers won him no honors; instead, his outspoken criticism of the Communist regime earned him confinement to his hometown.

Despite active efforts by the government to discredit Father Mindszenty, he was consecrated a bishop in 1944. During the ceremony, Cardinal Seredi uttered a prediction which followed Father Jozsef throughout his life:

The truth will not be taken away from you by anyone, neither by force nor by flattery. You will never exchange good for evil, nor regard evil as good. You will never call light dark, nor darkness light.

Shortly, thereafter, the German Army overran Hungary. In order to emphasize his Hungarian origins and to rally his people, Father Joszef took on the name, Mindszenty, the name of his birthplace. This symbolic act earned him the wrath of the Nazi military leadership.

One month later, Bishop Mindszenty was arrested by the government, charged with treason, and imprisoned. He remained in prison until 2 months after the Soviets captured Budapest.

Imprisonment never dulled his sense of justice nor his desire for freedom for his countrymen. Less than 4 years after his release, his criticism of the communist regime resulted in a sentence of life imprisonment for "antistate activities." He was finally released from prison by Hungarian freedom fighters in 1956, but he was forced to seek asylum in the American Embassy when Soviet tanks rolled through Budapest a week later.

Cardinal Mindszenty's commitment to individual freedom, to his faith, and to his countrymen, has inspired people the world over. He never gave in to tyranny. There was never a sacrifice too great in his quest for human dignity. His life provides an example for everyone who seeks to protect the rights of others.

I had the privilige of meeting Cardinal Mindszenty in 1974. In fact, I sponsored a reception in his honor in the Rayburn building. I can tell you from personal experience that he was a man of great courage and compassion. A man of strength, and a man who refused to sacrifice principle in the face of death. He was a man who will long be remembered as one of the great men in mankind's struggle for freedom.

Mr. Speaker, our words and actions here in Congress are observed carefully by the world, and particularly by those who look to the United States for leadership and support in their struggle for freedom. Let this tribute make known, that Americans care about human dignity and human rights, and that we will never rest until freedom is obtained for all.

I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ROTH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON] for taking this special order.

I join with and associate myself with the gentleman's remarks.

Cardinal Mindszenty was certainly an inspiration to his native country, but really to all of us. As long as people like Cardinal Mindszenty live I think freedom will live throughout the world.

He was an example to all the freedom loving people throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, I again thank the gentleman for taking this special order.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman [Mr. ROTH] for his remarks.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives in commemorating the 10th anniversary of the death of Cardinal Jozsef Mindszenty, a great champion of the cause of human rights for the Hungarian people.

For more than five decades Cardinal Mindszenty personified uncompromising opposition to fascism and communism in Hungary, and he is a heroic figure in the history of mankind's struggle to achieve self-determination and freedom.

Cardinal Mindszenty was arrested twice in 1919 as an enemy of the totalitarian government, and in 1944 as a result of his unrelenting criticism of the Nazis, he was arrested and charged with treason, remaining in prison until 2 months after the Soviets captured the city of Budapest. For his refusal to permit the Catholic schools of Hungary to be secularized and for this "antistate activities," he was again arrested, this time by the communists, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. Released from prison by Hungarian freedom fighters in 1956, Cardinal Mindszenty was forced to seek asylum in the American Embassy when the Soviets took control of the city, remaining in Hungary until 1971.

Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that we in Congress remember Cardinal Mindszenty's efforts to achieve religious freedom and self-determination because his selfless activities on behalf of the Hungarian people still serve today as a symbol of hope and a source of inspiration for all those trying to escape from the yoke of tyranny and oppression.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEFTEL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

IN CELEBRATION OF THE 193D ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE MAY 3 POLISH CONSTITUTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LIPINSKI] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the honor falls upon me to join with people of Polish ancestry all over the world to celebrate the 193d anniversary of the signing of the May 3 Polish Constitution.

The Polish Constitution of 1791 was based on our Declaration of Independence of 1776 and was the first of its kind in Europe.

While the May 3 Polish Constitution was a significant event in Polish history, the accomplishments of our Polish ancestors have been going on for a long time.

Recorded Polish history began in the year 966 under Duke Mieszko, who first began the unification of Poland.

In the 14th century, Casimir the Great united all the Polish people into one kingdom. At the same time Nicholas Copernicus, the father of modern astronomy, was responsible for the start of the scientific revolution.

Later in the history of Poland, King Jon Sobieski and the Austrians defeated the Turks and saved Christianity in Europe at the Battle of Vienna in 1683.

Women of Poland made their mark in history when Madame Marie Sklodowska Curie, with her husband, jointly received the Nobel Prize in physics in 1903 for their work with radioactivity.

Poland's contribution to America began at the very birth of our Republic, during the Revolutionary War. Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, a cavalry officer, was a hero of the Battles of Brandywine and Savannah. Brig. Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko distinguished himself at the Battle of New York and in the Carolinas. As a colonel of engineers, Kosciuszko built the fortifications at West Point. Thaddeus Kosciuszko also declared for and fought for the May 3, 1791, Polish Constitution. He is, perhaps, the greatest freedom fighter for democracy Europe and America have ever shared.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the names of Ignace Paderewski and Joseph Pilsudski, who recreated Poland in 1918 and helped Poland in the only period of freedom it had in the last 200 years.

The list of prominent Poles and Polish Americans goes on and on including other such notables as—Chopin, Stan Musial, Zbigniew Brzezinski, Carl Yastrzemski, Edmund Muskie, and the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means, DAN ROSTENKOWSKI. Today, this list also includes Lech Walesa, the leader of Solidarity. Lech Walesa is a man who believes in religion, family, freedom, and dignity. Lech Walesa has embodied the spirit of Thaddeus Kosciuszko, a spirit that will never be crushed. Indeed, Lech Walesa has become an international symbol of mankind's eternal fight for freedom and dignity.

Finally, this list of prominent Poles also includes Pope John Paul II, the leader of the Roman Catholic Church. The millions who turned out to celebrate Mass with the Pope when he returned home to Poland demonstrated the strength of the Polish spirit. As Polish Americans, we can be proud to have the same roots and traditions as Pope John Paul II, who is recognized as the worldwide leader for peace and brotherhood.

During this week, let us also remember the thousands of Poles who came to this land of liberty who never made the history books but helped to build this Nation with their work in the coal mines, on the railroads, in the stockyards, and in the steel mills.

Yes; today we recognize the anniversary of the Polish Constitution, but I believe we should also celebrate and take great pride in the contributions of the Poles and Polish American people to the development of civilization and mankind.

Poles and Polish Americans are proud, hard-working, persistent, and patriotic people. That is why their contribution has been so great.

Thank you. Stolat.

A BIPARTISAN COMMISSION ON DEFICIT REDUCTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ROTH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, almost without exception, everyone here in Washington and around the country and if the news reports are accurate out of Bonn, West Germany, even the world, is concerned about America's unbearable budget deficits.

If there were a plan, a plan to balance the budget, would you be interested? The reason I ask this question is because there is such a plan.

In January 1984 I proposed to the President a four point plan to reduce the deficit. In the plan, I proposed a bipartisan commission to bring about a balanced budget.

I was told that the medicine I proposed was too difficult for Congress to swallow. Yesterday, I again repeated my request for a bipartisan commission in a letter to the President, and I also am asking the Speaker of this House to call for a bipartisan commission.

I have discussed this issue with literally hundreds of people, including people that served as our Secretary of the Treasury in previous administrations, Directors of OMB, Dr. Blumenthal and Dr. Greenspan, Republicans and Democrats, people of all persuasions.

Virtually all people from the political and academic area agree that my proposal is the only real answer left for the long-range solution to the deficit problem. I am optimistic. We have today a window of opportunity, but we cannot allow it to slip by indecision or inaction.

We can take steps today that will guard the financial interests and the domestic interests of this country for generations to come. We face an almost insurmountable obstacle in bringing these huge deficits under control, but history has blessed us again.

Politically, we have in charge today two people who can make this event come true. One is the Speaker of this House who is retiring, and the other is the President of the United States, who is not going to run, of course, for reelection.

I think both the President and the Speaker of this House want to go down in history as true statesmen, and want to leave a legacy that we can point to and that future generations can point to. They can do that by lifting this albatross, removing it from America's shoulders, this onerous debt that we are under.

In 1970, the Federal debt was $383 billion. In 1981, it was over a trillion dollars, a threefold increase in only a decade. In 1985, it is going to exceed $1.8 trillion of Federal debt. By 1989, it is projected at some $2.6 trillion.

We cannot continue on this course. What does that mean to you, me and children yet unborn? It means, for example a baby born at a hospital today in cities throughout this country has a debt of some $50,000.

We in this House and in this Government are using that youngster's credit card to spend and spend and to put that youngster under an unbearable debt. Is that fair? I say no.

I think the people around the country feel the same way, too.

I have a questionnaire that I send around to my entire district. It is a wonderful way to gauge reaction around the country. One of the questionnaires was returned with comments and the remarks end this way, they said: "Congressman Roth/our needs are few/our wants are many/we've elected you/to watch every penny."

I am going to put this on my desk, because that is the way I feel the American public is reacting to our huge, unbearable national debt and our huge deficits.

We in Congress are beseeched by special interests groups. To be quite frank about it, I am sure that every one of the 435 Members experiences the same scenario every day. Some very well-meaning people, and people with wonderful programs come into our office and say: "We want you to work hard to balance the budget. We don't like these deficits, but we don't want you to cut this program. This program I represent is a good program."

If we in Congress listened to every group, we will not only have $200 billion deficits, we will have $2 trillion deficits. That is why it is so important for us to get a political control of this runaway in spending.

That is why this bipartisan commission is so important. It is not politically popular to cut or freeze spending. Politically in this country we have two adversarial parties, and if one party is brave enough to stick its head out and say "We're going to make the tough decisions," the other party is going to pounce on it and say: "Look what they are going to do, they are going to cut your special program." This scenario continues over and over and over again.

We saw this with Social Security. The only way we could keep Social Security viable was by going the route of the bipartisan commission. It was only after both political parties, Democrats and Republicans had their fingerprints on the document were we able to move forward and to save Social Security, and we must do the same again. It is the only feasible approach.

The bipartisan commission on deficit reduction has the imprimatur of some of our leading economic thinkers. On April 30, before a committee I serve on, Foreign Affairs, we had former Secretary of the Treasury Michael Blumenthal and of course we also had Alan Greenspan. One served in a Republican administration, the other in a Democrat administration.

I asked them about my proposal of a bipartisan commission. I want to quote to you from their testimony what they had to say, because I think it is very important, and very relevant.

Mr. Greenspan said, and I quote: "I suspect that the bipartisan commission may be the only way to resolve this question, because there is something quite different about that type of problem which we currently have. Different in a very fundamental way than I think has confronted Congress in the past. It essentially requires that in our political system we find a way for the reprocessing benefits previously bestowed on constituents and/or raising taxes, on one of which is the type of thing which politically is easy to do."

□ 1750

Mr. Greenspan went on to say "What we learned in the Social Security Commission, in fact what we have learned in all of the processes of recent years, that it is only in the final negotiation, where, in effect, various different political albatrosses are sort of traded one group against another, that we have any capacity to strike a deal which cuts the deficit.

"The Social Security experience I think is a microcosm of a much larger issue, and I think it told us a great deal. Specifically, you may recall, that both this House and the Senate voted overwhelmingly as a sense of the Congress against taxing Social Security benefits, but when an agreement was finally reached in which taxing benefits was reluctantly agreed to, there was virtually no opposition in this House or in the other body. And the reason there was not this opposition is that there is a general recognition that you cannot vote up or down on a whole series of individual items which contribute to the deficit."

I think the nub of Dr. Greenspan's answer is this: He said you have to have a bipartisan agreement beforehand in which all of the difficulties are worked out, and the leadership of both Houses, with the President, comes to an agreement on a specific budget which they are willing to support in total.

I think were that to come to pass, that we would in effect resolve this budget deficit problem. I doubt that if we do not go this route that we will be able to tackle and to solve this issue.

Mr. Greenspan also said that it is important, of course, to tackle this issue now because time is of the essence.

Mr. Blumenthal, who was former Secretary of Treasury under President Carter, agreed. He said you have to get a present package, tie it all up into one piece of legislation so that you do not have the temptation of picking it apart.

The commission that I am proposing would be set up of 15 members, 5 members appointed by the President, 5 appointed by this House and 5 appointed by the Senate. No more than three of each group could be members of one political party. And within 180 days, this commission of each group would be mandated to report back to the Congress.

I urge my colleagues in the House and in the other body and the people throughout the country to support this measure. I think it is the only viable solution we have left. This body can act and act swiftly if public opinion is behind a certain move. I remember when we had the 10 percent withholding on interest and dividends, and I know that people throughout the country remember that issue. Why, Congress changed its mind and repealed that 10 percent withholding in very short order. We noticed that today on the floor of Congress. When the IRS promulgated some very burdensome recordkeeping requirements, why, Congress acted, and we acted in final form here today. So when people say that Congress does not act, that is not correct, because Congress will act and will act quickly if the country speaks in unison, and I think we want to appeal to the country for their support.

What we have to do in this, the most important domestic issue we are going to face this decade in Congress, these huge, horrendous deficits, we have to stop acting as Republicans, we have to stop acting as Democrats, we have to take politics out of this process and think of our country first, foremost and always.

The time to act is now. The time to work toward a balanced budget is now. The time to think about our children's future and the future of this country is now. And the time to write your Congressman and to galvanize him or her to action is now.

THE NEED TO GIVE BANK CUSTOMERS ACCESS TO THEIR OWN MONEY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, the dispensing of financial services on a reasonable and equitable basis should be the goal of all depository institutions, whether chartered by the Federal Government or State governments.

New York and California have taken the lead in trying to establish rational criteria for the clearing of checks and to assure that consumers have access to their funds as soon as possible. Those States are trying to eliminate the long delays—sometimes running into weeks—which have frustrated consumers throughout the Nation. The efforts of California and New York are commendable, but their legislation applies only to State-chartered depository institutions. The legislation I am introducing today along with 21 of my colleagues will require that all depository institutions regardless of charter status make deposited funds available to customers on an expedited basis.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today, the Expedited Funds Availability Act, parallels the bill I introduced last year to deal with the delayed funds problem and incorporates important safeguards reflected in what New York and California have done. Last year's bill, you recall, was cosponsored by 129 of our House colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, the Expedited Funds Availability Act is in part necessitated by inaction and obstruction from Federal financial regulatory agencies. Last year, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, acting through its general counsel, informed federally chartered thrifts in New York that they need not comply with the New York State law designed to give consumers quicker access to their deposits. In addition, in February of this year, the National Credit Union Administration promulgated a final rule preempting State initiatives such as those in New York and California. This final rule not only involved expedited funds availability, but also included disclosures, fees, and other matters as well. Both the FHLBB and the NCUA pointed to the age-old preemption of Federal law for institutions chartered by the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, I question why the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and other Federal supervisors, have not led the way in eliminating or reducing the onerous—the outlandishly long—delays required before most checks are cleared and credited to a customer's account. In some cases, the delays—technically the float—stretch into weeks. A frustrating experience, and at times an experience that results in severe problems for consumers, particularly low- and middle-income families who do not have the luxury of waiting weeks for their money.

While the depository institutions hold the deposit uncredited, the customer writes checks—many of which get marked insufficient funds and socked with a $10, $15, $20 fee. All the while, the financial institution refuses to post the deposit, which is often hundreds of dollars in excess of the insufficient fund items. On the one hand, the institution has use of the float—a profitable item—and at the same time collects a little extra in the form of returned check fees from the customer. An all-win solution for the institutions; a sure loser for the customer.

Mr. Speaker, over the years I have tried repeatedly to call attention to this problem in hopes that we would see some action by the supervisory agencies in support of the consumer. The Federal Reserve is attempting to coordinate an approach with other agencies. While I welcome the Federal Reserve's limited response to my efforts, it is simply not enough. New York and California have moved in a definitive fashion to reduce the delay in availability of funds, and the only answer from the Federal agencies has been to trot out the preemption issue. Again I acknowledge the legal scholarship, but I deplore the lack of creativity, the lack of action, the lack of concern which could make the preemption issue moot in this instance.

Mr. Speaker, last year 129 of our colleagues joined me in my effort to halt checkholds—the practice of delaying customers use of their deposited funds for a week or more. As I introduce similar legislation today, I ask them to assist me once again and hope that more of our colleagues will do the same. With such a combined effort, perhaps we can finally put an end to this anticonsumer practice.

A section-by-section of the Expedited Funds Availability Act follows.

SECTION-BY-SECTION-ANALYSIS OF EXPEDITED FUNDS AVAILABILITY ACT

Sec. 1: Prescribes the Act's short title.

Sec. 2: States the findings and purposes of the Act.

Sec. 3: Requires the Federal Reserve to develop a system in no longer than five years from the date of enactment that would cause all checks to be cleared so that funds would be available for withdrawal the next business day after the day of deposit for checks drawn on local institutions, and for all other checks not more than three business days would intervene between the day of deposit and the day of availability of the funds for withdrawal. The Federal Reserve should consider, among other things, establishing a uniform endorsement standard, direct notification of nonpayment for checks over $250, and system for expedited notice on nonpayment of a check to the receiving depository institution. The Federal Reserve would report within six months, and annually thereafter, on progress toward the goal.

Sec. 4: Establishes specific time limits for funds availability for types of deposits. These limits would be in effect while the system described in Section 3 is being developed. The limits are:

(1) Availability the same business day as the day of deposit for a cash deposit or the cash portion of a deposit.

(2) One business day between day of deposit and day of availability for checks of $100 or less; checks drawn on in-state branches of the receiving depository institution; and U.S. Treasury, State and local government checks endorsed only by the person to whom the check is issued. Such one day availability will be accorded all cashier's and certified checks beginning 2 years after enactment but, in the meantime, they will be treated as ordinary checks;

(3) Not more than three business days between day of deposit and day of availability for checks drawn on local depository institutions (i.e., institutions determined by the Federal Reserve to have an office in the same city, town or village, or in the same local region or metropolitan area, as the receiving depository institution);

(4) Not more than four business days between day of deposit and day of availability for checks drawn on non-local depository institutions with an office in the same state as the receiving depository institution; and

(5) Not more than eight business days between day of deposit and day of availability for checks drawn on depository institutions which only have offices outside the state of the receiving depository institution.

Deposits made on Saturdays, Sundays, holidays or after business hours are deemed made on the next business day. The Federal Reserve is given regulatory authority to shorten the time periods specified above, and also the authority to lengthen the time periods specified in (2) through (5) above by one day to accommodate the unique circumstances of nonproprietary ATMs, and also by one day to accommodate savings and loan associations, mutual savings banks, and credit unions.

Sec. 5: Provides exceptions to the maximum limits in Section 4.

(1) Availability limits would be waived for a customer who deposits more than $5000 in an account in a single day (not including any portion of a deposit or deposits consisting of cash, and two years after enactment, not including portions consisting of cash, cashier's checks, or certified checks).

(2) The availability limits shall not apply to new customers' deposits that are made within 30 calendar days after the date on which an account is opened, except for any portion of a deposit or deposits consisting of cash, and two years after enactment, not including portions consisting of cash, cashier's checks or certified checks.

(3) If a customer issues checks from an account that are returned for insufficient funds three or more separate times in a six month period, then the availability limits would be waived but only for the specific account affected or a successor account.

(4) The availability limits would not apply to check drawn on depository institutions outside the United States.

(5) In the event of emergencies beyond the control of depository institutions, that are certified by the Federal Reserve, such as in the failure of communications facilities or the suspension of payments by another institution, the availability limits would be waived.

Sec. 6: Preserves the authority of states to enact laws affecting the state chartered institutions within their state, and the authority of individual depository institutions to prescribe policies making funds available more quickly than the time periods prescribed in this Act or in Federal Reserve regulations.

Sec. 7: Requires that interest begin to accure on the business day on which a deposit is made into an interest-bearing account.

Sec. 8: Requires depository institutions to disclose their funds availability policies in writing to new customers; on deposit slips or by specific notice when deposits are made; in mailings to established customers; and by posting of notices in locations where deposits are taken.

Sec. 9: Authorizes the Federal Reserve to publish optional model disclosure forms and clauses.

Sec. 10: Specifices agency responsibilities by permitting the Federal Reserve to prescribe regulations to carry out the Act after consultation with the other federal depository institution regulatory agencies.

Sec. 11: Establishes a Payments System Advisory Council under the auspices of the Federal Reserve Board to provide consumer and private sector advice to the Federal Reserve on funds availability matters.

Sec. 12: Establishes administrative enforcement arrangements under existing law, to be carried out by the federal regulators of depository institutions.

Sec. 13: Provides civil liability penalties for individual and class actions for violations of the Act, commencing 6 months after the date of enactment.

Sec. 14: Prescribes definitions applicable to the Act.

Sec. 15: Establishes effective dates for the Act. The Federal Reserve is to begin working toward its five year goals starting on the date of enactment. The interim maximum time limits prescribed in the Act, the disclosure requirements, and the administrative enforcement provisions take effect 90 days after enactment.●

OSTRICHES THAT ARE SLOW TO DUCK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the topic of my special order tonight is the recent surprise expressed by some people about the fact that the communist dictatorship in Nicaragua would send their leader, Mr. Ortega, to Moscow on such short notice and that it would be done so directly tied or at least in proximity to a vote of the U.S. House of Representatives. And I guess if I really had a title, it would be on ostriches that are slow to duck, because I think what happened is very, very illustrative of a central problem in the American intellectual and political and news media community.

For those Members of the House who are not familiar with what happened, let me walk through: The House had a series of votes in which it, frankly, could not quite decide what to do. There is great confusion in America about the nature of the Nicaraguan Government, there is a great deal of uncertainty about the appropriate response to that Government, and there was a very impassioned debate, with one wing saying that Nicaragua clearly is Communist, it clearly is now allied with the Soviet Union and Cuba, that it clearly is a threat to the United States, and the other wing, which I have characterized and a number of others have characterized as sort of the ostrich wing of American life, saying, "Oh, no, they really are not Communists, oh, no, they are really not tied to the Soviet Union, they are really not a danger to the United States."

The morning after the House of Representatives voted down any effort in Central America, it was in the American news media that Ortega, representing the Communist dictatorship of Nicaragua, was going to go to Moscow. Several leading figures who had voted against aid announced that they were shocked at this. One figure who had recently voted against aid said, "If I had known he was going to go to Moscow, I would have voted for aid to the freedom fighters and I would have voted to help undermine this Communist dictatorship."

Now, the Speaker of this House was quoted as saying, "He embarrassed us, to be perfectly truthful."

And I think that there has been a great deal of feeling in the House that the trip of a Communist dictator in Nicaragua to the capital of communism in Moscow, coming as it did, seemed to be very, very ill timed.

Now, I think the important thing about this particular event is, frankly, not what it teaches us about the Nicaraguan Communists but what it teaches us about the ostrich wing in American politics and the American news media and the American intelligentsia.

The fact is, first of all, that Ortega, the Nicaraguan Communist, has visited Moscow before. It is not new for Nicaraguan Communists to show up in the Soviet Union. One ostrich said to me, off the record, and I will not quote him by name, "He could at least have waited a week." Now, I think everybody needs to think through the implications of that analysis. What difference does it make if a Communist in Nicaragua announces he is going to go to the Soviet Union 1 day after we vote to kill aid to the freedom fighters or a week after we vote to kill aid to the freedom fighters or 3 weeks after we vote to kill aid to the freedom fighters?

And I have recently gone back and I have been studying Churchill's difficulties in the late 1930's in convincing well-meaning appeasers and the ostriches of that generation that Adolf Hitler was a danger, and people like Neville Chamberlain could never quite believe Hitler was a danger.

And what happened over time—and I think this is a great weakness of dictatorships—is that Hitler grew arrogant about the nature of the United States and the nature of Great Britain and the nature of free societies, that Hitler came to the conclusion that he could do anything and that the Anglo-Saxons were so weak and so helpless that they would do nothing, that Neville Chamberlain was so spineless that he would do nothing. And so as Hitler got more and more arrogant and Chamberlain appeased him more and more, it gradually sank in for everyone else who was watching that this is a form of madness. Churchill described it as feeding the crocodile. He said everybody thinks that if we feed the crocodile a little bitty country like Czechoslovakia, the crocodile will be satisfied, or if we feed the crocodile Poland, the crocodile will be satisfied.

Let us look at the modern world. Twenty-five years ago, communism seized power in Cuba. Instead of moving decisively to reaffirm the Monroe Doctrine; instead of saying we will not tolerate a Soviet base 90 miles off our shore; instead of eliminating a Communist dictatorship in Cuba, we fed the crocodile. We said, well, let us back off, and if Cuba survives, what damage will it really do, and it is a little country, and after all, it is not really a threat.

Today, there are Cuban soldiers propping up Communist dictatorships in Angola, in Ethiopia. There are Cuban military advisers propping up the Government in Nicaragua. We know for a fact because we captured the Grenada Documents when we liberated the Island of Grenada. That the Cubans played a key role in every step of setting up a Communist dictatorship in Grenada.

Now we have a Communist dictatorship in Nicaragua. We know it is Communist; they say themselves that they are Marxist-Leninists. We know they are allied to the Soviet Union and Cuba. We know they are building a 12,000-foot airfield in order to house Soviet-built aircraft. We know that they are intimately tied to the Cubans. We know that right this very minute there are guerrilla movements underway in Guatemala, Honduras, in El Salvador, whose headquarters are based in Nicaragua. We know all that; that is not anything new.

Yet, if you watch the trauma of the ostriches, suddenly shocked because Ortega would be so unkind as to announce the day of the vote that he was going to Moscow. Suddenly you have a variety of people saying, "Well, if we had known that, we would have voted for aid to the freedom fighters to undermine the Communist government."

Let me suggest to you that what happened was that the ostrich, having raised its head long enough to argue about foreign policy, could not bury its head in the sand fast enough to avoid seeing Ortega's announcement about going to Moscow. That the ostrich is a little slow, and had Ortega waited 1 week, as one of them suggested to me, had he only gone 1 week later to Moscow they would have said, "Well, that is all right. After all, there has been a decent interval."

It is sort of like having a mugger drop in for dinner. You know, if the mugger comes in right after he mugs you on the way home from work, you might be very angry. But if the mugger would wait a week, this seems to be rationale. The mugger would be welcome for dinner because after all, that was a week ago, and why do we not become friends?

Furthermore, what is there shocking about Ortega going to Moscow? There are Soviet advisers in Nicaragua; there is Soviet military equipment in Nicaragua. The Soviets and Nicaraguans are one team in the United Nations. The Soviets are intimately tied into the support of Nicaragua. Noboby doubts that Nicaragua is directly an ally of the Soviet Union.

In fact, a leading Democrat who is opposed to any aid to the freedom fighters said the other day that they concede that Nicaragua is an ally of the Soviet Union, but they are still not in favor of doing anything about it.

If that is true, if you concede that Nicaragua is an ally of the Soviet Union, why would it bother you that Ortega is going to the Soviet Union? Is that not the way allies behave? Why would it bother you if Ortega and the Nicaraguans always vote with the Soviet Union in the United Nations? Is that not the way allies behave?

Yet, there seemed to be this tremor, this momentary concern because Ortega had said he was going to go to the Soviet Union.

Now, there is a book by David Nolan called "The Ideology of the Sandinistas and the Nicaraguan Revolution." It is a study that was produced by the Institute of Interamerican Studies, Graduate School of International Studies, University of Miami in Florda, copyright 1984.

If you study this book, and it is a fascinating book; it is not a particularly big book; it is 200 pages long. But if you study this book, what you discover is that at the very beginning of the Nicaraguan Communist movement, the key leaders saw themselves as Communists. They were committed to communism; they were in favor of Lenin and Lenin's theories, and they were in fact committed to establishing a dictatorship. They were also very, very pro-Soviet.

I might suggest that one way to look at that is to go back to the very beginning of the period when one of their leaders went to the Soviet Union and looked at the nature of the Soviet Union. Now, this particular leader, Fonseca is his name, when he visited the Soviet Union, saw a very particular version of reality. A version that I think virtually none of us would accept, and virtually none of us would understand.

I quote: "Fonseca left the country in 1957 on a trip to Moscow as the PSN's delegate to the Sixth World Youth and Student Festival. He was jailed when he returned, and took the opportunity to write a pamphlet relating his impressions of communism in practice.

"A Nicaraguan in Moscow" carried a tone of calm appraisal designed to counter the negative image of the U.S.S.R. promoted by the United States. According to his account, the Soviet Union enjoyed total freedom of religion. The press had the right to criticize the top leadership. He characterized Krushchev's de-Stalinization campaign and the Hungarian Revolt as cases of constructive criticism within communism.

He predicted that Soviet agricultural production would soon overtake that of the United States. Fonseca's uncritical apology of Soviet orthodoxy was best expressed when he explained how communism had found the solution to both the social and economic questions.

I quote from Fonseca's work, "A Nicaraguan in Moscow," where he said:

> Now the answer is the state. The Russians believe that their state represents the people, and that consequently the true owner of the factories is the people.
>
> In the Soviet Union, competition does not exist either. Production is planned. Because of this, they never suffer economic crises, nor do they suffer from overproduction, and consequently never have been obligated to throw tea into the sea or burn cotton or allow apples to rot.

This is from page 20 of the "Ideology of the Sandinistas and the Nicaraguan Revolution," by David Nolan. My point is that: Here we have a document written in 1958 in which one of the founders of the Communist government and the Communist Party of Nicaragua writes what has got to be one of the most naive and self-deceiving descriptions of the Soviet Union in modern times. There is no free press in the Soviet Union; he says the press is free. There is no religious freedom in the Soviet Union; he says they have religious freedom. Anyone who is at all familiar with the brutal manner in which Andropov and the Soviet Secret Police and the Soviet Army crushed the Hungarian Rebellion in 1956, will recognize how bizarre you have to be in your approach in order to characterize that as constructive criticism within communism.

Of course, his description of the Soviet state, his suggestion that the Soviet Union would soon replace the United States or overtake the United States in agricultural production has clearly failed. Twenty years after Fonseca's work, we now know that the Soviet Union has a permanent economic crisis in agriculture, and in fact, they are buying food from us, and it is we who have the great overproduction. The reason, of course, that no apples rot in the Soviet Union is that there are not enough apples, and therefore, they are all eaten as quickly as possible.

Now, I would suggest to my friends who have sort of an ostrich approach to all this, that if you had looked at this book, if you had studied Fonseca's work, if you had asked yourself if the founder of the Communist Party of Nicaragua is in fact totally self-deceptive about the nature of the Soviet Union, why would I not expect Ortega to go to Moscow?

Let me carry on. It is not just an issue of the nature of our information about their ideas. We also know that they were intimately tied to Cuba and that in fact they were involved with Cuba a long time ago. Let me quote from page 22 and 23:

> The involvement of Cuban revolutionaries with the Sandinistas dates from Fonseca's first experience as a guerrilla. After his deportation for political agitating at Unan, Fonseca made his way in 1959 to the Honduran border region where he joined up with the Enrico Roberto Lopez Perez Column, a group of about 55 Nicaraguans, Cubans and others, organized with advice from Ernesto Che Gueverra and armed by Cuba.

□ 1810

In other words, as early as 1959, 1960, you have a Nicaraguan Communist involvement with Cuban communism. It goes on to say, and I quote, they got involved in a fight:

> The wounded Fonseca escaped to Havana where he became personally acquainted with Castro and Gueverra.
> During 1960, Fonseca and Servio Mayorga, another friend from his Matagalpa student days, traveled around the Caribbean Basin in search of supporters while Borje made his first trip to Cuba to seek Gueverra's blessings.

What are we talking about here? We are talking about 25 years ago, 25 years ago, a period you would think long enough that ostriches would learn, and what do we discover? Not just that here is a guy who wrote a book in which he was totally pro-Soviet, but here is pair of people, and Borje is the Minister of the Interior today in Nicaragua, who as early as 1960 were systematically involved with Cuban Communists in trying to establish revolutions, in trying to overthrow governments.

Let us continue, though, to look at the relationship because it is not just an issue of what kind of people are they, are they people of the left, are they Soviets, are they pro-Soviet, rather? The question goes deeper.

There are two two central problems that our friends on the left who are ostriches have in dealing with reality. The first is the nature of Leninism and the fact that the Communist movement in its Leninist form is a systematic, disciplined organization on behalf of imposing dictatorship and an organization which leads, I think, inevitably to aggression against your neighbors because it is impossible for a Communist dictatorship to live openly next to a free country.

Look at the Berlin Wall. Why did the Berlin Wall exist? It exists because if you live in an oppressive Communist dictatorship and you can walk across the street to freedom, you are going to leave, and the Communist Government of East Germany literally could not have survived had they not first built a wall to keep people in. And that leads to the question of Central America.

Are there any people left in America who honestly believe that if Nicaragua is allowed to remain a Communist dictatorship, if the Nicaraguan Communists, trained and educated and guided by their Cuban and Soviet leaders are allowed to impose an absolute Leninist dictatorial state, that it is going to be able to survive with a free Costa Rica next door? Of course not. What is going to happen is what we already see happening. Thousands of people fleeing into Costa Rica. Thousands of people fleeing into Honduras. And presently what is going to happen is the Communist Government of Nicaragua will discover it has to attack Costa Rica, it has to attack Honduras, because after all, they are threats. The very existence of a free country is by definition a threat to the survival of a neighboring Communist dictatorship, because a free country automatically attracts the brightest, the most courageous and the most energetic, and they leave the Communist dictatorship.

Let me carry it a stage further. The second problem that the ostrich faction in American life has is not only can it not deal with Leninism, but it finds it virtually impossible to deal with the fact that communism has now discovered a secret device for making war.

I think this is very important. Imagine, if you will, back when the first forward pass was thrown in an American football game. Imagine that nobody on defense had figured out that there is this new device by which you could pick the ball up, throw it over the line, and then run for a touchdown. Imagine the defense has continued to get every man up on the line or close behind the line in order to stop a running play and there had been no adjustment. Of course, the passing game would always win.

What do we have in the modern world? Western liberal democracies have figured out that a country should not be allowed to attack another country. Western liberal democracies have decided, and we have heard our good friends who are very sincere and who are very much opposed to doing anything in Central America, say "Look, if Nicaraguan Communists get in those Soviet tanks and they drive up the Pan American Highway, then the United States would intervene and stop them with military force."

Let us walk down that logic for a moment. What if they painted over the tanks so they did not have any Nicaraguan markings, and what if they took the soldiers out of uniform and let them wear blue jeans, so you had unmarked tanks driving up the highway and guys wearing blue jeans. Would we stop them then? They would say, "Yes, you see, that is a direct offense, that is a direc. attack, and you cannot deceive us just by painting over the insignia and by putting on blue jeans. We would know those were tanks and we would know that was an army and we would stop them."

Fine. What if you take them out of the tanks and let them walk across in blue jeans, but they walk across as an organized army? Oh, we would stop that, you see, because that is still an army.

All right, fine. What if, instead of doing that, they are allowed to come across at night in small groups of 10 or 12 or 30 or 40 and they are not on the highway, they are in the jungle. Oh, well, then, that is different. That is no longer an army. That is now a guerrilla movement and guerrilla movements are legitimate and, after all, how could we get involved?

If you are the Communist faced with this Western liberal vision of the world, what does that tell you? It is very much like inventing the forward pass. It tells you that the Western World is very much ready to stop your running play of a direct, conventional, military assault, so you know you cannot put men in uniform and tanks and drive up the Pan American Highway. You know you could not even cheat by taking them out of uniform and letting them wear blue jeans and repainting the tanks. That just would not work. You know you could not even just have infantry march up the highway.

But the Western democracies have no solution for warfare as long as it is below the level of a conventional army. In other words, if Nicaragua wants to have all of the guerrilla movements in Guatemala, that is fine. If Nicaragua wants to have the guerrilla movement from Honduras, oh, that is all right. If Nicaragua wants to house the guerrilla movement from El Salvador, that is all right because they have convinced us that there is a difference technically between my sending an army against you and my sending guerrillas against you.

If I send an army against you, that is an act of war, but if I only blow up your generating stations and shoot your local officials and bomb your local transportation and kill your local soldiers in small numbers, by small groups, that is not an act of war.

So we have created in the West an intellectual sanctuary in which the Communist world is able to fight a secret war, they are able to undermine their neighbors, they are able to send in troops to kill people, as long as they do it at a low enough level that we do not know how to deal with it.

What is the result? The result is that this evening as I stand here talking, we know for a fact that Cuban-trained, Soviet-armed, Nicaraguan-housed guerrillas are fighting in three countries in Central America. There is a war going on. There is a war against Honduras. There is a war against El Salvador. There is a war against Guatemala. We know that, in fact, because all of the local leaders in Central America say so. President Duarte has said so flatly. The President of El Salvador has said, "Look, Nicaragua is attacking us."

But "Ah," the American left says, "they are not attacking you in uniform and they are not attacking you in an organized way and they are not on the highway so it is not really a war."

Well, if you are a Communist planner and you know that the American news media and the American politicians have this blind spot, that they are literally incapable of understanding, what do you do? You obviously plan covert wars which you constantly lie about and which wipe out and destroy small democracies one by one, because faced with a powerful Communist dictatorship backed by the Cubans, backed by the Soviet Union, it is very unlikely that a country like Honduras or El Salvador or Costa Rica is going to survive if, in fact, they are up against serious opponents.

Now, how serious are the opponents? Let me start first and remind you that on page 23 there is clear evidence that as early as 25 years ago the Cubans were directly involved with the Nicaraguan Communists. Let me remind you second that the Nicaraguan Communists see themselves, and have seen themselves for years, as enemies of the United States and as enemies of the survival of freedom.

Let me give you a couple of quotes from the 1969 statement of the FSLN, which is the Nicaraguan Communist Party.

□ 1820

First of all, they say flatly "replacement of the constitutional theory of elected representation with a revolutionary government." That is from page 36 of the Ideology of the Sandinistas and the Nicaraguan Revolution. Now, what do they mean when they say, "replacement of the constitutional theory of elected representation with a revolutionary government"? It means in classic language that Lenin used that they will establish a Communist dictatorship, that they will decide, they will have all power.

By the way, if you read the first speech in the Grenada Documents published in 1984 by the State Department, you will discover that in Grenada the Communists, in a secret speech made by the Communist leader, said exactly the same thing, that "We will lie to the West, we will lie to the Americans, we will lie to the news media, but our real goal is to establish a Communist dictatorship." Well, here you have a 1969 statement.

They went on to say, "Solidarity with Third World anti-imperialist movements," and furthermore "opposition to all U.S. military bases." In other words, if it is American, they are against it. They talk in their statements about Yankee imperialism, they talk about fighting against Yankee intervention. It is a systematic anti-American document in which the United States is clearly the enemy of communism in Nicaragua and they are clearly opposed to us.

This again, remember, was in 1969, in a written document that we know exists and that has been printed over and over again.

And then they say, "Struggle for a 'true union of the Central American peoples within one country,' beginning with support for national liberation movements in neighboring states."

Now, what does that mean when they use fancy phrases like "a true union of the Central American peoples"? It means that "once we conquer Nicaragua and make it Communist, we are coming after the rest of you."

What do they mean by this: "Beginning with support for national liberation movements in neighboring states"? It means specifically that they are going to set up guerrilla movements, and they are going to attack Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, and Costa Rica.

Now, I say to you that if you have a movement in which the intellectual founder, Fonseca, went to Moscow and wote a pamphlet called "A Nicaraguan Visits Moscow," works with Castro and works with Guevara and tells you flatly that he hates America, that he wants to unite all of Central America into one country—and, by the way, they are going to launch guerrilla movements to do it—why would it surprise any of the ostriches 25 years later when in fact they do exactly that? They have guerrilla movements that they are sponsoring, they are allied with the Soviet Union, they hate the United States, and they are very honest men. They told us for 25 years, "Hey! We are Communists." But they also told us, as they told us in the Grenada Documents, that they are absolutely confident that the American news media and the American intellectuals and the American politicians are dumb enough that they can be manipulated, and that if you will only lie to them, they will not quite understand what you are doing.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am delighted to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the distinguished gentleman from Georgia yielding, and I would like to thank the gentleman for hosting this special order to discuss the situation in Nicaragua.

I was visiting with some good friends in my office, and they saw the special order come on and were so concerned about the problem and the fact that their Congressman, a distinguished Congressman from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH], had not seen fit to view the issue as seriously as you and I have, that they were very happy to see you holding this special order. So I just came over to congratulate you on it and to point out a fact that you have not had time yet to discuss. That is the probability that if we do not draw the line in Nicaragua and are not able to get the Congress to address this issue again and provide some sort of funding for the freedom fighters down there, there is every probability that the Sandinista government will consolidate control and then begin to export revolution—and you have already shown that the facts are that they are, in connection with the Cubans and the Russians—and we could have a tremendous immigration problem in the United States.

I have submitted some documentation into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that shows that as many as 20 million immigrants may try to come into the United States illegally if the Sandinistas are successful in Nicaragua and then move into Honduras and Guatemala and then ultimately into Mexico.

I think that is a serious problem that this Congress needs to address, and we need during this session to come back and address this issue and hopefully provide some funding for the freedom fighters.

As you have pointed out, Comandante Ortega was in Moscow within a week after the vote in this Chamber that denied funding, both military funding and even humanitarian aid. I think he was requesting something on the order of $200 million from the Soviet Union, and some of those funds will either be used for military purposes or, if not for military purposes, will free up other funds that could be used for military purposes.

So the distinguished gentleman from Georgia is to be commended for bringing this problem to the attention of the Congress and the Speaker, and hopefully we will address this issue in the near future with a different result.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's comment.

I would go on to say that the thing that amazes me, as your friends, I think, were commenting on, is that a lot of this is very obvious if people will open their eyes and read the available documents. There was, for example, a big argument on what is the nature of the so-called Sandinistas.

Let me quote again from page 38:

In the writings of his 1976-75 exile, Fonseca continuously insisted that the FSLN embodied the "Marxism of Lenin, Fidel, el Che, Ho Chi Minh * * *" and that it must not compromise its ideological purity.

I just say to you that if the leader who founds the party says to you that the place to figure out what it is going to be like is the Marxism of Lenin, Fidel Castro, Che Guevara, and Ho Chi Minh, he probably does not belong to the Kiwanis Club.

When people walk in here as good, decent, well-meaning ostriches and say, "Gosh, how can you claim these folks are Communists?" I suggest that they read the writings of the people they do not seem to want to listen to.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield again, I think it is interesting that when you read even the censored press coverage that is allowed in Nicaragua, the Sandinistas have made no secret that they are Marxist-Leninists. All their public speeches down there have admitted to the fact.

We have the private recording of the meeting last spring where Mr. Arce, I believe, said that the election was just a farce to placate American public opinion. They have been public in acknowledging their Marxist-Leninist roots, and for some reason some of the Members of this body have seen fit to ignore that fact. At some point in time the American people evidently will have to take up the battle cry and force the Members of this body to acknowledge that fact and act constructively.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, one of my beliefs is that the American people, if given enough information, will always follow leadership. Churchill said all through the 1930's, when the appeasers kept saying, "Oh, the British people won't stand for it," Churchill kept saying, "If you tell the people the facts, the people are willing to follow. The people are willing to do what is necessary to survive."

The average American is not an ostrich. The average American does not have a psychological commitment to avoiding reality. The average American has not some kind of leftwing ideological blindfold that prevents them from dealing with people who, when they say they are Communists, are probably Communists.

Furthermore, as early as 1970 the Communist Party of Nicaragua saw that—and I quote—"part of the FSLN's 'fundamental mission' was to aid the revolutionary movements in all of Central America, including bourgeois democratic Costa Rica."

That is from page 39 of this study from the University of Miami.

I am willing to challenge any ostrich who wants to come over any evening and offer any countervailing evidence, and I do not think there is any. I think the truth is that the Nicaraguan Communists have been Communists for 25 years, they have been allied with Cuba for 25 years, they were determined to establish a Communist dictatorship, and we have every evidence in writing and in fact and in deed that they are committed right this minute to undermining and setting up guerrilla war in every country in Central America. They have said so, and since they are allies of the Soviet Union, why does it surprise some of our friends that the allies of the Soviet Union, the allies of Cuba, these self-proclaimed Communists, behave like Communists?

□ 1830

Now, if I might, there is one other thing that I think has really bothered me about our ostrich friends who are shocked at any kind of report, as in today's Washington Post page 1 story, about a freedom fighter who suddenly defects to the Communists and says, "Gosh, you know, freedom fighters kill people."

There are always atrocities from freedom fighters. There are never atrocities from Communists. There is never a page 1 story about Communist atrocities; yet let me tell a quote from one of the Nicaraguan Communists, because it is very important to understand the psychology here, and I quote again from the author:

GPP offer a way to purge one's soul of the guilt of being a bourgeois in the midst of poverty.

Here are the exact words of a Nicaraguan Communist:

That was the first time I killed a man. I felt an immense happiness like the tension of centuries had been released.

The author goes on to say:

Revolutionary violence liberated man from his hated bourgeoisness, allowing him to transcend his origins and become a new man, a proletarian man.

In other words, the actual teaching of the Nicaraguan Communist Party was that if you were born middle class, one way to rise above being middle class was to kill somebody and when you killed somebody you would feel, and I quote again:

I felt an immense happiness like the tension of centuries had been released.

Now, these are not nice people. These are Communists whose very doctrine suggests that killing people leads to happiness.

Furthermore, and I find it fascinating in terms of Ortega, Ortega spent some time in jail. Was he in jail because he was a pacifist? No.

Was he in jail because he was out organizing the Red Cross and some evil dictatorship arrested him? No.

Ortega was in jail because he was a bank robber. Now, why was Ortega a bank robber? Well, again it tells us here:

Bank robberies continued to be the major source of funding. In the countryside around Managua and Leon, Borge and Turcios trained new recruits from the campuses in the guerrilla tactics they had learned in the field and in Cuba.

In other words, the Communists in Nicaragua, getting training from Cuba, decided that robbing banks was one way to finance the revolution; beats gathering dues from local party members, you get out of all that paperwork. You just go out and rob a bank.

Now, the other fascinating thing, and again I say I do not understand the ostrich approach to all this, but Stalin was a bank robber. The early Leninist Party in Russia under the czars raised money by robbing banks. Joseph Stalin went to jail because he was convicted of robbing banks.

Here we have Ortega, a self-proclaimed Communist, who happens to end up being a bank robber who goes to jail, just like Joseph Stalin.

Now, I do not actually technically know if he visited Stalin's tomb when he was in Moscow, but it certainly would be one bank robber pays his respects to a fellow bank robber.

Now, I just want to say again in terms of the ostrich wing of American life, I mean, how can you be so stuck in the sand with your head dealing with a guy who tells you he is a Communist, who goes to jail for robbing banks, just like Joseph Stalin, who has open relations with Cuba, why would you be upset if he goes to Moscow?

I mean, Ortega is honest. He is a Communist ally of the Soviet Union who hates America.

What is bizarre is the American ostriches who cannot quite get in their heads that these are very serious people.

But again, this is not new information:

On 27 December 1974, Eduardo Contreras, the new leader of the Managu underground, and veteran guerrilla German Pomares led a commando of 10 men and 3 women in the seizure of the Castillo home. Although they failed to get Shelton, and had to kill Castillo, the commando captured enough high-ranking Somocistas to force Samoza to release Daniel Ortega, Jose Benito Escobar, and 12 other prisoners, pay a $1 million ransom decree, raises in national minimum wages, broadcast an FSLN manifesto, and provide the guerrillas and the prisoners with passage to Cuba.

That is page 45.

In other words, 11 years ago, and by the way, Shelton was the American Ambassador who was the guy they were trying to kidnap—11 years ago a Communist guerrilla band, as one of their demands, asked for travel to Cuba. So where do we think they learned how to be good Communists? They learned it in Cuba. Why do we think they are Communists? Because they worked with Castro to learn how to establish a Cuban dictatorship.

Furthermore, we absolutely know that they are an anti-Israel, anti-Semitic pro-Palestine Liberation Organization country, organized as part of a global terror network.

Now, how do we know that?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman.

First of all, could the gentleman inform me of the document the gentleman is reading from?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be delighted to. There is a book by David Nolan, called the Ideology of the Sandinistas and the Nicaraguan Revolution, which is published by the Institute of Inter-American Studies at the University of Miami in 1984.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Is that document publicly available?

Mr. GINGRICH. It is a publicly available document, which in fact is available from the Institute of Inter-American Studies, University of Miami, Post Office Box 24813, Coral Gables, FL 33124.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Would that institution be willing to send that document to those who would ask for it?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think they would actually ask for a modest amount, $4.95 or $5, but I think any ostrich who wanted to risk knowledge, frankly, I think we in the House could probably provide every Member in the House a copy of this if he would be willing to read it.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. It might be appropriate to do that, but I would like to make one comment.

The gentleman mentioned Commandante Borge. I believe I am correct when I state that at some point in his early adulthood his mother was violently opposed to communism and made a statement that she never wanted to see a Communist in her home and Commandante Borge said that he would have to leave home, or something to that effect, that he was a dedicated Communist and believed in the Marxist-Leninist revolution.

Mr. GINGRICH. In fact, that is a different publication. If I remember correctly, there was a Playboy magazine interview in which he tells that story. It is available on a mass basis. Millions of Americans have copies of that interview in their homes and it was easily available to any Member of Congress who wanted to get a copy of it.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. My final question of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia is, the gentleman was mentioning the PLO. It is my understanding that the PLO has representatives in Nicaragua and that they are very active in that country. I was just wondering if the gentleman could confirm that or give me any information about that aspect.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think it goes beyond that and again it illustrates the ostrichism of the American left.

What we are talking about here is not the fact that it is true they have recognized the Palestinian Liberation Organization. It is not the fact that Nicaraguan Communists are very pro-Qadhafi and that Borge himself, the Minister of Interior, was at Qadhafi's 15th anniversary celebration. It is not the fact that Nicaragua and the United Nations is anti-Israel and anti-Semitic and is committed as a Communist government to the destruction of Israel. It goes back much further.

Let me share with the gentleman from page 48, and again I just have to say that I find it very hard to understand how anyone could be such a total ostrich, that if you had any concern for the survival of Israel, this would not worry you. I quote:

During the 1969–1970 period the Sandinistas also experimented with airline hijacking. FSLN militants Juan José Quezada and Carlos Agüero successfully diverted Nicaraguan and Costa Rican planes to Cuba in November 1969 and October 1970. Indications that Sandinistas were receiving training from Palestinian radicals surfaced when FSLN member Patricio Argüello was killed by Israeli security agents when he and Leyla Khaled of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) attempted to take over an El Al airliner during the PFLP's 6 September 1970 mass hijackings. Juan José Quezada was part of the PFLP squad that hijacked a British BOAC plane three days later. See New York Times, 15 September 1970, p. 16, and FSLN, Un Pueblo Alumbra su Historia, p. 29.

Let me make the point to the gentleman from Texas that any ostrich that wanted to look at the New York Times would discover that 15 years ago Nicaraguan Communists were the active allies of Palistinian terrorists trying to destroy Israel. Fifteen years ago, and interestingly the Nicaraguan Communists who were killed by Israeli security guards when they were protecting an El Al airplane was honored last year by having a generating plant in Nicaragua named after him.

Now, I would say in terms of being anti-Semitic and anti-Israel, what does it tell you about the Nicaraguan Communists, when not only were they trained by the Palistinians, not only were they working actively with them practicing by killing Israelis and trying to seize Israeli airplanes, but they go out of their way as a deliberate insult Israel to name a generating station after a terrorist killed by Israeli security guards.

So I would simply say that anyone who is concerned about Israel should look at the Nicaraguan Communists and as a direct committed enemy of the survival of Israel and should ask themselves the question once again if these people tell me they favor terrorism, they tell me they favor guerrilla warfare, they tell me that they are systematically committed to a Soviet alliance, they tell me they recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization, they tell me they love Qadhafi so much that they go to Libya for the 15th anniversary party, what does that probably tell me about how dangerous the Nicaraguan Communists are to Israel?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. If the gentleman would yield, in Texas we have a saying that if it looks like a duck and sounds like a duck and walks like a duck it probably is a duck. And from what the distinguished gentleman from Georgia has been saying I would have to assume, if I were a logical person, that you have described a totally Communist-dominated leadership group that has been a Marxist-Leninist revolution, whatever the consequence, and they have aligned themselves with the Communists of this world that want to prevent freedom and opportunity. And this body needs to do what it can to stop that.

I thank the distinguished gentleman from Georgia for bringing this to the attention of this body and hope that in the next several months that we will reverse our previous decision on aid to the freedom fighters and try to help them help themselves down there.

Mr. GINGRICH. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution.

I would say that I am not sure how many birds we can get involved in one special order but the problem is you have a Communist duck here which is being confronted by leftwing American ostriches and the ostrich buries its head in the sand in order to avoid seeing the duck, and it does not want to see the Communist duck. And, as I said earlier, part of the problem has been that the left wing ostrich in America raised its head long enough to debate foreign policy and could not get its head back in the sand quick enough to not notice the duck going to Moscow.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. If the gentleman will yield again, I think we are making some progress in identifying the duck because in another periodical that many of us peruse each day, the Wall Street Journal, on the editorial page, at the bottom of the page, I think in today's edition, it mentioned the fact that the august Speaker of this body was somewhat embarrassed because of the fact that Commandante Ortega had seen fit to go to Moscow and if we have at least reached the point where we have embarrassed some of the Members in this body there is always hope that we can prevail upon them to see the light and to identify the Communist duck as a Communist duck and do something about it.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me mention one other thing. This is on page 97, and I think it tells us a little bit about one of the frightening things about ostrichism as a worn capability and the way in which the Communists are learning to manipulate the West.

As an FSLN spokesman, Borge joined in the public relations campaign to convince the bourgeois world that the FSLN had adopted a social democratic ideology. At a Mexico City news conference on 4 December 1978 Borge declared, "Somosa painted us as Marxists. We have some Marxists with us but the Frente is much wider. The concept of prolonged popular war was not Marxist. It is a military concept . . . We are neither Marxist nor liberal, we are Sandinistas."

The author goes on to say:

Unlike the Ortegas, who preferred to remain in the background while their sincerely moderate allies talked about freedom and elections, Borge sought publicity by hypocritically denying the whole ideological history of the FSLN and the GPP.

Let me just say to you I do not see anything wrong with Communists behaving like Communists. If Borge is a Communist, he lies because Communist doctrine, as Lenin wrote it, says you ought to lie if it will work. I understand what they are doing. They are Communists.

What I find fascinating is the capacity of American ostriches and ostriches across the Western world to be deceived over and over and over. If you read the ideology of the Sandinistas and the Nicaraguan revolution by David Nolan, or if you read the Grenada documents: An Overview and Selection, released by the State Department, and you realize you are reading real Communist documents which we captured when we liberated the island of Grenada and you say to yourself how could these people be so contemptuous of us. And they are. It is very clear from reading both Borge's statements and reading the Grenada documents that the Communists have absolute contempt for middle-class freedom-loving Westerners. They see us as weak, as shortsighted, as lacking historical knowledge, as uninformed, and they talk in here about how to manipulate us as though we were children. And they you see all of a sudden an ostrich get excited because the day after he votes to kill aid to the freedom fighters Ortega goes to Moscow again, and you begin to understand why they have contempt for us. Because as they look at the ostrich faction in the West they say to themselves, "You know, these guys are really so dumb that we can do anything, and as long as we do it cheerfully and we seem sincere they will buy the next one."

And the ostriches in the American world and the ostriches in the Western world buy it every time. I have come to the conclusion as an intellectual analyst that the greatest problem the Western world faces in survival is what I would call neurotic ostriches with amnesia. They are not just ostriches. Ostriches are bad enough. They stick their head in the sand. But they are neurotic ostriches in that they are literally incapable of dealing with intellectual, factual information because of their neurosis that blocks them from thinking they are Communists, and their amnesia in that as the one gentleman said to me, if only Ortega had waited 1 week. Now, how much amnesia do you have to have as a U.S. Congressman for 1 week to make that big a difference?

Mr. BARTON of Texas. If the gentleman will yield on that?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. We had a great American President named Abraham Lincoln a little over 100 years ago and one of his sayings was, "You can fool some of the people some of the time and all of the people some of the time but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time." And as we stand here in the body of the House of Representatives that represents all of the people of the United States, I have great confidence that if we can get the truth to the American people we can educate enough of the American people to what the true situation is in Nicaragua and what the Sandinista Communists are up to down there and we may, they may be able to fool some of the people but they will not fool a majority of the people. And I have great faith that we will be able to help the freedom fighters to help themselves, which in the long run will help people in this country.

I think that the gentleman is to be commended for beginning the process and standing up and presenting the truth to the American public and to the Members of this body so that they can have an educated opinion about what needs to be done.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say in closing I agree with the gentleman and my hope is over the next year or so that every American church library, every public library, every high school library, every college library will get a copy of the Grenada documents and that concerned citizens across America will study actual Communist documents, Communist diplomatic papers, Communist treaties that are available from the State Department in the Grenada documents, and that those citizens who are represented by sincere and well meaning and idealistic ostriches will take it upon themselves to insist that their Congressmen begin to read these documents and that across America in town hall meetings and in civil meetings and in call-in shows people will say to their Congressmen, "Have you read the Grenada documents? Are you familiar with the ideology of the Sandinistas in the Nicaraguan revolution? Are you aware that they are Communists," because I think that the great genius of a free society over a dictatorship is that in the long run, slowly but steadily the people learn. And I think that Ortega, by going to Moscow so quickly, helped all of us to begin to say to our ostrich friends: Is it not time to keep your head above the sand long enough to really look at the nature of our opponents? Is it not time to study Leninism, to study communism, to look at the Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan alliance? Is it not time to be honest about the guerrilla war that is already under way and the war that Nicaragua is waging against Honduras and El Salvador and against Guatemala, and the war that Nicaragua has already promised to wage against Costa Rica?

Does it not make sense to you to tell the truth, to call a war a war if that is what it is, and to recognize that the time has come for the United States to help the freedom fighters and to be honest about the danger of communism by the Soviet Union in Cuba and Nicaragua?

I thank the gentleman for joining me.

FOOD STAMP AND COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1985

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the "Food Stamp and Commodity Distribution Improvement Act of 1985." These amendments are designed not only to reauthorize vital nutrition assistance programs but also to take positive steps to address the serious problem of hunger in America today. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition, I hope these amendments will serve as the basis for food stamp and commodity distribution legislation that will be included in this year's farm bill.

The heart of this legislation comes from H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984, which passed the House on August 1, 1984, by a vote of 364 to 39. Like H.R. 5151, this bill primarily addresses the Food Stamp Program and includes many recommendations reported by the President's Task Force on Food Assistance, in January 1984. This bill is designed to improve benefit access and adequacy, enhance work incentives and work opportunities, simplify program management, and strengthen program accountability.

In addition to food stamp provisions, this bill reauthorizes the surplus commodity distribution program known as the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program [TEFAP] for 2 years. It also reauthorizes related nutrition programs, and modifies and reauthorizes the Commodity Supplemental Food Program for women and children.

By introducing this legislation now, I want to reemphasize my determination that something positive must be done this year to alleviate the hunger problem in this country. There is no question in my mind that the problem is real and that it is necessary and appropriate to address it at the Federal level. Only those who choose not to see, or wear ideological blinders, can say we have no serious problem of hunger in America today.

Over the past 26 months, the subcommittee I chair has traveled to seven cities to look at the hunger problem first hand. I have also participated in two additional field hearings as chairman of the Task Force on Domestic Hunger of the Select Committee on Hunger. Everywhere the story has been the same—the demand for emergency food assistance has risen substantially, if not dramatically, nationwide, over the past few years. Reports of 100 to 300 percent increases in soup kitchen and food pantry participation are commonplace. Studies linking hunger to health problems have emerged. Yet, there seems to be no sign of the problem letting up despite improvements in the national economy.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors released a new survey on the hunger problem at our subcommittee hearing on April 17. Not only did 21 of 22 cities surveyed report an increase in emergency food aid demand over the past year, but 81 percent of the cities expect the demand to increase in the next year. These cities also report that the number of emergency facilities to feed the hunger has increased 21 percent over the past year. Despite this fact, 70 percent of the cities say that the emergency facilities are not meeting all of the demand for aid.

In late March of this year in Oklahoma City, I saw large numbers of women and young children in line for a hot meal or an emergency food package at a local soup kitchen. Despite my many prior visits to soup kitchens, their numbers startled me. If you take the time to talk with these people, or talk with those who cope with their needs daily, there can be no doubt that their desperation is real.

If for no one else, we must act for the sake of our children. The latest poverty statistics show that one-fourth of all children under age 6 in this country live in poverty. This represents an increase of 51 percent from 1979 to 1983. Fifty percent of all black children and forty percent of Hispanic children in this age group currently live in poverty. Unfortunately, these figures tell only part of the story about the deteriorating status of children in America.

Recently, the U.S. Public Health Service reported that the infant mortality rate in this country was stabilizing, after declining steadily since 1965. A closer look at the study reveals a most disturbing finding. While the infant mortality rate in the first month of life continues to decline, presumably due to advances in medical technology, the mortality rate for infants in the next 11 months of life appears to have actually increased. For this age group, nutritional and health care interventions play a larger role in preventing death. I wonder how many more infants must suffer severe health consequences before we recognize that our social safety net is inadequate. Are we prepared to take the risk of doing nothing to repair it?

For those who want justifications for improving food assistance, there are persuasive statistics and analyses. Last month, the Agriculture Committee released a study conducted by our subcommittee on the adequacy of food stamp benefit levels. I urge everyone with an interest in this program to carefully review this thoughtful paper. It was written by Dr. Janet Greger, a professor of nutrition at the University of Wisconsin, currently a Congressional Science Fellow working with our subcommittee. Reviewers with widely varying backgrounds and philosophies have praised it as a fair and thorough analysis. While the study draws no conclusions, I believe a clear case for increased benefits emerges from it. Perhaps the strongest point I find in the study is that food stamp participants generally do not receive benefits truly based on the full cost of the Thrifty Food Plan, the minimum diet that is the basis for benefit allotments.

Mr. Speaker, I am under no illusion that, if enacted, the legislation I introduce today will solve the problem of hunger in America. It is a complex problem that cannot be solved by food assistance alone. However, the bill is a solid step forward toward easing the hunger of our most improverished citizens.

Before closing my introductory remarks on this legislation, I would like to address how this bill relates to the Federal budget. The bill has various provisions that cost money and others that save money. Overall, there is modest additional cost.

I know that some may say we cannot afford to do anything about hunger this year because of the Federal deficit. But I believe we must. I seek to restore only a small portion of the nearly $12 billion in fiscal years 1982–85 Federal nutrition cutbacks enacted by the 97th Congress. I am convinced that the long-term health, remedial education, and loss of productivity costs attributable to hunger will dwarf whatever investment we make now. This is not an issue that should be looked at in a narrow, 1-year budget perspective. If it is, we will for many years pay an even greater price for our shortsightedness.

Hunger is a costly and intolerable national shame. We have no choice but to act now to deal with this threat within our society.

What follows now is a description of the major provisions of the Food Stamp and Commodity Distribution Improvements Act of 1985, as well as the bill itself and a section by section summary.

FOOD STAMPS

Thrifty Food Plan

Foods stamp benefits are based on the cost of the Thrifty Food Plan, the lowest cost of four food plans prepared by USDA. Benefits are currently adjusted each October 1 to reflect the cost of the Thrifty Food Plan through the previous June. What this means is that food stamp benefits paid in any fiscal year lag 3 to 15 months behind Thrifty Food Plan costs. As our subcommittee study shows, actual food stamp benefits have lagged behind food price costs by an average of almost 5 percent over the past 7 years. Even in fiscal year 1984, with food price inflation quite low, the loss in food purchasing power averaged 4 percent.

The bill would change the basis for food stamp benefits by requiring that the adjustment implemented each October 1 be based on the cost of the Thrifty Food Plan through the previous September 30. The result is that, at least at the beginning of each fiscal year, food stamp benefits would be current with actual Thrifty Food Plan costs. Of course, benefits would continue to lag up to 12 months behind food costs through each fiscal year.

This proposal would entail a 3-month projection of food costs from June 30 through September 30 of any year, by the Secretary of Agriculture, because actual food price information would not be available in time to implement a benefit increase on October 1. Since the projection is for such a short time period, the likelihood of a significant estimating error is remote. In fact, any administration is more likely to underestimate than overestimate future inflation. For fiscal year 1986, this proposal would lead to about a 1-percent benefit increase above current law, using current food price inflation assumptions.

The Food Stamp Program is unique in that, unlike any other benefit payment program, its benefits are based upon an empirical minimum standard—the cost of the Thrifty Food Plan. The proposal here is simply to provide benefits that more closely reflect the actual current costs of that plan. The fact that current rounding rules in determining food stamp allotment levels cut recipients' rightful benefits about 1 percent on average, and that the poor, on the whole, may generally face higher food costs than other Americans, provide additional reasons why an increase in the basis for benefits is warranted.

DEDUCTIONS FROM INCOME

As in the House-passed H.R. 5151, this bill would raise the ceiling on the combined excess shelter/dependent care cost deduction to $155 and restore the earned income deduction from 18 to 20 percent, effective in fiscal year 1986. Beginning in fiscal year 1987, the dependent care deduction would be decoupled from the excess shelter cost deduction and established at a maximum level of $160 per month per household.

By increasing the combined shelter/dependent care deduction to $155 in fiscal year 1986, the deduction amount would approximate the level it would have reached had it not been frozen for a period of time as a result of the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981, Public Law 97-35.

This increase would primarily aid those faced with high shelter costs. Our subcommittee has received substantial evidence indicating that many food stamp households face the "heat or eat" dilemma. The latest available data indicate that about 27 percent of all food stamp households already receive the maximum shelter/dependent care deduction. The President's Task Force on Food Assistance acknowledged that energy costs for low income persons have risen far faster than the general inflation rate and consume a disproportionate share of their budgets. Department of Energy surveys confirm this finding.

Since the test for qualifying for the shelter deduction is quite stringent—deductions are granted only to the extent shelter costs exceed 50 percent of net income—this proposal will assure that any benefit increases are targeted to those most in need. It may also provide some small help in stemming the recent alarming growth of the problem of homelessness.

Separation of the dependent care deduction—ordinarily to reflect child care costs—will provide a significant measure of relief at very small additional costs primarily for working, female-headed households. For these households, the dependent care deduction may serve as a significant work incentive. The current combined excess shelter/dependent care deduction results in relatively few working households effectively qualifying to deduct child care costs since most of them have shelter costs that also qualify for the deduction.

Prior to 1977, the Food Stamp Program allowed a separate dependent care deduction. It was combined with the shelter deduction in 1977 solely out of the fear that if some households qualified for both, they would be eligible for food stamps despite having high gross incomes. Today, that is no longer a possibility because the gross income eligibility limit—130 percent of the poverty line—instituted in 1981 automatically cuts off any so-called high income participants.

Prior to 1981 legislation, the food stamp earned income deduction was 20 percent, and this bill would restore that level. This deduction represents the primary difference in calculating food stamp benefits for working as contrasted with nonworking households. As a matter of fairness and to promote increased work effort, the deduction should cover the work-related costs of most, if not all, working food stamp participants. If a household's work-related expenses—taxes, transportation, union dues, uniforms, and so forth—exceed 18 percent of income, as many do, there is less incentive to work and a greater likelihood of continued dependence on public assistance.

In addition, poor working families now pay significantly higher taxes than just a few years ago. Not only have payroll taxes—for example, Social Security—increased, but working families at and below the poverty line also pay higher Federal income taxes. A working family of four with a gross income at or near the poverty line—about $10,600—in 1984, incurred a total Federal tax liability of about $1,076, compared to $269 in 1978. As the report of the President's Task Force on Food Assistance emphasized, there is a need for greater work incentives in the public welfare system.

ASSETS LIMITATIONS

The bill proposes a lifting of assets limitations in the manner prescribed in the House-passed H.R. 5151, effective in fiscal year 1987. As recommended by the President's task force, liquid assets limitations would be increased from $3,000 to $3,500 for elderly and disabled households and from $1,500 to $2,250 for all other households. The task force's recommendation to immediately increase the threshold for counting automobiles from $4,500 to $5,500 of fair market value would be phased in over several years.

The President's task force justified these changes by stating the following:

> The recessions of the recent past have resulted in an increase in the number of 'new' poor families many of whom are needy even though they have assets that disqualify them from eligibility. The asset limitation has become more restrictive as a result of inflation for the dollar amount of assets allowed has not changed even though the purchasing power of the dollar has declined.

Additional minor changes in assets limitations are also included in the bill.

SALES TAX

Currently, 20 States have either State or local sales taxes that are charged on food stamp purchases. Such sales taxes reduce food stamp purchasing power up to 6 percent in these States.

The bill would prohibit any State or locality from collecting a sales tax on food stamp purchases if they wish to operate a Food Stamp Program, effective in fiscal year 1988. This would put an end to what is, in effect a transfer of revenues from the Federal Government to State and local government at the expense of low-income persons.

The effective date of this provision is delayed to afford State and local governments time to make arrangements for alternate revenue sources. Especially in States where legislatures do not meet every year, there is a need for transition time.

Some State officials have argued that there should be no prohibition of the collection of sales taxes on food stamp purchases because the tax proceeds in their States go into food stamp administration or other social welfare programs. While I am concerned about this situation and its possible adverse effect on the poor, this should not be the controlling argument. The fact is that the tax results in the poor financing their own programs. Federal dollars provided for food assistance should not be diverted to other purposes, even if there is some return for the poor.

WORK PROGRAMS

The bill builds on the proposals in H.R. 5151 to improve the effectiveness of work requirements. This bill would mandate, for the first time, that all States must have an employment program—job search, job finding clubs, work, workfare, training, education directly related to employability, or some other related approach. The bill would thus mandate that each State must try to make something happen to move more people out of dependency and into employment. Increased Federal grant money would be made available to fund these programs and, beyond that, matching funding would be available if the grants are not sufficient.

The cornerstone of this proposal is flexibility. Rather than mandate one rigid approach to work programs nationwide, this bill would afford the States great flexibility to determine which persons are served and how they are served, as long as the approach utilized is consistent with fundamental client protections. States would be encouraged to implement concentrated, effective programs that really work in moving people into unsubsidized employment rather than spreading their resources thinly to put clients and workers through perfunctory, paperwork-intensive work requirements. Research on the effectiveness of various work and training programs indicates that concentrated, rather than shallow, attention on potentially employable persons generally yields higher rates of long term employment.

Over the past few years, our subcommittee has visited or studied various successful work programs in areas like San Diego, Massachusetts, and Oklahoma. If there is one thing that becomes clear from our reviews, it is that no one approach to work requirements is appropriate. The employable food stamp population is not monolithic—participants have varying levels of education, intelligence, skill, and other work experience. Different approaches are needed to best suit their strengths and weaknesses. I believe we are not in a position to say which of the successful programs the subcommittee has studied should be mandated for the Nation. However, we are in a position to say that each State must aggressively pursue programs designed to maximize the employment and employability of food stamp participants.

PUERTO RICO

The bill would continue the Nutrition Assistance Program [NAP] in Puerto Rico, eliminating the requirement that benefits be paid in noncash form as of October 1, 1985. Also, effective in fiscal year 1987, the bill would provide for an adjustment in the amount of the grant provided to Puerto Rico for operating the NAP program.

When the NAP program was established in 1981, it not only replaced the food stamp with a block grant at sharply reduced funding, but the annual funding level was frozen through fiscal year 1985 at $825 million. This means that by the end of fiscal year 1985, NAP funding will have been frozen for over 3 years.

In my view, it is discriminatory to freeze funding for Puerto Rico for another 4 years, as has been proposed by the administration. The costs of serving low-income persons in Puerto Rico are affected by changes in unemployment and inflation. This bill provides some measure of protection for Puerto Rico, by increasing the grant to reflect anticipated food price inflation, starting in fiscal year 1987.

This bill also includes additional provisions pertaining to Puerto Rico proposed by the administration that would allow multiple State agencies to operate the NAP Program and would drop the requirement that Puerto Rico match 50 percent to the administrative costs for operating the NAP Program.

MEDICAL DEDUCTION FOR THE ELDERLY AND DISABLED

The bill includes a provision adopted in floor action on H.R. 5151 last year that changes the threshold for elderly and disabled households to qualify for the medical deduction from $35 a month to the lesser of 5 percent of gross income or $35 a month. This would bring the Food Stamp Program into line with the Internal Revenue Service in terms of determining eligibility for a medical hardship deduction. Since the average income of an elderly food stamp household is currently about $360 a month, the $35 threshold constitutes almost 10 percent of its income. Of course, many households have incomes far below the average and the $35 threshold works as a particular hardship on them.

PROGRAM INFORMATION

The bill would restore to the Food Stamp Program matching funding for States that make efforts to inform unemployed, elderly, or disabled persons about the availability of the Food Stamp Program and how to participate. There would be no requirement on States to perform such activities. Furthermore, only specific, targeted activities to inform potentially eligible persons would be permitted. This provision is not intended to open the door to Federal funding for mass media efforts to publicize the program. Instead, food stamp offices could receive matching funds, for instance, to develop materials for local elderly feeding programs or to send staff to explain the Food Stamp Program to their participants. Similar activities would be permissible in State unemployment offices or other locations that are likely to deal with potential participants.

Current food stamp participation is relatively low, compared to historic levels, given the current unemployment and poverty rates in the country. Studies of food stamp participation have documented that a significant number of eligible persons, particularly the recently employed and the elderly, either are unaware of the program or unaware of their eligibility. Participation among elderly persons has traditionally been very low compared to other groups. The bill's partial restoration of matching funds—which were more broadly available prior to 1981—for program information purposes should provide some help in informing those who are eligible and in need about the availability of the program.

SPENDING CEILINGS

This bill would authorize appropriations for the Food Stamp Program for the next 5 years. Although it is my view that spending ceilings on this program are unnecessary, I recognize that political realities appear to dictate them. I would point out, however, that since eligibility for this program has already been limited to the current administration's definition of "truly needy"—gross income limit of 130 percent of poverty—the only possible cause for high program costs are: First, high unemployment; second, high inflation; or third, deep cutbacks in other social programs which provide benefits that are counted as income in the Food Stamp Program. I would suggest that it would be inappropriate to enforce a food stamp spending ceiling if any of these factors should drive program costs up.

The authorization ceilings recommended in the bill are based on Congressional Budget Office estimates, leaving some margin for estimating error and possible changes in economic conditions. Certainly few can accurately predict the economy 1 year into the future, much less 5 years from now. Since food stamp costs are directly tied to economic conditions, it is important to give leeway for inaccurate economic forecasts so that Congress need not adjust the spending ceilings every year.

The bill also makes certain changes in the manner in which food stamp spending ceilings are to be enforced. Current law would be changed to permit the Secretary to reduce benefits across the board—pursuant to section 18(d) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977—only if the authorization level, rather than the amount appropriated by Congress appears to be insufficient.

This change is intended to put an end to the unfortunate situation of the past few years where, despite more than adequate authorization levels, food stamp funding has been uncertain. Recipients nationwide have been threatened with delays and reductions. This has led to great confusion and unnecessary fear at the local level.

In my view, as long as authorizations are sufficient, no food stamp benefits should be reduced or delayed unless Congress makes an explicit decision to do so. Especially with the regular occurrence of substantial food stamp supplemental appropriations in the recent past, I think it is important to guard against any Secretary of USDA deciding to lower benefits based upon the initial level of food stamp appropriations provided in any fiscal year. If it appears authorization levels are insufficient and Congress expresses no intent to raise them, USDA would take steps to reduce program costs, consistent with the authorization level, unless otherwise instructed by Congress.

The bill contains one additional safeguard against enforcement of an authorization ceiling at an inappropriate time. It states that the Secretary would not have authority to reduce benefits across the board under section 18(d) in any fiscal year during which the monthly national unemployment rate reaches 9 percent. This type of unemployment rate would be a sure sign of a recession and, especially at that time, it should be an explicit congressional decision whether 20 million Americans or more lose essential food assistance benefits.

COMPUTERIZATION

The bill provides new incentives for States to increase the use of automated data processing systems. States would be permitted to apply up to 15 percent of error rate sanctions assessed in any fiscal year to increased efforts to lower their error rates, including the development of new computer capabilities, rather than pay this portion of the penalty back to the Federal Government. States could qualify for this redirection of sanction funds to computer projects only if they are above and beyond what is currently operated or planned. These funds would not be eligible for the 75 percent Federal matching funds for computerization.

In addition, the Secretary would be required to develop, in consultation with the States, a model plan for comprehensive computerization of the Food Stamp Program. Any State developing a plan that would result in a State's computer operations satisfying all elements of the model plan would qualify for 90 percent Federal matching funds.

The Secretary would also be required to prepare by April 1, 1987, an analysis and evaluation of each State's computer operations. Based on his findings, the Secretary would be authorized to mandate automated data processing systems to the degree necessary in any State where their absence threatens program integrity or accountability.

OTHER FOOD STAMP PROVISIONS

The bill contains additional food stamp provisions, whose combined budget impact is minimal. Included are several provisions identical or similar to those in H.R. 5151 which: Insure eligibility of the homeless, expand the disability definition, extend categorical eligibility to pure AFDC and SSI households, prohibit bank fees on food retailers in most instances, and others.

A variety of other minor and technical changes are included, many which were requested by the administration. The administration proposal to impose a $50 annual fee on food retailers participating in the Food Stamp Program is not included in this bill.

NUTRITION EDUCATION

The bill includes title III of H.R. 5151, which was entitled "Food, Nutrition, and Consumer Education." This provision would set up a small program of grants to State cooperative extension services to augment and improve their current nutrition education efforts. These offices would have flexibility in utilizing the funding to complement the Expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program [EFNEP].

Our subcommittee has received repeated and compelling testimony on the need for increased nutrition education efforts. This is one effective way to ensure that Federal food assistance dollars are well spent. Funding for such efforts has been frozen, in effect, for the past several years. It is now time to reinforce this effort to fight hunger in America.

TEMPORARY EMERGENCY FOOD ASSISTANCE PROGRAM (TEFAP)

When TEFAP was first implemented in 1983, the intent was to provide agricultural commodities to meet the hunger crisis in America. Today, with the continued existence of the hunger problem and the continued availability of surplus commodities, I believe that this program should be reauthorized for 2 additional years.

STATE AND LOCAL ADMINISTRATIVE FUNDING

The bill reauthorizes State and local administrative funding at $50 million for each of fiscal years 1986 and 1987. Testimony and documentation received by the subcommittee this year overwhelmingly supported retaining administrative funding so necessary for proper storage, refrigeration, transportation and distribution of commodities. Without this funding, local distribution would be far less effective. Our subcommittee has received reports of local agencies either failing to participate in or dropping out of TEFAP for lack of administrative funding. Unfortunately, it is those areas most in need of TEFAP commodities that find difficulty in operating the program without administrative funding.

LOCAL PASS-THROUGH

The bill directs States receiving administrative funds to provide local cooperating agencies with a minimum of 20 percent of the State allocation in any given fiscal year. While it is important to provide considerable flexibility to States in expending administrative funds, it is equally important to assure that at least some funds reach the local level, and this provision simply reinforces the current law requirement. Many emergency feeding organizations operate predominately through volunteer support and may not have the resources to perform the eligibility verification, recordkeeping, public announcement, and auditing required under TEFAP. To the extent that a State pays local costs directly, these payments would count toward meeting the 20 percent minimum.

AUDIT STANDARDS

The bill imposes strict accountability for commodities held in inventory and distributed by the States. The bill adds strong standards to prevent waste or negligent handling of commodities. It also instructs the Secretary to develop reasonable audit standards to reflect the special circumstances of local, nonprofit agencies acting in good faith to administer the program.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

The bill continues section 1114 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981. This provision assures that uncommitted surplus government commodities acquired under price support programs will be made available to certain federally authorized feeding programs, without charge or credit. The bill emphasizes that once certain commodities, such as dairy products and wheat, are found to be in surplus, they must be distributed.

The bill also would continue the National Commodity Processing Program currently authorized by Public Law 98-8, as amended.

H.R. 2422

A bill to reauthorize, and improve the operation of, the food stamp program, the commodity supplemental food program, and the temporary emergency food assistance program, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Food Stamp and Commodity Distribution Improvement Act of 1985".

TITLE I—FOOD STAMP AND RELATED PROVISIONS

ELIGIBILITY OF THE HOMELESS

SEC. 101. (a) The first sentence of section 3(i) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2012(i)) is amended by—

(1) in clause (1), after "consumption", inserting "(or in the case of an individual who does not reside in a permanent dwelling or who has no fixed address, for such individual's consumption)"; and

(2) in clause (2), after "consumption" both times that word appears therein, inserting "(or in the case of individuals who do not reside in permanent dwellings or who have no fixed addresses, for such individuals' consumption)".

(b) Section 11(e)(2) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2020(e)(2)) is amended by—

(1) striking out the semicolon at the end and inserting a period in lieu thereof; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following: "The State agency shall provide a method of certifying and issuing coupons to eligible households who do not reside in permanent dwellings or who have no fixed addresses, and shall take steps to ensure that such method limits participation in the food stamp program to eligible households.".

THRIFTY FOOD PLAN

SEC. 102. Section 3(o) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2012(o)) is amended by—

(1) striking out "fifty-four" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "fifty",

(2) striking out "and" after clause (7) of the second sentence;

(3) in clause (8) of the second sentence—

(A) striking out "and each October 1 thereafter,"; and

(B) inserting, after "June 30", the following: "and the Secretary's best estimate as to further changes in such cost occurring during the three-month period following June 30"; and

(4) inserting, before the proviso at the end of the second sentence, "and" and a new clause (9) as follows: "(9) on October 1, 1986, and each October 1 thereafter, using the actual cost of the thrifty food plan as of September 30 of the previous year as the base, adjust the cost of such diets to reflect changes in the cost of the thrifty food plan for the nine months ending the preceding June 30 and the Secretary's best estimate as to further changes in such cost occurring during the three-month period following June 30, and round the result to the nearest lower dollar increment for each household size."

DEFINITIONS OF THE DISABLED

SEC. 103. Section 3(r) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2012(r)) is amended by—

EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

SEC. 113. (a) Section 6(d) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2015(d)) further amended by—

(1) amending paragraph (1)(ii) to read as follows:

"(ii) refuses without good cause to fulfill the employment requirements prescribed by paragraph (4), including any reasonable employment requirements as are prescribed by the State agency in accordance with paragraph (4), which may, at the option of the State agency, provide that such requirements apply to program applicants at the time of application: Provided, That the period of ineligibility shall be two months;";

(2) Adding at the end of paragraph (1) the following new sentences: "Any period of ineligibility for violations under this paragraph shall end when the household member who committed the violation complies with the requirement that has been violated. If the household member who committed the violation leaves the household during the period of ineligibility, such household shall no longer be subject to sanction for such violation and, if it is otherwise eligible, may resume participation in the program, but any other household of which such person thereafter becomes the head of the household shall be ineligible for the balance of the period of ineligibility."; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4)(A) Each State agency shall implement an employment program. For purposes of this Act, an "employment program" means a program that contains terms and conditions comparable to those prescribed in section 402(a)(35)(A) (i) and (ii) of part A of title IV of the Social Security Act and, except that a State agency shall have no obligation to incur costs exceeding $25 per participant per month, in section 402(a)(35)(B) of part A of title IV of such Act for job search activities under the Aid to Families With Dependent Children program (except that the State agency shall retain the option provided in paragraph (1)(ii) relating to applying the program requirements to applicants). An "employment program" may also include, to the extent determined appropriate by the State agency, reasonable job search training and support activities that may consist of job skills assessments, job finding clubs, training in techniques for employability, job placement services, or other direct training or support activities, including educational programs, determined by the State agency to expand the job search abilities or employability of those subject to the program. The State agency may provide that participation in such training or support activities may supplement or supplant other requirements imposed on those subject to the program.

"(B) Each State agency shall exempt from employment requirements under paragraph (1) categories of household members to which the State agency determines that the application of such requirements is impracticable as applied to such categories due to factors such as, but not limited to, the availability of work opportunities and the cost effectiveness of the employment requirements. In making such a determination, the State agency may designate a category consisting of all such household members residing in specified areas of the State. The State agency shall also exempt or suspend from such requirements individual household members not included in any such category but with respect to whom it determines that such requirements are impracticable because of personal circumstances such as, but not limited to, lack of job readiness and employability, the remote location of work opportunities, and unavailability of dependent care. The State agency shall determine the extent to which any individual must fulfill the requirements of this paragraph.".

(b) Section 11(e) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2020(e)) is amended by—

(1) striking out the period after paragraph (21) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(2) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(22) the manner in which the State agency will carry out the employment program under section 6(d)(4) of this Act.".

(c) Section 16 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2025) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h)(1) Effective October 1, 1984, the Secretary shall allocate in each fiscal year from funds appropriated for such fiscal year under section 18(a)(1) of this Act, the amount of $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and $75,000,000 for each of the following four fiscal years, which amount shall be used to pay to each State agency the full cost (except as otherwise provided in this subsection) of carrying out the employment program under section 6(d)(4) of this Act.

"(2) If, in carrying out such activities, a State agency incurs costs that exceed the amount payable to the State agency under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall pay such State agency an amount equal to 50 per centum of such additional costs in accordance with subsection (a).

"(3) The Secretary shall, in accordance with subsection (a), reimburse each State agency in an amount equal to 50 per centum of the total amount of payments made or costs incurred by the State agency in connection with transportation costs and other expenses reasonably incurred by participants in the employment program, except that such total amount shall not exceed an amount representing $25 per participant per month.

"(4) The Secretary shall monitor the employment programs carried out by State agencies under this Act to measure their effectiveness in terms of the increase in the numbers of household members who obtain employment and the numbers of such members who retain such employment as a result of their participation in the program. The Secretary shall, not later than January 1, 1989, report to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate on the effectiveness of such job search programs.".

STAGGERING OF COUPON ISSUANCE

SEC. 114. Section 7 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2016) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h)(1) The State agency may implement a procedure for staggering the issuance of coupons to eligible households throughout the entire month: Provided, That the procedure ensures that, in the transition period from other issuance procedures, no eligible household experiences an interval between coupon issuances of more than thirty-five days, either through regular issuances by the State agency or through supplemental issuances.

"(2) For any eligible household that applies for participation in the food stamp program during the last fifteen days of a month, coupons shall be issued for the first full month of participation by the later of five working days after the beginning of the following month or five working days after verification procedures are completed.".

DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION SUBMITTED BY RETAIL STORES

SEC. 115. Section 9(c) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2018(c)) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end of the second sentence "except that such information may be disclosed to and used by State agencies that administer the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants and Children, authorized under section 17 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966, for purposes of administering the provisions of that Act and the regulations issued under that Act.".

CREDIT UNIONS

SEC. 116. Section 10 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2019) is amended by inserting "or which are insured under the Federal Credit Union Act and have retail food stores or wholesale food concerns in their field of membership" after "Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation" each place it appears.

CHARGES FOR REDEMPTION OF COUPONS

SEC. 117. (a) Section 10 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2019), as amended by section 115 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "No financial institution may impose on or collect from a retail food store a fee or other charge for the redemption of coupons that are submitted to the financial institution in a manner consistent with the requirements, other than any requirements relating to cancellation of coupons, for the presentation of coupons by financial institutions to the Federal Reserve Banks.".

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture, in consultation with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, shall issue regulations implementing the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

PUBLIC INFORMATION

SEC. 118. (a) Section 11(e)(1) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2020(e)(1)) is amended by inserting, after "funds provided under this Act", the following: "except for activities providing program information (including program eligibility and benefit guidelines) to unemployed, disabled, or elderly persons who apply, or may be eligible, for participation in the program".

(b) The first sentence of section 16(a) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2025(a)) is amended by striking out "and (4) fair hearings" and inserting in lieu thereof "(4) fair hearings, and (5) activities providing program information to unemployed, disabled, or elderly persons".

OFFICE HOURS

SEC. 119. Section 11(e)(2) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2020(e)(2)), as amended by section 101(b) of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The State agency shall assess, from time to time, the need for operating food stamp offices within the State during evening and weekend hours;"

RETAIL FOOD STORES AND WHOLESALE FOOD CONCERNS

SEC. 120. Section 12 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2021) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (e) as follows:

"(e)(1) In the event any retail food store or wholesale food concern that has been disqualified under subsection (a) of this section is sold or the ownership thereof is otherwise transferred to a bona fide purchaser or transferee, the person or persons who sell or other transfer ownership to the retail food store or wholesale food concern shall be subjected to a civil money penalty in an amount established by the Secretary through regulations to reflect that portion of the disqualification period that has not yet expired. If the retail food store or wholesale food concern has been disqualified permanently, the civil money penalty shall be double the penalty for a ten-year disqualification period, as calculated under regulations promulgated by the Secretary. The disqualification period imposed under subsection (b) of this subsection shall continue in effect as to the person or persons who sell or otherwise transfer ownership to the retail food store or wholesale food concern notwithstanding the imposition of a civil money penalty under this subsection.

"(2) At any time after a civil money penalty imposed under paragraph (1) of this subsection has become final under the provisions of section 14(a) of this Act, the Secretary may request the Attorney General to institute a civil action against the person or persons subject to the penalty in a district court of the United States for any district in which such person or persons are found, reside, or transact business to collect the penalty and such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide such action. In such action, the validity and amount of such penalty shall not be subject to review.".

STATE AGENCY LIABILITY, QUALITY CONTROL, AND AUTOMATIC DATA PROCESSING

SEC. 121. (a) Effective with respect to the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1985, and each fiscal year thereafter, section 16 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2025) is amended by—

(1) in paragraph (2)(A) of subsection (d), inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "less any amount the payment of which is waived under paragraph (6) of this subsection"; and

(2) adding, at the end of subsection (d), a new paragraph as follows:

"(6)(A) The Secretary, at the request of a State agency, shall waive the payment of a portion—not more than 15 per centum—of a claim, asserted against the State for a fiscal year under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection, equal to the amount that the State agency shows it will devote to the planning, design, development, installation, or expansion of automatic data processing, computerized information, or related systems or to other administrative efforts, designed to reduce payment error rates and approved by the Secretary. To obtain such waiver, the State agency must show, to the satisfaction of the Secretary, that (i) the systems or administrative efforts on which the request for a waiver is based are in addition to systems or administrative efforts that are already in place or part of an existing plan for the State agency, and (ii) such systems or administrative efforts can reasonably be expected to improve the management, integrity, or efficiency of the food stamp program operated by the State agency.

"(B) Amounts used for systems or administrative efforts as a result of a waiver of a claim under this paragraph may not be credited by the State agency as its share of the costs incurred for data and information systems under the cost-sharing programs provided for in subsections (a) and (g) of this section.

"(C) If a proposed system or administrative effort on which a waiver of a claim under this paragraph is based is not implemented within six months after a target date for implementation agreed on by the Secretary and the State agency, the waiver shall cease to be effective and the State agency shall again become liable for full payment of the claim under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection.

"(7) To facilitate the implementation of paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection, each State agency shall submit to the Secretary expeditiously data regarding its operations in such fiscal year sufficient for the Secretary to establish the payment error rate for the State agency for such fiscal year and determine the amount for which the State agency will be liable for such fiscal year under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection. The Secretary shall make a determination and notfiy the State agency of such determination, within nine months following the end of such fiscal year. The Secretary shall initiate efforts to collect the amount owned by the State agency as a claim established under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection, except with respect to portions of such payments that are waived under paragraph (6) of this subsection and, as applicable, subject to the conclusion of any formal or informal appeal procedure and administrative or judicial review under section 14 of this Act (as provided for in paragraph (5) of this subsection), before the end of the fiscal year following such fiscal year."; and

"(3) inserting "(or in the case of State agencies that submit plans that satisfy the elements of the model automation and computerization plan under section 11(o) of this Act, as determined by the Secretary, 90 per centum)" after "75 per centum" in subsection (g).

"(b) Section 11 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977b (7 U.S.C. 2020) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (o) as follows:

"(o)(1) The Secretary shall develop, after consultation and with the assistance of an advisory group of State agencies appointed by the Secretary without regard to the provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act, a model plan for the comprehensive automation of data processing and computerization of information systems under the national food stamp program. The plan shall be completed not later than October 1, 1986. The elements of the plan shall include, but not be limited to, intake procedures, eligibility determinations and calculation of benefits, verification procedures, coordination with related Federal and State programs, the issuance of benefits, reconciliation procedures, the generation of notices, and program reporting.

"(2) Not later than April 1, 1987, the Secretary shall prepare and submit to Congress an evaluation of the degree and sufficiency of each State's automated data processing and computerized information systems for the administration of the food stamp program. Such report shall include, for each State, an analysis of additional steps needed for the state to achieve effective and cost-efficient data processing and information systems. The Secretary shall, thereafter, periodically update such report.

"(3) Based on the Secretary's findings in any of the reports submitted under paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Secretary may require a State agency, as necessary to rectify identified shortcomings in the administration of the food stamp program in the State, to take specified steps to automate data processing systems or computerize information systems for the administration of the food stamp program in the state if the Secretary finds that, in the absence of such systems, there will be significant program accountability or integrity problems in the administration of the food stamp program in that State.".

"(c) The first sentence of section 11(g) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2020(g)) is amended by inserting "the automation or computerization requirements imposed on the State agency under subsection (o)(3) of this section," after "pursuant to subsection (d) of this section,".

PILOT PROJECTS

SEC. 122. (a) Section 17(b)(1) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2026(b)(100 is amended by striking out "October 1, 1985" in the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1990".

(b) Section 17(d) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2026(d)) is amended by adding a new sentence at the end thereof as follows: "Upon request of a political jurisdiction operating a project under this subsection, the Secretary shall continue the project beyond any initial term established by the Secretary if the Secretary finds that the project has a beneficial effect on program administrative costs and error rates and the continuation of the project will not result in undue added program costs.".

AUTHORIZATION CEILING; AUTHORITY TO REDUCE BENEFITS

SEC. 123. Section 18 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2027) is amended by—

(1) inserting after the first sentence of subsection (a)(1) the following: "To carry out the provisions of this Act, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated not in excess of $13,484,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986; not in excess of $14,468,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987; not in excess of $15,396,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988; not in excess of $16,507,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989; and not in excess of $17,713,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990."; and

(2) in the second sentence of subsection (b)—

(A) striking out "the limitation set herein," and inserting in lieu thereof "the appropriation amount authorized in subsection (a)(1) of this section," and

(b) striking out "necessary to comply with the provisions of this subsection", and inserting in lieu thereof "necessary to conform such requirements of participating States to such amount authorized, except that no such reduction shall be required to be made if the national overall unemployment rate, as measured by the Current Population Survey of the Bureau of the Census, exceeds 9 per cent for any month of the fiscal year during which the Secretary makes such finding.".

PUERTO RICO BLOCK GRANT

SEC. 124. Effective October 1, 1985, section 19 of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2028) is amended by—

(1) striking out "for each fiscal year" in subsection (a)(1)(A) and inserting in lieu thereof "for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $862,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, $898,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, $936,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989, and $974,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990,";

(2) striking out "noncash" in subsection a(1)(A);

(3) striking out the comma after "needy persons" and all that follows in subsection (a)(1)(A) and inserting a period in lieu thereof;

(4) striking out "and 50 per centum of the related administrative expenses" in subsection (a)(1)(B) and inserting "and related administrative expenses" in lieu thereof; and

(5) striking out "a single agency which shall be" in subsection (b)(1)(A)(i) and inserting in lieu thereof "the agency or agencies directly."

COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION PROGRAMS

SEC. 125. (a) Effective October 1, 1985, section 4 of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 is amended by—

(1) striking out "1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985" in the first sentence of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, and 1990"; and

(2) striking out "under 18 years of age" and inserting in lieu thereof "18 years of age and under".

(b)(1) Effective October 1, 1985, section 5(a) of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 is amended by—

(A) striking out ", which projects shall operate no longer than two years" in clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon;

(B) inserting two new clauses after clause (1) as follows:

"(2) shall, in any fiscal year, approve applications of additional sites for the program in areas in which the program currently does not operate to the full extent that this can be done within the appropriations available for the program for the fiscal year and without reducing actual participation levels in areas in which the program is in effect; (3) shall provide information on the program and its application procedures to agencies that could operate the program and that are located in areas covered neither by the program nor the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children;";

(C) redesignating clause (2) as clause (4); and

(D) striking out "1982 through 1985" in clause (4), as redesignated under clause (C) of this paragraph, and inserting in lieu thereof "1986 through 1989".

(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture shall allow agencies distributing agricultural commodities to low-income elderly people under pilot projects under clause (1) of section 5(a) of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 on the date of enactment of this Act to continue such distribution.

(c) Effective October 1, 1985—

(1) section 209 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is repealed; and

(2) section 5(a)(2) of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by striking out

"amount appropriated for the provision of commodities to State agencies" and inserting in lieu thereof "sum of (A) the amount appropriated for the commodity supplemental food program and (B) the value of the additional commodities donated by the Secretary to State or local agencies for use in such program which are provided without charge against funds appropriated for such program and are included in food packages distributed to program particpants".

TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO THE TEMPORARY EMERGENCY FOOD ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1983 AND OTHER COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION PROVISIONS

Subtitle A—Amendments to the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983

EMERGENCY FEEDING ORGANIZATIONS—DEFINITIONS

SEC. 201. Section 201A of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by inserting, before the semicolon at the end of clause (1), the following: "(including the activities and project of charitable institutions, food banks, hunger centers, soup kitchens, and similar nonprofit eligible recipient agencies, hereinafter in this title referred to as 'emergency feeding organizations')".

DELETION OF PROVISIONS RELATING TO THE FOOD SECURITY WHEAT RESERVE

SEC. 202. (a) Section 202 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by—

(1) striking out the subsection designation for subsection (a); and

(2) repealing subsection (b).

(b) Section 203A of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by striking out", except that wheat from the Food Security Wheat Reserve may not be used to pay such costs" in the second sentence.

DELETION OF PROVISIONS RELATING TO PROCESSING AGREEMENTS

SEC. 203. (a) Section 203 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note), including the title thereto, is repealed.

(b) Section 203B(a) of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by striking out "and to private companies that process such commodities for eligible recipient agencies under sections 203 and 203A of this Act".

STATE COOPERATION

SEC. 204. Section 203B of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is further amended by adding, at the end thereof, a new section (d) as follows:

"(d) Each State agency receiving commodities under this title may (1) enter into cooperative agreements with other state agencies for joint provision of such commodities to an emergency feeding organization that serves needy persons in a single geographical area part of which is situated in each such State, or (2) transfer such commodities to any such emergency feeding organization in the other State under such agreement.".

AUTHORIZATION FOR FUNDING AND RELATED PROVISIONS

SEC. 205. Section 204 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by—

(1) redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d); and

(2) inserting, after subsection (b), a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c)(1) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated $50,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, and September 30, 1987, for the Secretary to make available to the States for State and local costs associated with the distribution of commodities by emergency feeding organizations under this title. Funds appropriated under this paragraph for any fiscal year shall be allocated to the States on an advance basis, dividing such funds among the States in the same proportions as the commodities distributed under this title for such fiscal year are divided among the States. If a State agency is unable to use all of its allocation, the Secretary shall reallocate such unused funds among the other States in the same manner as the original allocations were divided.

"(2) Each State shall make available, to emergency feeding organizations in the State, not less than 20 per centum of the funds provided as authorized in paragraph (1) of this section that it has been allocated for a fiscal year to pay for, or provide advance payments to cover, the direct expenses incurred by the emergency feeding organizations in distributing commodities to needy persons. As used in the preceding sentence, the term 'direct expenses' includes costs of transporting, storing, handling, and distributing commodities once they are received by the organization, costs associated with determinations of eligibility, verification, and documentation, costs involved in publishing announcements of times and locations of distribution, and costs of record-keeping, auditing, and other administrative procedures needed for participation in the program under this title. If a State makes a payment, using State funds, to cover direct expenses of emergency feeding organizations, the amount of such payment shall be included in calculating the amount a State must make available for direct expenses of emergency feeding organizations under this paragraph.

"(3) States to which funds, as authorized under paragraph (1) of this subsection, have been allotted for a fiscal year shall submit financial reports to the Secretary, on a regular basis, as to the use of such funds. No such funds may be used by the States for costs other than those involved in covering the expenses related to the distribution of commodities by emergency feeding organizations.".

REGULATIONS

SEC. 206. Section 210 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by—

(1) in subsection (c)—

(A) striking out "the fiscal years ending September 30, 1984, and September 30, 1985" and inserting in lieu thereof ", the period starting with the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and ending with the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987";

(B) striking out "prior to the beginning of the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985" and inserting in lieu thereof "as early as feasible but not later than the beginning of each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, September 30, 1986, and September 30, 1987"; and

(C) striking out "second twelve months" and inserting in lieu thereof "such fiscal year"; and

(2) adding, at the end thereof, a new subsection as follows:

"(d) The regulations issued by the Secretary under this section shall include provisions that set standards with respect to liability for commodity losses under the program under this title and conditions for payment to cover such losses, such provisions to take into consideration (1) the special needs and circumstances of emergency feeding organizations including use of volunteers, limited financial resources, and the effect that sanctions could have on the ability of such organizations to meet the food needs of low-income populations, and (2) situations in which there is no evidence of negligence, fraud, or continuing problems.".

PROGRAM TERMINATION

SEC. 207. Section 212 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note) is amended by striking out "September 30, 1985" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1987".

REPORT

SEC. 208. Not later than April 1, 1987, the Secretary of Agriculture shall report to Congress on the activities of the program conducted under the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 (7 U.S.C. 612c note). Such report shall include information on—

(1) the volume and types of commodities distributed under the program;

(2) the type of State and local agencies receiving commodities for distribution under the program;

(3) the populations served under the program and their characteristics;

(4) the Federal, State, and local costs of commodity distribution operations under the program (including transportation, storage, refrigeration, handling, distribution, and administrative costs); and

(5) the amount of Federal funds provided to cover State and local costs under the program.

Subtitle B—Commodity Distribution Amendments

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS COMMODITIES; PROCESSING AGREEMENTS

SEC. 211. Effective October 1, 1985, section 1114(a) of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 (7 U.S.C. 1431e) is amended by—

(1) redesignating the text thereof as paragraph (1);

(2) inserting "including, but not limited to, cheese, nonfat dry milk, and wheat," before "such commodities shall be" in the first sentence; and

(3) adding, at the end thereof, a new paragraph (2) as follows:

(2)(A) Effective through September 30, 1990, whenever a commodity is made available without charge or credit under any nutrition program administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary shall encourage consumption of such commodities through agreements with private companies under which the commodity is reprocessed into end-food products for use by eligible recipient agencies. The expenses of such reprocessing shall be paid by such eligible recipient agencies.

(B) To maintain eligibility to enter into, and to continue, any agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, a private company shall annually settle all accounts with the Secretary and any appropriate State agency regarding commodities processed under such agreements.".

TITLE III—FOOD, NUTRITION, AND CONSUMER EDUCATION

FINDINGS

SEC. 301. Congress finds that persons in households eligible for the food stamp program and other low-income persons, including those residing in rural areas, should have greater access to nutrition and consumer education to enable them to use their food budgets, including food assistance, effectively and to select and prepare foods that satisfy their nutritional needs and improve their diets.

PURPOSE

SEC. 302. The purpose of the program authorized by this title is to expand effective food, nutrition, and consumer education services to the greatest practicable number of low-income persons, including those participating in or eligible to participate in the food stamp program, to assist them to—

(1) increase their ability to manage their food budgets, including food stamps and other food assistance;

(2) advance their ability to buy food that satisfies nutritional needs and promotes good health; and

(3) better their food preparation, storage, safety, preservation, and sanitation practices.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 303. (a) Within the Department of Agriculture, the program authorized by this title shall be administered through the Extension Service in consultation with the Food and Nutrition Service, and the Human Nutrition Information Service. The Secretary of Agriculture (hereinafter in this title referred to as "the Secretary") shall ensure that the Extension Service coordinates activities carried out under this title with the ongoing food, nutrition, and consumer education activities of other agencies of the Department of Agriculture.

(b) The Secretary shall, by not later than April 1, 1989, submit to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate a report evaluating the effectiveness of the program authorized by this title.

STATE PARTICIPATION

SEC. 304. The cooperative extension services of the States shall, with funds made available under this title, carry out an expanded program of food, nutrition, and consumer education for low-income persons in a manner designed to achieve the purpose set forth in section 302 of this title. In operating the program, the cooperative extension services may use the expanded food and nutrition education program and other food, nutrition, and consumer education activities of the cooperative extension services or carried out by them in collaboration with other public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations. In carrying out their responsibilities under the program, the cooperative extension services are encouraged to—

(1) provide effective and meaningful food, nutrition, and consumer education services to as many low-income persons as possible;

(2) employ educational methodologies, including innovative approaches, that accomplish the purpose of this title; and

(3) to the extent practicable, coordinate activities carried out under the program with the delivery to low-income persons of benefits under food assistance programs.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 305. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Agriculture to carry out the program under this title not to exceed, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $5,000,000; for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, $6,000,000; and for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1988, September 30, 1989, and September 30, 1990, $8,000,000.

(b) Any funds appropriated annually under this section shall be allocated in the manner specified in section 1425(c)(2) (A) and (B) of the National Agricultural Research, Extension, and Teaching Policy Act of 1977.

(c) Any funds appropriated under this section shall supplement any other funds appropriated to the Department of Agriculture for use by the Department and the cooperative extension services for food, nutrition, and consumer education for low-income households.

SECTION-BY-SECTION EXPLANATION

TITLE I—FOOD STAMP AND RELATED PROVISIONS

Eligibility of the homeless

Section 101(a) amends section 3(i) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 ("the Act") to make clear that individuals who do not reside in permanent dwellings or who have no fixed address (the homeless) are eligible to participate in the Food Stamp Program.

Section 101(b) amends section 11(e) of the Act to require State agencies to provide a method for certifying and issuing coupons to such individuals while ensuring that only those who are eligible are allowed to participate in the program.

Thrifty food plan

Section 102 amends section 3(o) of the Act to conform benefits more closely with actual food prices. At present, food stamp benefit levels—which are based on the cost of purchasing food using the Agriculture Department's Thrifty Food Plan—are adjusted each October to reflect changes in food prices through the immediately preceding June. The amendment would require that each October's adjustment reflect: (1) food-price changes through the immediately preceding June; and (2) the Agriculture Department's best projection of food price changes through September.

In addition, the amendment would make a technical correction in the Act's definition of the Thrifty Food Plan used to establish benefit levels. The ages of the adults in the reference family used to establish basic benefit levels would be changed to 20-50 years rather than 20-54 years, in order to correspond to the age categories used by the National Academy of Science/National Research Council in developing the "Recommended Dietary Allowances" (RDAs) that are the basis of the Thrifty Food Plan.

Definitions of disabled

Section 103 amends section 3(r) of the Act to include in the definition of "disabled"—and, consequently, make eligible for special treatment in determining eligibility and benefits—four new categories of persons:

Those disabled who receive State-financed Supplemental Security Income (SSI) payments, but do not receive the basic Federal SSI benefit, as long as the benefits are determined to be conditioned on meeting at least the Social Security disability criteria used for Federal SSI benefits, or are benefits granted to those who qualified under pre-SSI programs for aid to the permanently and totally disabled or blind;

Recipients of public disability retirement pensions who have a disability considered permanent under Social Security disability rules;

Veterans receiving pensions for nonservice connected disability; and Railroad retirement disability annuitants who must meet the Social Security disability test in order to receive their annuity or qualify for Medicare.

State and local sales taxes

Section 104 amends section 4(a) of the Act to prohibit, effective in FY 1988, the collection by any State or locality of sales taxes on food stamp purchases if it opts for a Food Stamp Program. Currently, either State or local sales taxes are imposed on food stamp purchases in about 20 States.

Relation of Food Stamp and Commodity Distribution Programs

Section 105 amends section 4(b) of the Act to eliminate the current ban in the Food Stamp Act on the distribution of Federally donated foods in jurisdictions that operate the Food Stamp Program. This would be consistent with legislation governing the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program (TEFAP) and would allow jurisdictions to concurrently operate programs like TEFAP and the Food Stamp Program. The current law ban on joint receipt by any household of food stamps and commodities distributed through the needy family program (primarily administered on Indian reservations) would be retained.

Categorical eligibility

Section 106 amends section 5 of the Act to make categorically eligible to participate in the Food Stamp Program households each of whose members either receive benefits under the program for Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) or receive Supplemental Security Income (SSI), but not those whose food stamp benefits have been "cashed out" or whose participation is precluded because of unlawful activity. This section also amends section 11(i) of the act to make clear that denial of eligibility for or termination from either AFDC or SSI cannot be an automatic basis for denial of eligibility for or termination from the Food Stamp Program.

Excluded income

Section 107(a) amends section 5 of the Act to make clear that the portion of any Federal Pell Grant not used for tuition and mandatory school fees is to be counted as income for food stamp purposes. No portion of a Pell Grant could be disregarded as a "reimbursement".

It would also allow recipients of educational grants, loans, scholarships, and the like to have the portion of their grant, loan, or scholarship used for tuition and mandatory fees disregarded for food stamp purposes, regardless of whether the institution requires a high school diploma as a prerequisite for attendance.

Finally, it would make clear that any origination fees or insurance premiums that reduce the amount of a student loan would not be counted as income for food stamp purposes.

Section 107(b) amends section 5 of the Act to make clear that benefits provided to third parties ("vendor payments") on behalf of food stamp households by the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program, and by State and local governments through their general assistance programs, are to be counted as income for food stamp purposes as long as they are part of regular grants for day-to-day living expenses. Certain types of vendor payments would continue to be excluded: medical assistance, child-care assistance, aid provided by housing authorities, and emergency and special assistance above normal grant levels.

Section 107(b) also amends section 5 of the Act to require that earnings received by participants in a Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) program be counted as earned income for food stamp purposes. Incentive allowances and expense-related reimbursements of payments would continue to be disregarded.

Deductions from income

Section 108 amends section 5(e) of the Act to—

(1) Conform Consumer Price Index references in the Act to current Bureau of Labor Statistics methodology. At present, when the Consumer Price Index for all urban consumers (CPI-U) is used to adjust various eligibility and benefit determinants in the Food Stamp Program (e.g., the limit on deductible shelter expenses), changes in costs related to "homeownership" are not considered. Current Bureau of Labor Statistics methodology in computing the CPI-U separates what was, until recently, "homeownership" costs into two categories—homeowner's costs and maintenance and repair costs—and the amendment would make a technical correction to recognize this.

(2) Increase from 18 to 20 percent the amount of earned income that is deducted from household income in determining a household's income for program purposes, (the so-called "earned income deduction");

(3) Effective in FY 1986, increase the maximum combined deduction allowed for excess shelter and/or dependent care costs to $155;

(4) Effective in FY 1987, establish separate dependent care and excess shelter expense deductions to replace the combined deduction currently allowed for these purposes. This amendment would cap the dependent care deduction at $160 a month, and utilize the level established for the combined deduction in FY 1986 ($155 adjusted for inflation) as the maximum for the separate excess shelter expense deduction;

(5) Change the threshold for elderly and disabled households to qualify for a medical deduction from $35 a month to the lesser of 5 percent of gross income or $35 a month. This would make the food stamp threshold for a medical hardship deduction consistent with that utilized in the Federal income tax code;

(6) Make clear that payments made to energy suppliers on behalf of recipient households through the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) cannot be considered when determining whether and how much a household may deduct as an excess shelter expense. It would also stipulate that, to the extent a recipient household still has out-of-pocket utility expenses despite a LIHEAP payment to its supplier, it would be allowed to claim those expenses as a potential shelter-expense deduction. States would also be allowed to ease their administrative burden in dealing with LIHEAP recipients on behalf of whom a payment is made and have out-of-pocket expenses by utilizing a "standard utility allowance."

Optional monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting

Section 109 amends sections 5(f) and 6(c) of the Act to restore the State option to elect whether, in calculating household income, a prospective or retrospective basis is to be used for certain households. Monthly reporting would also be made a State option. Each State could choose whether it would utilize either, both, or neither of these procedures.

Disaster task force

Section 110 amends section 5(h) of the Act to provide that the Secretary shall (1) establish a Food Stamp Disaster Task Force to assist States in implementing and operating the disaster program and the regular Food Stamp Program in the disaster area, and (2) send members of such task force to the disaster area as soon as possible after the disaster occurs to provide direct assistance to State and local officials.

Resources limitation

Section 111 amends section 5(g) of the Act to:

Raise the overall liquid assets limitations on eligible households;

Phase in an increase in the extent to which the value of automobiles is disregarded in the assets test;

Provide that property related to the maintenance of otherwise excluded vehicles (e.g., vehicles used to produce income) is to be disregarded in the assets test; and Allow existing rules governing the type of assets considered to be "inaccessible", and therefore not counted, to be revised.

Effective in FY 1987, the overall liquid assets limitations would be raised from $1,500 to $2,250 for the majority of households. For those households with one or more members, at least one of whom is elderly, the limitation would be raised from $3,000 to $3,500.

The extent to which the fair market value of an otherwise countable automobile is disregarded in the liquid assets test for eligibility would be increased each October 1, beginning in October 1986, to reflect any increase in the Consumer Price Index component for used cars during the previous year. Under existing law, the first $4,500 of fair market value is disregarded. The amendment would allow that limit to increase annually each October, to a ceiling of $5,500 per vehicle.

To the extent that any real or personal property is directly related to the maintenance and use of a licensed vehicle that is used to produce earned income or transport a disabled person, it would be excluded from consideration as a liquid asset for food stamp purposes, just as the vehicle itself is now excluded.

The rule in existing law that food stamp assets limitations may not be changed from those set forth in the regulations in effect as of June 1982 would be waived to the extent necessary to allow the Secretary to revise current regulations dealing with "inaccessible" assets. This would allow the Secretary to change regulations so as to ensure that property that was formerly excluded as income-producing property will continue to be excluded as an asset to the extent that an encumbrance such as a lien prevents its disposal and conversion to a liquid asset. This rule is now applied to inaccessible assets such as irrevocable trust funds, security depositis on rental properties or utilities, property in probate, and property which a household is making a good faith effort to sell at a reasonable price.

Eligibility disqualifications

Section 112(1) amends section 6(d) of the Act to limit the circumstances under which an entire food stamp household is disqualified for failure to fulfill requirements to register for work, participate in an employment program, or accept a suitable job offer.

Under existing law, failure to comply with work requirements by any household member subject to them disqualifies the entire household. Those subject to food stamp work requirements are: able-bodied members between 18 and 60 years of age who are not working (or employed less than 30 hours a week or the minimum-wage equivalent), unless they are caring for a child under age 6, are an otherwise eligible student (i.e., working, have a dependent child under age 6, or in receipt of Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) benefits), or are residents of a drug addiction or alcoholic treatment program.

The amendment would require disqualification of the entire food stamp household if the head of the household fails to fulfill food stamp work requirements. If another member subject to the requirements fails to comply, that member would be disqualified, not the entire household. This change would conform food stamp practice with that in the AFDC program.

Section 112(2) amends section 6(e) of the Act to waive application of the Act's special rules governing the eligibility of post-secondary students in the case of persons assigned to post-secondary institutions for training under the programs of the Job Training and Partnership Act.

Section 112(3) would remove an unworkable exception from the special student rules now granted to students with children between ages 6 and 12 who cannot find adequate child care. Under existing law, post-secondary students meeting the normal income and assets eligibility tests are ineligible unless they are working half-time or more, have children under age 6, are recipients of AFDC benefits, or have children between ages 6 and 12 for whom no adequate child care is available.

Section 112(4) amends section 6(f) of the Act to replace an out-of-date reference to a section (203(a)(7)) of the Immigration and Nationality Act with the correct reference (sections 207 and 208), and make two additional technical corrections to conform the language used in the Food Stamp Act to that used in the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Employment programs

Section 113 amends section 6(d)(1) of the Act to mandate, for the first time, that all States must have an employment program consisting of job search, job finding clubs, work, training, education directly related to employability, or some other related approach. States would have considerable flexibility to determine which programs to operate and which employable participants are included. Fundamental client protections are provided, including reimbursement for job search expenses. Increased Federal grant money would be available to fund these programs, and, beyond that, matching funding would be available if the grants are not sufficient.

It would also make clear that disqualification for failure to meet any employment requirements ends when the requirement has been complied with, or after 2 months, and end disqualification of a household if the member who caused the disqualification has left.

Staggering of coupon issuance

Section 114 amends section 7 of the Act to provide that State agencies may implement a procedure for staggering the issuance of food stamps throughout the month. They would be required to assure that, in the transition to new procedures, no household experiences an interval between issuances longer than 35 days, either by adjusting their regular issuance cycles gradually or by using supplemental issuances.

It would also provide that, for all applicant households applying late in the month (after the 15th), benefits for the first full month after application must be issued at the beginning of the month, or 5 days after any needed verification has been completed, even if the regular or staggered issuance cycle would dictate issuance later in the month.

Disclosure of information submitted by retail stores

Section 115 amends section 9(c) of the Act to permit the disclosure of information retail food stores submit for food stamp purposes to State agencies that administer the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children (WIC). This would allow use of the information in monitoring retail store compliance with WIC rules.

Food stamp redemption by Federal credit unions.

Section 116 amends section 10 of the Act to permit federally insured credit unions which have wholesale or retail grocers within their field of membership to redeem food stamps. This provision strictly limits the number of credit unions which might offer redemption services by requiring that each institution must be regulated by the National Credit Union Administration, meets insurance requirements under the Federal Credit Union Act, and has wholesale or retail grocers in its specified field of membership.

Charges for redemption of coupons

Section 117 amends section 10 of the Act to provide that no financial institution may impose on or collect from a retail food store a fee or other charge for the redemption of coupons that are submitted to the financial institution in a manner consistent with the requirements, other than any requirements relating to the cancellation of coupons, for the presentation of coupons by financial institutions to the Federal Reserve Banks. The Secretary, in consultation with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, would issue regulations implementing this provision.

Program information

Section 118 amends sections 11(e) and 16(a) of the Act to authorize 50 percent Federal matching funds for State agency activities to inform unemployed, elderly, and disabled persons about the availability of and qualifications requirements for the Food Stamp Program. Such efforts would be required to be specifically directed at these target populations.

Office hours

Section 119 amends section 11(e) of the Act to require States to regularly assess the need for operating food stamp offices during evening and weekend hours, taking into consideration the number within the area served who are working or looking for work during normal office hours.

Retail food stores and wholesale food concerns

Section 120 amends section 12 of the Act to convert any disqualification of a retail food store into a civil money penalty when the disqualified store is sold or transferred before the disqualification period is completed. The amount of the payment would be calculated in a manner similar to the manner civil penalties levied in lieu of disqualifications are now determined: i.e., multiply 10 percent of monthly food stamp redemptions times the number of months remaining in the disqualification period. For the purpose of this new provision, permanent disqualification would be assumed to be 20 years.

State agency liability; quality control; automatic data processing

Section 121(a) amends section 16 of the Act to—

(1) Require States to submit error rate information expeditiously to permit the Secretary to speed up the collection of sanctions owed by the States due to high error rates in benefit payments. The Secretary would be required, to the maximum extent feasible, to establish claims and initiate collections by the start of the fourth quarter of the fiscal year following the fiscal year for which State performance is being measured. Under this provision, the States' current rights to appeal error rate determinations made by the Secretary, including current procedures that allow for arbitration of disputes at the national office of the Food and Nutrition Service, would be maintained;

(2) permit States to gain suspension of up to 15 percent of error rate sanctions imposed for any fiscal year if they agree to apply these funds to error reduction efforts, such as increased staffing levels or increased computerization, that are above and beyond current efforts or planned activities. Suspension of the sanctions would be subject to the Secretary's approval of the error reduction efforts and his certification that they represent efforts above and beyond what otherwise might be expected from the State. If States fail to implement the agreed upon efforts to reduce errors within 6 months of the time frame established with the Secretary, the suspended sanctions would be reinstated.

Section 121(b) amends section 11 of the Act to—

(1) requre the Secretary, in consultation with the States, to develop a model plan for comprehensive computerization of the Food Stamp Program. Any State developing a computer plan approved by the Secretary that would result in a State's computer system satisfying the model plan would qualify for 90 percent matching funds, rather than the normal 75 percent matching funds, for computer planning, development and installation;

(2) Require the Secretary to provide to Congress by April 1, 1987 a report that analyzes and evaluates the degree and sufficiency of computerization in each State. Based upon its findings, the Secretary would be authorized to mandate computerization to the degree necessary in States where the lack of automated data processing seriously hampers program integrity or accountability.

Pilot projects

Section 122(a) amends section 17(b) of the Act to extend the authorization to operate several special pilot projects involving payment of food stamp benefits in cash to eligible households all of whose members are either age 65 or over or recipients of Supplemental Security Income (SSI) benefits. Authority for these projects is now scheduled to terminate in September 1985; the amendment would allow them to continue through fiscal year 1989, if a State operating one so requests.

Section 122(b) amends section 17(d) of the Act to require the Secretary, upon the request of a political jurisdiction operating a simplified application project, to grant an extension of the project if he finds the project has a beneficial effect on program administrative costs and error rates, without adding undue costs.

Authorization ceilings; authority to reduce benefits

Section 123 amends section 18 of the Act to—

(1) Extend the authorization for appropriations as follows: $13,484,000,000 for FY 1986, $14,468,000,000 for FY 1987, $15,396,000,000 for FY 1988, $16,507,000,000 for FY 1989, and $17,713,000,000 for FY 1990;

(2) Require the Secretary to reduce food stamp benefits in a fiscal year only upon a determination that the authorization level for that year, rather than the appropriation level, is insufficient to allow full benefits to be paid to all participants throughout that fiscal year. Any benefit reduction ordered by the Secretary would be implemented to the degree necessary to keep program costs for that year within the authorization, rather than appropriation, level;

(3) Remove the authority for the Secretary to reduce allotments under section 18(b) in any year in which the national unemployment rate exceeds 9 percent in any month.

Puerto Rico

Section 124 amends section 19 of the Act to revise 3 existing provisions affecting Puerto Rico's nutrition assistance block grant:

The current noncash assistance requirement, now scheduled to be implemented in October 1985, would be repealed, allowing the Commonwealth to determine the form of assistance under its block grant program;

The current requirement that the Commonwealth pay 50 percent of administrative costs matched under the block grant would be deleted; and

The current requirement that the Commonwealth use a single State agency to administer its nutrition assistance program would be deleted.

The amendment would also adjust the amount of the Puerto Rico nutrition assistance block grant, now set at $825 million annually, to $862 million in FY 1987, $898 million in FY 1988, $936 million in FY 1989, and $974 million in FY 1990.

Commodity Distribution Programs

Section 125(a) amends Section 4(a) of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 to extend the authority of the Department to operate the Commodity Distribution Program through Fiscal Year 1989. This program includes distribution to institutions, supplemental food programs, disaster areas, summer camps for children, the United States Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and Indians. This section also amends section 4(b) of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 to make eligibility requirements for the Commodity Distribution Program for Summer Camps and the Summer Food Service Program for Children more consistent.

Section 125(b) amends section 5 of the Agriculture and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 to authorize the continuation of the Commodity Supplemental Food Program through FY 1989, extend current law with regard to the distribution of administrative funds for operation of the program, and direct that the three areas currently distributing commodities to low income elderly persons be permitted to continue such distribution.

In addition, the section requires the Secretary to approve applications from areas not currently operating a CSFP program to the extent that the program's appropriation allows, so long as this does not require reductions in actual participation levels in areas now in the program. The Secretary is also directed to notify potentially eligible CSFP agencies in areas covered neither by a WIC or a CSFP program of the existence of the CSFP program and its application procedures.

TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO THE TEMPORARY EMERGENCY FOOD ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1983 AND OTHER COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION PROVISIONS

Subtitle A—Amendments to the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983

Emergency feeding organizations—Definitions

Section 201 amends section 201 of the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Act of 1983 ("the Act") to incorporate the term "emergency feeding organizations", and defines such organizations to include charitable institutions, food banks, hunger centers, soup kitchens, and similar non-profit eligible recipient agencies providing nutrition assistance to relieve situations of emergency and distress through the provision of food to needy persons, including low-income and unemployed persons.

Deletion of provisions relating to the Food Security Wheat Reserve

Section 202 repeals subsection 202(b) of the Act which authorizes the use of wheat from the Food Security Wheat Reserve for TEFAP. It also eliminates language in section 203A of the Act referring to wheat from the Food Security Wheat Reserve. Stocks of wheat have been available from the regular CCC holdings and the Secretary has not utilized wheat from the reserve in the past. USDA projections of CCC stocks for the next two years indicate that increasing amounts of wheat are likely to be available.

Deletion of provisions relating to processing agreements

Section 203 repeals section 203 of the Act, which requires that whenever commodities are made available without charge or credit to any nutrition program, the Secretary shall encourage consumption of such bonus commodities by making agreements with private companies for reprocessing of such commodities into end-use food products (e.g. providing cheese and flour to processors to make into pizzas) for recipient programs. It also eliminates the subsection 203B(a) of the Act reference to private companies that process commodities. These repealed provisions are applicable to bonus commodity use for school nutrition and other meal service programs rather than for TEFAP distributions. (Note: Section 211 of this bill would extend the current law provisions governing national commodity processing. Section 203 simply deletes this provision from the TEFAP law.)

State cooperation

Section 204 amends section 203B to add language allowing States to enter into cooperative agreements with each other in order to accommodate commodity distribution by emergency feeding organizations that serve needy populations in contiguous areas which cross State borders. This provision gives States the flexibility to work out arrangements for joint distributions of commodities in cases where a food bank, or other local distributing agency serves the food needs of persons residing in areas which cross State lines (e.g. D.C., and suburban Virginia and Maryland).

Authorization for funding and related provisions

Section 205 amends section 204 of the Act to add a new subsection authorizing appropriations of $50 million for each of fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for State and local costs associated with commodity distribution by emergency feeding organizations. It requires that funds appropriated under this authority be allocated to States on an advance basis under the same allotment formula as is used by the Secretary to determine each State's share of commodities. (Currently, commodities are allocated to States on the basis of poverty and unemployed population with 60% weighting on poverty and 40% weighting on unemployment.) It requires the Secretary to reallocate funds periodically if State agencies are unable to spend all of their allocation. It requires regular financial reporting by States on the use of funds, and prohibits the use of Federal funds for costs other than those needed to cover expenses related to the use and distribution of commodities by emergency feeding organizations.

This section also requires States to provide not less than 20% of their allocated funds to pay or make advance payments to emergency feeding organizations for direct expenses associated with local agency distribution of commodities to needy persons. States may count toward this 20% minimum any payments they make to cover emergency feeding organizations' direct expenses. Direct expenses of emergency feeding organizations are defined to include such agencies' costs of transporting, storing, handling and distributing commodities once they are received from the State; costs associated with determinations of eligibility, verification and documentation; costs of publishing announcements of times and locations of distributions; and costs of recordkeeping, auditing and other program administrative procedures required for program participation.

These provisions are designed to improve the allotment of funds to States and local agencies so that both will have greater certainty about the amount of Federal funds available to them than is the case under the current reimbursement system. Under these revisions States will receive their grant allotment up front. Consequently, they will know exactly how much funding they have, and will find it easier to advance funds to local agencies, many of whom do not have the financial resources to lay out their own funds in advance to cover their local expenses, or to wait the long periods often required under the reimbursement system. In all instances however, the amount of administrative funding provided cannot exceed actual costs of State and local agencies and these costs must be documented.

Regulations

Section 206 extends subsection 210(c) of the Act to require that the Secretary publish in the Federal Register an estimate of the type and quantity of commodities that are likely to be made available for distribution under the program for each of fiscal years 1986 and 1987. Such estimates are to be published as soon as possible, but no later than September 30, 1985, for FY 1986 and no later than September 30, 1986, for FY 1987. The current law proviso that the actual type and quantity of commodities made available under the Act may differ from these estimates is retained.

Also this section amends section 210 to add a provision requiring the Secretary to set standards for commodity losses and conditions of repayment for participating agencies. These standards should reflect the special needs and circumstances of emergency feeding organizations. Such standards are to relate to situations where there is no evidence of negligence, fraud or continuing problems, and consider the special problems of emergency feeding organizations with respect to use of volunteers, limited financial resources, and the potential that sanctions will impair their ability to meet the food needs of low-income populations.

Program termination

Section 207 amends section 212 of the Act to extend the program through FY 1987.

Report

Section 208 adds a new section to require the Secretary of Agriculture to provide Congress with a report on the activities of TEFAP. This report is to include information on the volume and types of commodities distributed under the program; the types of State and local agencies receiving TEFAP commodities; the populations served and their characteristics; the Federal, State and local costs of commodity distribution operations, (including transportation, storage, refrigeration, handling, and distribution, and administrative costs of operation), and the amount of Federal funds provided to address such State and local costs. The Secretary is required to provide Congress with a final report on the program no later than April 1, 1987.

Subtitle B—Commodity Distribution Amendments

Bonus commodities

Section 211 amends section 1114 of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 to extend the requirement that whenever the Secretary determines that commodities are acquired under price support are not likely to be sold by the Commodity Credit Corporation or otherwise used in programs of commodity sale or distribution. These commodities must be made available without charge or credit to elderly feeding and child nutrition programs and certain food banks. If the Secretary determines that cheese, nonfat dry milk and wheat are not otherwise likely to be sold or distributed, he must distribute these commodities, but is not limited to distributing these commodities only.

This section also continues the current law provision of P.L. 98-92 to require the Secretary to encourage consumption of bonus commodities through agreements with private companies (often referred to as National Commodity Processing). In addition, a new requirement is placed on participating private companies requiring them, as a condition of continued eligibility, to settle all accounts with the Secretary and State agencies regarding commodities processed under such agreements.

TITLE III—FOOD, NUTRITION, AND CONSUMER EDUCATION

Findings

Section 301 states that Congress finds that persons in households eligible for the food stamp program and other low-income persons, including those residing in rural areas, should have greater access to nutrition and consumer education to enable them to use their food budgets, including food assistance, effectively and to select and prepare foods that satisfy their nutritional needs and improve their diets.

Purpose

Section 302 provides that the purpose of the program authorized by the title is to expand effective food, nutrition, and consumer education services to the greatest practicable number of low-income persons, including those participating in or eligible to participate in the food stamp program, to assist them to—

(1) increase their ability to manage their food budgets, including food stamps and other food assistance;

(2) advance their ability to buy food that satisfies nutritional needs and promotes good health; and

(3) better their food preparation, storage, safety, preservation, and sanitation practices.

Administration

Section 303(a) provides that within the Department of Agriculture the program authorized by the title shall be administered through the Extension Service in consultation with Food and Nutrition Service, and the Human Nutrition Information Service. The Secretary of Agriculture shall assure that the Extension Service coordinates activities carried out under the title with the ongoing food, nutrition, and consumer education activities of other agencies of the Department of Agriculture.

Section 303(b) provides that the Secretary shall, by not later than April 1, 1989, submit to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate a report evaluating the effectiveness of the program authorized by the title.

State participation

Section 304 provides that the cooperative extension services of the States shall, with funds made available under the title carry out an expanded program of food, nutrition, and consumer education for low-income persons in a manner designed to achieve the purpose set forth in section 302. In operating the program, the cooperative extension services may utilize the expanded food and nutrition education program and other food, nutrition, and consumer education activities of the cooperative extension services or carried out by them in collaboration with other public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations. In carrying out their responsibilities under the program, the cooperative extension services are encouraged to:

(1) provide effective and meaningful food, nutrition, and consumer education services to as many low-income persons as possible;

(2) employ educational methodologies, including innovative approaches, that accomplish the purpose of the title; and

(3) to the extent practicable, coordinate activities carried out under the program with the delivery to low-income persons of benefits under food assistance programs.

Authorization for appropriations

Section 305(a) provides that there are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Agriculture to carry out the program under the title not to exceed, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, $5,000,000; for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, $6,000,000; and for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1988, September 30, 1989, and September 30, 1990, $8,000,000.

Section 305(b) provides that any funds appropriated annually under section 305 shall be allocated in the manner specified in section 1425(c)(2)(A) and (B) of the National Agricultural Research, Extension, and Teaching Policy Act of 1977.

Section 305(c) provides that any funds appropriated under the section shall supplement any other funds appropriated to the Department of Agriculture for use by the Department and the cooperative extension services for food, nutrition, and consumer education for low-income households.●

IN SUPPORT OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 145

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Resolution 145, a resolution praising President Duarte of El Salvador for his efforts in directing the recent immunization campaign in his country.

I wish also to join with my colleagues in saluting the author of this resolution, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Smith] for his initiative in calling to the attention of this body the outstanding efforts of President Duarte in improving the health of Salvadoran society.

The efforts represented by this immunization campaign demonstrate President Duarte's dedication to the improvement of the basic human needs of his people. Certainly, the effort to improve the health and life expectancy of the hundreds of thousands of young Salvadorans is a significant accomplishment in a country trying to overcome serious economic and political difficulties and an ongoing guerrilla war directed from outside El Salvador. President Duarte deserves great credit for all his efforts during his short Presidency to improve the economy of his nation, strengthen the democratic principles of his government, and protect the human rights of his people.

I join my colleagues in praising President Duarte and urge strong support for this resolution.●

1247. A letter from the Director, Information Security Oversight Office, General Services Administration, transmitting an information copy of the Information Security Oversight Office's Annual Report to the President for fiscal year 1984; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1248. A letter from the Clerk, U.S. Claims Court, transmitting a certified copy of the court's judgment order of April 25, 1985, entering judgment for the plaintiffs in Minnesota Chippewa Tribe et al. v. The United States, Docket No. 188; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

1249. A letter from the Acting Director, Office of Personnel Management, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend title 5, United States Code, to ensure the equitable application of a General Schedule alternative plan to certain other Federal employees, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

1250. A letter from the Secretary, Department of Transportation, transmitting the 1985 Annual Report on Highway Safety Improvement Programs, covering the Rail-Highway Crossings, Hazard Elimination, and the Pavement Marking Demonstration Programs, pursuant to Public Law 98-87, section 203(e) (94 Stat. 2245); to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

1251. A letter from the Acting Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting the fiscal year 1986 General Services Administration [GSA] Public Buildings Service Design Program (Budget Activity 90) for repair and alteration projects, including a prospectus and project descriptions, pursuant to Public Law 86-249, section 7(a) (86 Stat. 217); to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

1252. A letter from the Administrator, Veterans Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal the congressional report and waiting period requirements, contained in 38 U.S.C. section 210(b)(2), which apply to certain internal VA administrative reorganizations; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

1253. A letter from the Administrator, Veterans Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend title 38 of the United States Code to provide for the right of the United States to collect the costs of hospital, nursing home, or outpatient medical care furnished by the Veterans' Administration to veterans with no service-connected disabilities to the extent that they have health insurance or similar contracts or rights with respect to such care and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

1254. A letter from the Deputy Administrator, Veterans Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend title 38, United States Code, to require formal advertising for contracts for services or supplies for the Veterans' Administration's Loan Guaranty Program if the contract amount exceeds $25,000; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

1255. A letter from the Assistant Secretary for Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs, Department of State, transmitting a report on the origin, contents, destination, and disposition of all humanitarian goods and supplies transported to countries in Central America, pursuant to Public Law 95-525, section 1540(e) (98 Stat. 2638); jointly, to the Committees of Armed Services and Foreign Affairs.

1256. A letter from the Assistant Secretary for Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs, Department of State, transmitting copy of the President's Determination 85-10, signed April 2, 1985, that it is vital to U.S. national security interests to use AECA funds under the special authority of section 614 of the FAA of 1961, to furnish military assistance to Haiti, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 2364(a)(2); jointly, to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Appropriations.

1257. A letter from the Under Secretary for Security Assistance, Science and Technology, Department of State, transmitting notification that implementation of the fiscal year 1985 Peacekeeping Operations [PKO] Program will require revision in the amount of funds allocated for the Caribbean Peacekeeping Force [CPF], pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 2413(a); jointly, to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Appropriations.

1258. A letter from the Secretary, Department of Transportation, transmitting the annual report, covering calendar year 1984, on all the recommendations received from the National Transportation Safety Board, and responses thereto, pursuant to Public Law 93-633, section 307(b) (95 Stat. 1066); jointly, to the Committees on Energy and Commerce, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and Public Works and Transportation.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR.: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 1806. A bill to recognize the organization known as the Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War 1861-1865; with an amendment (Rept. No. 99-70). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TANCREDO NEVES AND HIS LEGACY TO BRAZILIAN DEMOCRACY

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, Latin America has lost a great leader who exemplified the democratic tradition of millions of people. The President-elect of Brazil, Tancredo Neves, was chosen to head the first Brazilian civilian government in 21 years. But on the eve of his inauguration, Mr. Neves was hospitalized. After several operations and complications, he died on April 21.

Mr. Neves was a political veteran of 40 years. He personified the dreams of 130 million people who, while anxious for a democratic government, recognized the challenges and difficulties that it would have to confront. I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Neves during his trip to Washington last March. We discussed his views on the future of democracy not only in Brazil, but throughout the entire hemisphere. His death is a terrible loss to his country and the world, but his legacy lives on. I would like to share with my colleagues several articles that appeared in the press on Mr. Neves and his democratic legacy.

The articles follow:

When a Good Democrat Dies in Latin America

(By Meg Greenfield)

The death of Tancredo Neves—the 75-year-old man who was elected president of Brazil but taken mortally ill before he could be sworn in—will strike many people here as a kind of freak accident, an antic turn of fate. In Brazil it will be regarded differently—as a cosmic art of cruelty and injustice. Something akin to exultation marked that country's attitude toward its return to civilian democratic rule this winter, and something akin to reverence had come to mark its feeling for Neves, who had done so much to help accomplish the transformation. Late last month when I was in Brazil, between the second and third of what were to be seven operations on poor Neves, two emotions seemed to prevail. One was dejection that Neves was so sick; the other was determination that the democratic constitutional order should survive, no matter what happened to the ailing president.

You heard this determination expressed everywhere. And you heard comparable commitments to a new effort at democracy throughout the hemisphere. In fact, the parts of South America I visited—Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Peru—seemed to be experiencing a kind of frenzy of democratic politics, an overwhelming rush of excitement at the return of civilian government after a prolonged spell of military rule and roughly half a century of instability and coups and tugging and hauling among strongmen and charismatic loonies and such normal democrats as from time to time held away. Both Brazil's misfortune and its coming effort to hold the new democracy together in trying times and under a far less popular leader than Neves can only be understood in this larger context.

In a way the political frenzy put me in mind of Spain and Portugal a decade ago. There too you could see Catholic countries coming out of 50 years of authoritarian rule with an exuberance for democracy and a gift for it that confounded expectation. (The political pin-up boy of the South American countries I visited by the way, frequently mentioned as an example for newly liberated Latin politicians, is the young, pragmatic Socialist prime minister of Spain, Felipe Gonzalez. His is considered to be a success story in overcoming some of the same obstacles now facing his South American counterparts.) But in some ways I was more powerfully reminded of post-colonial Third World countries than I was of Spain and Portugal. It is as if these places are coming out of colonialism. There is a comparable kind of spirit in the air.

There are also, of course, comparable troubles. Recently in Uruguay, Argentina and Brazil, and a little farther back in Peru, military governments were eased or shoved out not because (as some of them claimed) they had achieved the stability and security for the country that was their only goal in taking power, but rather because they had fouled up. This was especially true in relation to the wrecked economies over which they had presided. So now you have a difficult situation in all these Latin countries that is very similar to one that has afflicted many countries newly freed from colonial control: There is elation that the old order is gone, but the rewards of the new order seem nonexistent. The first call of the democratically elected government must be for cutbacks and sacrifices to achieve economic stability and pay off the errors and aggrandizements of the past. In Zimbabwe or Brazil it is the same in this respect: "Welcome to democratic self-rule. It is going to cost you plenty. There may be no material improvements at all to show for it for years to come. Your government will be busy undoing past damage and demonstrating to other countries that it is responsible. Isn't freedom wonderful?"

The added difficulty is that once the strongman government is gone, labor unions and other economic and social groups feel safer in demanding better wages and fuller benefits, which run directly counter to civilian government's austerity programs. So the people who run those civilian governments require extraordinary personal authority to generate the required painful support for their policies. It was thought that Tancredo Neves had such authority, which is why his death was so especially cruel for Brazilians and why his successor, Jose Sarney, faces such a formidable challenge. But in fact any president of Brazil (or Argentina or Peru or even Uruguay with its longer, though interrupted democratic tradition) would find this a challenge. That is because much of the instability of recent decades in South America, the social and political turmoil of the region, is due to a very thin and chancy sense of the legitimacy of government institutions in the first place.

In Brazil people cling tenaciously these days to the word and letter of the constitution, citing it literally to answer perplexities. It is as if there were no larger, informal understanding of where authority lies and how it works and actually there is none. In Argentina it is being severely questioned whether the present government has the mandate or the strength to do any of the things it considers essential to governing. Taxes are a joke in many of these countries. A huge "informal" sector exists in Peru, which means huge numbers of poor people appropriate land, build unauthorized hovels on it, steal electricity off main lines to light and power it and then just settle in. The independent, roving band is a model of enterprise and settlement in many places on the continent. The history of one system's displacing another over the years in politics has made all of them suspect and weak. The toughest job facing all of these new governments is that of establishing its own legitimacy and thus its claim on the loyalty of its citizens, its claim, at the simplest level, to be listened to.

That, interestingly, is what Tancredo Neves had managed, all but miraculously, to establish in Brazil. And that is why his death is so consequential. It's not that people fear a grab to retrieve power by the military there. It's that they fear no one else has Neves' authority or his presumed legitimacy with the people. This is a problem—the problem—for all the newly elected democratic governments of South America.

The Legacy of Brazilian Democracy Survives the Death of Neves

(by Alan Riding)

Brazilia, April 23.—Even though Brazil's late President-elect, Tancredo Neves, never took office, his personal prestige and skillful preparations for the transition from military to civilian rule have enabled the country's fragile democracy to survive the threat posed by his death Sunday.

Such was the political support that Mr. Neves generated during his campaign and the sense of national unity awakened by his five-week-long illness that, for the first time in memory, a succession crisis has been resolved without the involvement of the armed forces.

Further, while his successor, José Sarney, lacks the political backing enjoyed by Mr. Neves, polls indicate that the vast majority of Brazilians want the new President to carry out the Government's program without an interruption of the constitutional order.

NEW NEED OF DEMOCRACY

Since 21 years of military government ended on March 15, the administration has been largely paralyzed by the uncertainty created by Mr. Neves's absence. Yet already a new mood of democracy is apparent, with the long-dormant Congress increasingly

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

vocal and proscribed labor and political groups able to resume their activities.

Reflecting Mr. Neves's talents for conciliation, there is also no apparent demand for retribution against past military regimes. "In a country that had become polarized, Tancredo rebuilt the center," a Congressman said today.

In the presidential palace here where Mr. Neves's body lay in state for 17 hours, mourners included a Dominican friar who was jailed by the military Government, a former leftist guerrilla who is now an opposition legislator and Giacondo Dias, head of the still-banned Brazilian Communist Party. But they also included Gen. Ernesto Geisel, who governed Brazil from 1974 to 1979, and a right-wing Congressman who, as an army major, led a counterinsurgency campaign a decade ago.

After a religious ceremony here today attended by foreign delegations, including the Presidents of Colombia, Venezuela, Uruguay, Paraguay and Portugal, Mr. Neves's body was flown to Belo Horizonte, where he served as Governor of Minas Gerais State until last year.

AN APPEAL FOR CALM

Hundreds of thousands of people crowded the city's streets to receive the coffin, many holding banners and throwing flowers. Such was the hysteria outside the palace where the late leader lay in state that his widow, Risoleta, had repeatedly to appeal for calm. Mr. Neves's body will be buried Wednesday in his birthplace of São João del Rei.

The powerful emotions stirred by Mr. Neves's death may nonetheless add to the headaches awaiting the Sarney administration. Many politicians here noted that, had he assumed office, Mr. Neves's popularity would inevitably have been eroded by a continuing economic crisis. But now, they said, Mr. Sarney will be measured by the hopes and delusions that Brazilians had for a Neves presidency.

As a result, disappointment that the new Government cannot rapidly improve living standards could create a vacuum to be exploited by ambitious politicians.

Those ambitions, held in abeyance by Mr. Neves's political strength, are already becoming apparent in the debate over how long President Sarney should remain in office and whether he should change the Cabinet that he has inherited.

Under the present Constitution, Mr. Sarney could serve until March 1991 but, having been chosen by an Electoral College, Mr. Neves had pledged to call direct presidential elections in November 1988. Now different voices are being heard calling for elections in 1985, 1986 and 1987, although no consensus has emerged.

CRUCIAL WEEKS AHEAD

Further, Mr. Neves named a Cabinet that carefully combined the two political forces that supported his candidacy—the Brazilian Democratic Movement Party and the Liberal Front Party—but several key posts were also filled by close aides, who may be replaced by Mr. Sarney.

Politicians here believe much depends on how Mr. Sarney handles his first weeks in the presidency. Many of Mr. Neves's allies, among them Ulysses Guimarães, president of the Chamber of Deputies, and Franco Montoro, Governor of São Paulo State, are demanding a voice in the new administration, but other groups believe Mr. Sarney must provide strong leadership to forestall instability.

Next week, the new President will face a first test. A strike of 200,000 metal workers in São Paulo was suspended during the eight days of official mourning proclaimed after Mr. Neves's death, but it will resume Monday and its solution could have a major impact on the Government's economic policy.

Paradoxically, since March 15, the armed forces have emerged as the main guarantors of the succession. In the hours that followed Mr. Neves's hospitalization on March 14, amid disputes over whether Mr. Sarney or Mr. Guimaraes should take office, it was the Army Minister, Gen. Leonidas Pires Goncalves, who interpreted the Constitution and pointed to the Vice President.

Unlike the crises provoked by the suicide of President Getulio Vargas in 1954 and the resignation of President Janio Quadros in 1961, the legal successor was therefore able to take office without incident. In a country where only one elected President has completed his term since 1950, the armed forces are also expected to discourage any scramble to replace Mr. Sarney.

A BLOW TO BRAZIL

Brazil has suffered a tragic blow in the death of its president-elect Tancredo Neves, the man who was to lead South America's largest nation back to civilian government after 21 years of military rule.

That transition would not have been an easy one even had the 75-year-old Mr. Neves lived to assume the presidency to which he was indirectly elected in January. Though Brazil avoided the extremes of violence and polarization that occurred under military regimes in neighboring Argentina and elsewhere in the region, it still faces grave social and economic problems. Half of its 130 million people live in dire poverty, while perhaps 40 per cent of the labor force is unemployed or underemployed. The inflation rate exceeds 200 per cent a year, while the foreign debt of over $100 billion is the world's largest.

To cope with the conflicting pressures for economic discipline, social progress, and consolidation of democracy would have taken all the conciliatory talent for which Mr. Neves became known in nearly a half-century of political life. Now, those pressures fall on his successor, Jose Sarney, who has neither the stature nor popular affection commanded by Mr. Neves. Because he was never associated with the ruling generals' Democratic Social Party, Mr. Neves embodied the national desire for a return to democracy. Mr. Sarney, by contrast, belonged to the official party until he defected during pre-election maneuvering last year. That move left a legacy of distrust both in the Democratic Social camp and in Mr. Neves's Brazilian Democratic Movement. The former sees Mr. Sarney as a traitor and the latter regards him with misgivings because of his past links with the military government. Thus, instead of a leader with enough popularity to take necessary but unpopular decisions without destroying the consensus for orderly political change. Brazil's future rests on a president without broad support and without the mystique that seemed to be Mr. Neves's strongest political weapon.

One probable consequence of Mr. Neves's death and Mr. Sarney's succession to the presidency will almost certainly be increased pressure for direct elections, replacing the indirect system under which Mr. Neves was chosen. Mr. Neves had promised to restore direct elections, possibly as early as 1988. Speeding up that timetable could involve both opportunities and risks. It could provide a leader with a stronger mandate than Mr. Sarney now enjoys, but it could also lead to demagogic politics raising unrealistic hopes and possibly reopening the political rifts—between liberals and conservatives and between military and civilians—that Mr. Neves's personality and talents seemed to bridge. Whatever happens, Brazil's political maturity will be subject to tests far more severe than anyone would have imagined before Mr. Neves's illness and tragic death.

ON TOWARD BRAZILIAN DEMOCRACY

(By Alfred Stepan)

The death of the President-elect of Brazil, Tancredo Neves, is a great loss for his country and the world. It should not, however, dash the encouraging prospects for Brazil's transition to democracy.

The consummate political skills that "Tancredo" brought to the transition are lost. No other official can hope to enjoy the fervent trust he inspired. The new President, José Sarney, is suspect among both the outgoing military and the incoming democratic forces. But the rebirth of Brazilian democracy does not depend solely on leadership.

For one thing, most of the country's other political leaders remain committed to democracy. For all their initial doubts about Mr. Sarney's legitimacy and capacity to govern, the people who worked with such exemplary skill to make Tancredo Neves the first civilian President in more than 20 years will now rally behind Mr. Sarney simply because he represents constitutional and democratic continuity. Mr. Neves's electoral calendar—direct elections in the state capitals in November 1965, elections for a Congress to serve as a Constituent Assembly in November 1966 and the possibility of direct Presidential elections in November 1988—is likely to gain increasing support. It is the least confrontational and most constitutional path. It would also give the left time to organize under democratic conditions.

Second, the military is unlikely to cause trouble. The officers have their own, complex reasons to respect the transition under Mr. Sarney. They know that Nuremberg-style trials of military abuses are much less likely in Brazil than in Chile and Argentina, where deaths and disappearances caused by the military may have been as much as 100 times more common (counted on a per capita basis). The desire to return to civilian rule was also strengthened by the Argentine-British war for the Malvinas, or Falklands Islands, which forced a debate in the military on the need to restructure its institutions.

This alleviated an identity crisis, giving the military a sense of mission that has nothing to do with direct rule. Certainly, the military will continue to play a significant economic role in Brazil, the sixth largest arms exporting country in the world. In short, unless President Sarney and the political parties prove totally unable to control domestic political conflict, it is very unlikely that the military will feel called upon to topple the new Government with a coup.

Finally, Brazil's much neglected poorer classes favor a strengthened civil society. There will of course be great demands to service the country's staggering domestic "social debt" of poverty, sickness and unemployment. But even the Brazilian left is firmly committed to democratic procedures—not just as a temporary tactic, but as an enduring value.

Lacking Tancredo Neves' credibility, Mr. Sarney will undoubtedly find it hard to impose austerity measures. He will also have to go further than Mr. Neves would have in pursuing visible social reforms—and will be hampered all the while by his country's external debt, the largest in the world. Yet even here he has some leeway. Unlike Argentina or Chile, Brazil recently developed a major industrial plant. This new capacity is waiting for a revival of internal and external demand; already, in 1984, Brazil had a record year of exports.

The world debt crisis is not over however. Ask anybody in Brazil—especially the poor and their leaders—about the effect of spending some 5 percent of its gross national product merely to service the external debt; Tancredo Neves once called it "taxation without representation." The debt crisis was containable last year, thanks largely to declining interest rates, declining oil prices and booming exports to the United States, but no one knows how long these favorable conditions will last.

It is a time of sadness but not despair in Brazil. The country has some room to develop democracy and temporarily, at least, a tiny bit of room to develop its economy. History will deal harshly with the United States if it fails to help the world's third longest democracy to evolve successfully—even as we continue to pursue a military obsession in Central America. There is no excuse for our political and moral neglect of Brazil.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 23, 1985]

TANCREDO NEVES

Brazilians have suffered an unkind blow in the death of their recently elected but uninaugurated president, Tancredo Neves. Mr. Neves, who endured a month-long medical ordeal, had appointed only some of the top members of the government he intended to run before he fell ill. In the month since, the man elected vice president with him, Jose Sarney, has taken some further steps to get the democratic system and the new government in place. But Mr. Sarney, necessarily, moved slowly, waiting for public pressure to build for him to take actions and proceeding with immense caution.

There were a couple of reasons for this. The obvious one was that the vice president (who became, while Mr. Neves was ill, the acting president) did not wish to appear overeager or in any way ambitious to assume Mr. Neves' place. Another reason was that Mr. Sarney, who came over from the military government's party to run with Mr. Neves against a man that military government favored, does not begin to enjoy the popularity or support that Tancredo Neves did. Mr. Sarney will now have a huge political chore to accompany his formidable task of governing.

Although there seems to be no prospect of an effort to revoke or overturn the new democratic dispensation, there will be much controversy as to how soon direct elections for a successor government should be held. There will probably be an effort to have them held very soon. And there are also politicians in Brazil of Tancredo Neves' party who are stronger and more popular than Mr. Sarney, politicians who will be very much trying to arrange things for the new president.

None of this will make Mr. Sarney's ability to preside any easier, and the new president has much to do. Brazil, as other countries in the region, is obliged to fight a ferocious inflation with steps that are alienating workers and threatening a part of the population that is already inordinately poor. Its export earnings, spectacularly high last year, may be sharply reduced this year. Brazil has sent one failed letter of intent after another to the International Monetary Fund, and is now in another round of negotiations with it. The emergency measures that have enabled the country to carry its debts so far will not be adequate indefinitely—particularly if and when the North American economy, with its gigantic demand for Latin exports, begins to slow down.

Governing Brazil is going to require immense skill and steadiness. It is going to require a high degree of trust between the people at the top and the people at the bottom. It is not an opportune moment for a long hiatus or a debilitating quarrel over who's in charge and who possesses the title to legitimate authority. The country's financial position requires decisions that cannot be postponed. The sudden death of the man who won the election, in the moment of his triumph, puts enormous tests ahead of Brazil and its new democracy. But Brazil and its political leadership have shown, over the past year, that they are capable of great things.●

"LADY LANCERS" SPEAR STATE TITLE

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the "Lady Lancers," the girls basketball team from Deer Lakes Junior-Senior High School, will be honored Monday, May 13, as section AAA champions of the Pennsylvania Interscholastic Athletic Association [PIAA].

The girls won their crown the hard way, putting a season record of 25–2 in section AAA of the Western Pennsylvania Interscholastic League [WPIAL]. They captured the section title by defeating North Catholic of Pittsburgh, 42–32. The win not only gave the "Lady Lancers" the WPIAL title, but it averaged the two regular season losses to the Pittsburgh school.

From there, the Deer Lakes girls went on to Hershey, PA, where they wrested the State championship from Palmyra High School in a down-to-the-wire nail biter, 45–43. The "Lancers" were down 17 points at the half and as much as 19 in the third quarter before staging their dramatic comeback.

As a result of the girls' double win and the fine showing of the boys' team, which made it to the WPIAL semifinals, a group of citizens banded together to give the teams some richly deserved public recognition. The result is the May 13 testimonial dinner in their honor at Jack's Restaurant in Sarver, PA.

Members of the State champions, the "Lady Lancers," are:

Terri Gizienski, Kathy Suvoy, Shawn Rearich, Amie Siekierski, Michelle Fletcher, Michelle Murray, Carla Smay, Jill Switalski, Gingy Hahn, Buffey Martinez, Dee Dougherty, Ron Cikora (trainer), and Kenneth Ladish (assistant coach).

Erica Goodrich, Missy Overly, Valerie Chauvin, Stacey McCaskey, Joelle Wise, Jill Savero, Sandy Martin, Francie Rombaldi, Colleen Shaffer, Sue Green, Sue Smith, and Donald Savero (head coach).

Members of the citizens' committee staging the banquet included Jim Yaconis, Joe Yourish, JoAnn Ellison, Carol McCaskey, Carol Bock, Patricia Rehner, Ida Shoop, Joyce Salsbury, Terri Gizienski (representing the girls' team), and Jim Yakonis, Jr. (representing the boys' team).

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the Congress of the United States, I congratulate the "Lady Lancers" on their title as State champions and wish them well for the coming season.●

CONTINUE FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO AMTRAK

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, a recent article in the Star-Ledger explains the effect of the administration's proposal to eliminate all funding for Amtrak, our Nation's rail passenger system. To eliminate all funding for Amtrak will effectively eliminate the railroad. All lines will stop on October 1.

As the article points out, last year, Amtrak carried about 18,000 passengers daily between Washington and New York. All the airlines combined carried only 12,000 passengers daily between the two cities. The elimination of Amtrak will mean massive highway and airport congestion in an area already operating at capacity.

Further, according to the Star-Ledger, commuter service may be halted, stranding 35,000 additional passengers. Over $2 billion has been spent on track that will be virtually abandoned, not to mention the billions of dollars spent on rolling stock that will have to be sold for scrap.

I strongly oppose the administration's proposal to eliminate Amtrak and will fight for continuation of the railroad. I urge my colleagues to support the continuation of Amtrak and commend this informative and revealing article to their attention.

The article follows:

[From the Sunday Star-Ledger]

COMMUTER RAILROADS BRACE FOR "DOOMSDAY" IF AMTRAK LOSES ITS SUBSIDY

(By David Schwab)

Representatives from commuter agencies throughout the Northeast were summoned to Washington earlier this month to take part in a little disaster planning. Gathered in the offices of the Federal Railroad Administration (FRA), they talked about public transit's latest version of the "Day After."

As the scenario goes, it is Oct. 1, the beginning of the new federal fiscal year. Amtrak, the 14-year-old national railroad passenger corporation, has been forced out of business, a victim of the Reagan Administration's latest round of budget cuts.

All of its 250 daily trains throughout the country grind to a halt, including those connecting New Jersey to places from Florida to Chicago to Montreal.

Among those stalled are 18,000 passengers a day who travel the busy, electrified mainline owned by Amtrak between New York and Washington and known as the Northeast Corridor. The corridor, which cuts a 57-mile path through the heart of New Jersey and has undergone a $1.5 billion renovation, is virtually abandoned. Crucial repair shops and stations are closed.

Commuter service on the line, provided by state transit authorities like NJ Transit, is halted. Thirty five thousand daily New Jersey commuters who travel between Trenton and New York, half of the state's total rail ridership, are affected.

With no place left to go, these travelers jump into their cars or catch planes, further crowding already congested highways and airports.

Faced with this dilemma, N.J. Transit would have little choice but to pay up to $47 million a year to take over many of the services now provided by Amtrak. And that's not all.

A separate proposal to slash federal Urban Mass Transportation Administration (UMTA) subsidies leaves NJ Transit heading for a $44 million operating deficit. This could only be made up with fare increases of up to 25 percent or increased state contributions. Further cuts of $99 million in UMTA capital subsidies threaten anxiously awaited improvement projects such as electrification to Long Branch and new bus purchases.

Few expect this nightmare will become a reality.

The Reagan Administration, which has proposed the drastic cuts, argues many of Amtrak's important functions could be assumed by the states or private companies. It disputes predictions of doom and gloom and says its proposed cuts are part of longstanding push by the federal government to get out of areas better left to the states and private enterprise, including the railroad business.

Meanwhile, Amtrak is lobbying hard against the cuts and has been joined with expressions of support from many politicians, including Gov. Thomas Kean and Rep. James Florio (D-1st Dist.). Transit agencies from throughout the Northeast, including NJ Transit, have also joined Amtrak in its fight.

For the next year, Amtrak is asking for a "zero funding" budget of $684 million, the same amount it receives this year. It insists any cuts will force it to shut down completely.

NJ Transit officials, keenly aware of budget battles of the previous years, are bracing for possible modest cuts in both Amtrak and UMTA subsidies. But they are not planning for Transportation Armageddon.

The purpose of the Washington meeting was "to begin getting people's thoughts focused on the Doomsday scenario," explained NJ Transit's chief financial officer, William Bouffard, who attended. "It's bizarre to contemplate that form of disaster. As a practical matter, we are not sure what to plan for."

But the worst could still happen, state officials say, and the stakes for New Jersey in this budget battle are especially high.

"There is a high probability that the Administration will be successful," said Florio, noting its previous successes in budget cuts in 1981. "Most in New Jersey do not understand the impact, I suppose because of the assault on so many programs," added Florio, the chairman of the House subcommittee that has jurisdiction over Amtrak.

The plan to eliminate funding for Amtrak beginning Oct. 1 is just one of many proposals put forward by the Reagan administration to cut the nation's $200 billion deficit.

Created in 1971 to provide intercity railroad passenger service, Amtrak has since spent more than $3 billion to rebuild a system left largely in decay by the private railroads. It has survived previous budget battles by reducing its annual subsidy from a high of $896 million in 1981 to $684 million this year.

Traditionally, Amtrak has counted upon support in the Congress to fight budget cuts. the Senate budget Committee held hearings earlier this month and approved a proposal to reduce Amtrak's budget by 30 percent. the House will hold its own hearings and Florio said there is support for a freeze of the Amtrak budget at current levels.

The debate over Amtrak is just one small part of the controversy surrounding the entire federal budget. But it will not likely be resolved until many of the other issues in the budget are finalized. This may not occur until the summer, officials say, compounding the problems of transit planners trying to put together their budgets.

FRA spokesman Thomas Simpson said the decision to cut Amtrak funding is an extension of the Reagan Administration's general philosophy.

"The overall philosophy is that the federal government should not be in the railroad business, whether freight or passenger," he said. For similar reasons, the government recently sold the Alaska Railroad to the State of Alaska for $22 million and is moving to sell Conrail to the private sector.

Simpson said the government is beginning to look at "alternative funding arrangements," namely getting states like New Jersey to pick up some of the tab for the services Amtrak provided.

If these services could be transferred from Amtrak to the states or other railroads, then there would be no massive layoffs for Amtrak's 25,000 employees and important railroad facilities would not go to waste, the federal government argues. As for long distance service, from New Jersey to Florida for example, "if the states want to band together to preserve service they would have to sit down and figure out how to allocate costs," Simpson said.

These suggestions contrast greatly with the dire forecasts from Amtrak, which says that binding labor agreements would make it more costly to shut down all or parts of the system than to continue operating normally.

Contracts made with railroad workers when Amtrak was created guarantee them pay for six years even if they lose their jobs, according to Amtrak. It estimates the cost of meeting these agreements at $2.1 billion.

Also, Amtrak argues terminating its trains would allow nearly $3.1 billion worth of improvements to tracks, stations and equipment to go to waste.

About half of this was spent to turn the Northeast Corridor Boston into one of the most modern systems in the world. Between New York and Washington, for instance, this system carries 50 percent more riders than those who travel the route by plane.

Millions of dollars have also been invested in station improvements along the corridor, including $20 million at Newark's Penn Station, to encourage travel by train and development in urban areas.

While acknowledging some problems in the past, Amtrak believes it has been successful in trimming costs while improving services for 20 million passengers a year in 44 states.

"I think the Administration is honestly trying to grapple with the deficit but I'm not sure they are aware of the impact," said Amtrak spokesman Clifford Black.

For example, Amtrak operates 80 daily trains that pass throught New Jersey, stopping at such places as Newark, Metropark, New Brunswick and Trenton. They connect the Garden State with locations throughout the nation.

For the year ending September of 1984, 1.8 million passengers used Amtrak trains in the state. To provide these services, Amtrak employs about 2,500 persons in New Jersey with a payroll of about $50 million.

In addition, NJ Transit operates about 200 trains a day on the Amtrak-owned corridor between trenton and New York. A number of New Jersey commuters rely on hourly Amtrak trains between New York and Philadelphia.

NJ Transit pays Amtrak about $30 million a year to provide the services associated with its trains. This covers the cost of electricity, track maintenance and signaling. It also covers the cost of maintaining trains in Amtrak's yards and the use of Amtrak's Penn Station in New York.

Were Amtrak to disappear, however, the cost to NJ Transit to provide the same services would jump to about $47 million, according to Amtrak and NJ Transit officials. This is because complicated agreements between NJ Transit and Amtrak, following earlier rulings by the Interstate Commerce Commission, require Amtrak to bear the large share of costs on the corridor.

While state officials have come to the aid of Amtrak, they believe it could survive some budget cuts. They say some savings could probably be achieved by reducing labor costs and eliminating duplicated services on the corridor.

However, they do not believe, as does the Administration, that Amtrak's important functions can be assumed by the state or others. Instead, they fear a termination or severe cutback of Amtrak, combined with drastic cuts in UMTA funds, would be a catastrophe for mass transit in the state.

"If we get clobbered with the catastrophic cuts proposed, it's going to create a major funding problem for the state," said NJ Transit Executive Director Jerome Premo.

The agency's current operating budget of $460 million relies upon $44 million in UMTA operating subsidies and $160 millon from the state. These figures were not expected to change drastically for next year.

The agency also received about $200 million in UMTA capital subsidies this year.

Any budget cuts would be especially damaging this year because NJ Transit has been successful in rebuilding the state's mass transit system, largely by making major investments and preventing fare increases during the last two years, according to state officials.

During the last six months, for example, ridership on NJ Transit trains has increased by 9 percent and on buses by 3 percent. Fares and revenues now cover about 60 percent of NJ Transit's costs, which is among the best returns in the nation and reduces dependence on government subsidies.

State officials say they do not want to underestimate the drastic possibilities presented by the Reagan Administration's plans. But they believe the crisis may not be as severe as it appears. They are adamant that undue predictions of doom will only scare away mass transit users.

"The sense I get is there may be a small cut. But I don't sense widspread support for the massive cuts the Administration has proposed," said Premo. "I am trying to avoid the Doomsday signals of increased fares that may scare away some riders who remember the old days," he added.●

RELIGION, POLITICS AND JUSTICE IN A DEMOCRACY: A COMMENTARY ON THE U.S. CATHOLIC BISHOPS' DRAFT PASTORAL LETTER ON CATHOLIC SOCIAL TEACHING AND THE U.S. ECONOMY

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, on March 29, 1985, I addressed the first annual Convocation on Peace and Justice at Niagara University. In that talk, entitled "Religion, Politics and Justice in a Democracy," I tried to illustrate how one tries to meld moral and religious principles together with politics in pursuit of a more just society. To do that, I discussed the U.S. Catholic bishops' draft pastoral letter on Catholic social teaching and the U.S. economy. I call this to the attention of my colleagues, in the hope that the moral guidance offered by the bishops may be helpful to all my colleagues regardless of their political or religious persuasion.

The text of my talk follows:

RELIGION, POLITICS AND JUSTICE IN A DEMOCRACY

(Remarks of Congressman John J. LaFalce)

There are few people in history who have had as great a commitment to peace and justice as Niagara University's own patron, St. Vincent de Paul. St. Vincent, the founder of the Vincentians, a hero in 17th century France, exhausted himself working on behalf of others because he recognized that it was every man and woman's obligation to love his neighbor, and to be of service to him, if he was to love God.

We are told that no one was excluded from his ministry—that he organized relief for all: sick children, orphans, the poor, the destitute, the blind and insane; convicts and galley slaves. His charity extended to every emergency that arose, whether the ransoming of Christian slaves in North Africa or collecting alms for war devastated areas in Lorraine.

Two of his orders, the Congregation of the Mission, commonly called the Vincentians, and the Sisters of Charity, have ministered to the poor and oppressed around the world, since their inception in 1633. It is no wonder that St. Vincent is recognized as the universal patron of charity for the entire Church.

How appropriate it is, then, that this Vincentian University has decided to institute an annual Convocation on Peace and Justice to better carry out its most fundamental missions. With this general background, I sincerely say that it is a great and heavy honor for me to be the speaker at your first Convocation.

My purpose, as your speaker tonight, is to develop the way one works to improve the qualities of peace and injustice in a democracy, and within that context, how religious, moral and spiritual values can, and must, be woven into our political process so that this country's social and economic policies reflect what Cardinal Bernardin has called the "framework of a consistent ethic . . . a seamless garment of reverence for life."

Those who know me are aware that I am no shrinking violet. I am seldom unwilling to wade into the political fray, if armed with what I consider forceful arguments that favor a particular perspective. But, I must confess a bit of uneasiness in taking on tonight's assignment.

Although your invitation is a high honor, it is a humbling experience. Any honest and sensible man should cringe at giving a moral exhortation to others. Considering myself honest and sensible, I cringe, for I know well enough my own faults. It's hard enough to be a good person; even tougher to be both a good person and a good politician.

I also recognize that the words "political" and "moral" are not likely to be found together as synonyms in anyone's Thesaurus. In fact, let me make a second point: Public officials who cry the loudest about religion and morality may often be more pharisee than prophet. All too often, when politicians begin posing for holy pictures, it is time for people to hang on to both their prayer books and their wallets because they are probably about to lose both. The cynical use of patriotism may, in the words of Samuel Johnson, be the last refuge of a scoundrel, but the cynical use of religion is all too often a close second.

So, with both these caveats clearly acknowledged, let me nevertheless go forward.

First, a few personal observations that may be helpful in developing my theme.

I did not enter politics because I wanted to enact legislation as an end into unto itself. That's not the point of politics.

I entered politics because I believe in the social gospel and the force for justice that I think government should be. There is, you know, a compatibility between the two, not a contradiction.

I think Christianity and democracy are both based on the value of the human person—individually and collectively; that a principal role of religion is to help people understand their responsibilities toward one another; and that a principal role of government, particularly in a democracy, is to help people meet their responsibilities to each other as effectively and equitably as possible.

As a public official, I try, in my own imperfect way, to apply these beliefs broadly, so that public positions and decisions will be based on criteria which reflect these basic values and principles.

But whether in Washington, Albany or Peoria, it is very easy to get caught up in the swirl of events, and the crisis of the moment. Public officials in general, and Members of Congress, in particular, are continuously called upon to participate in decisions which affect not only the well-being of our own people, but literally the future of the planet. In this pressure cooker of competing claims and counter-claims, "numbers crunching," and political trade-offs, it is easy to lose perspective; it is easy to lose one's moral gyroscope.

That is why this politician, at least, often needs a moral compass to find his way. Actually, I would also think that all persons and certainly all public officials, need such a moral compass.

In choosing a particular subject to discuss this evening to illustrate how one tries to meld moral and religious principles together with politics in pursuit of a more just society, I considered many issues, especially abortion, about which I differ in thinking from both Governor Cuomo and Archbishop O'Connor; and the nuclear arms race and the moral imperative of ending that race, if we are to preserve the human species.

These are transcendingly important issues, involving the creation of life and the end of life. But I have left them for another time. Please invite me back.

For tonight, I have chosen to share with you some reflections on the draft Pastoral Letter of the American Bishops on Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy. I do this for many reasons.

First, because, although it does not deal with the creation or the cessation of life, it does deal with the condition of life.

Second, because the draft letter itself may constitute the most ambitious attempt at "participatory democracy" in the Church's history, through discussions that are now being held in most of the dioceses in the United States. Hence, our discussion this evening could help shape the final teaching.

Third, the draft letter raises issues which individuals can affect almost everyday in almost evey community in the United States.

Fourth, the essence of the Bishops' message has been maligned and misinterpreted since it was released, and therefore needs exposition, reinforcement and improvement by its friends and allies.

And fifth, I feel a special obligation to speak out on this issue, for I serve as Chairman of the House of Representatives' Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization.

You may remember the flap that arose last November, when shortly after the Presidential election, Catholic Bishops released their draft letter on the economy. One would have thought that a few Bishops had worked secretly together in a backroom to produce a radical document unrelated to Catholic social teachings, and were now trying to foist their thoughts upon an unsuspecting church and public.

Yet, the fact is that the draft letter reflects over 100 years of Catholic social teaching.

Let me share a bit of that background with you, as a "refresher" before discussing the latest letter at some length.

In the modern industrial age, Catholic social teaching has been rooted in fundamental beliefs about the nature of the human person and about how we should live and work together in a society. These concepts can be summed up under the following headings: Human dignity, the common good, the role of government, distribute justice, and the essentiality and dignity of work.

HUMAN DIGNITY

The foundation for all Catholic social teaching has been the dignity of the human person. In the words of the Second Vatican Council ". . . the beginning, the subject, and the goal of all institutions is and must be the human person."

COMMON GOOD

The "common good" is a second theme which has been integral to Catholic social teaching. Although this teaching strongly emphasizes the human person, it is not an individualistic ethic. On the contrary, the human person is seen as essentially a social being, and human rights are rights held in community.

Further, the common good is not so much the summation of the goods of individual citizens, as it is a set of social conditions which facilitate human development. It stands as a call to responsibility whereby we are all required to work for the general welfare of the entire human family.

ROLE OF GOVERNMENT

The promotion of that general welfare, or common good, is, according to Catholic social teaching, the very reason for the existance of government.

The social encyclicals of the Church have recognized that unless government intervenes on behalf of the common good, inequalities in social and economic life tend to increase. As stated by John XXIII in "Pacem in Terris": "Experience has taught us that, unless civil authorities take suitable action with regard to economic, political and cultural matters, inequalities between citizens tend to become more and more widespread."

More recently, Pope John Paul II pointed out in his Encyclical "On Human Labor," that it is the obligation of government to conduct a just economic policy. He stated that government: ". . . must make provision for overall planning with regard to the different kinds of work by which not only the economic life, but also, the cultural life of a given society is shaped; it must also give attention to organizing that work in a correct and rational way. In the final analysis, this overall concern weighs on the shoulders of the state."

DISTRIBUTIVE JUSTICE

Since there are often valid but competing claims and rights in society, Catholic social teaching has also advanced the principle of distributive justice as a tool for reconciling these conflicts. Distributive justice, therefore, is a particularly relevant guide in the realm of economic decisionmaking. Thus Pope John XXIII wrote in "Mater et Magistra," that: "Economic prosperity is to be assessed not so much from the sum total of goods and wealth possessed, as from the distribution of goods according to the norms of justice."

Pope Paul VI noted in "Populorum Progressio" that when conflicts arise between the claims of those in need and those who are well off, Catholic social teaching gives special priority to the needs of the poor. The Church does not claim to be neutral in its treatment of various economic classes in society. It has a clearly articulated bias on behalf of the poor.

In a similar context, Pope John Paul II has recently declared that: "The present economic difficulties . . . must not become a pretext for giving in to the temptation to make the poor pay for the solutions to the problems of the rich . . ."

Note that statement well, given the context of today's prevailing economic philosophy.

THE ESSENTIALITY AND DIGNITY OF WORK

Finally, let me pay particular attention to a theme that permeates the most influential encyclicals of the past century—the essentiality and dignity of work and the rights of workers. From the extensive treatment given this theme in 1891 by Leo XIII in "Rerum Novarum" to its 40th anniversary encyclical of Pope Pius XI, "Quadragesimo Anno," to the most recent statements of Pope John Paul II, the Church has emphasized the importance and dignity of human labor.

John Paul II, in the encyclical "On Human Labor" said: "Man's life is built up every day from work, from work it derives its specific dignity . . . through work man not only transforms nature, adapting it to his own needs, but he also achieves fulfillment as a human being and indeed in a sense becomes more a human being . . . The role of the indirect employer (government) is to act against unemployment, which in all cases is an evil . . ."

THE BISHOPS' PASTORAL LETTER ON THE U.S. ECONOMY

In the richness of this tradition, there now comes the American Catholic Bishops draft Pastoral Letter on the U.S. Economy. It does not come in a economic or moral vacuum. It is a particularized continuum—particularized to this country and to this time.

In 1919, the American Bishops first spoke out on the moral dimensions of economic conditions in the United States. Their message emerged from, and was largely addressed to, a largely immigrant and working class community. The Church then was a "defender of the defenseless, and a voice for the voiceless."

Today, the Church seeks to fulfill the same mission, but in a much different context, and in a much more complicated world. In speaking to American Catholics, the Bishops address a group which has achieved much greater economic security, and is increasingly moving away from its "blue-collar" roots. The question for Catholics, in general, is whether they are tempted, like the people of the biblical Exodus, to forget the powerless they have left behind, to turn their backs on the less fortunate, and dismiss not only their past, but also their traditions.

In addition to Catholics, the Bishops also seek to speak to the entire nation in this letter, and thereby contribute to the debate on economic policy. They say: "Our primary task is to speak to our own community; but our vocation also calls us to address the larger community of this nation."

The Bishops do so at a time of either explicit or implicit challenge to many of the Church's most fundamental tenets of its traditional teachings, both by Catholics, and the society at large.

In response to these societal trends, the Bishops are trying to hold up this country's economic system to the scrutiny of traditional Catholic social teaching, and sound a clarion call to conscience to all those who would listen, whether devout Catholics, "unrepentant secular humanists," or those falling in between.

I don't think it could come at a better time.

The draft letter begins with a simple proposition that "the dignity of the human person, realized in community with others, is the criterion against which all aspects of economic life must be measured."

It goes on to state that "every perspective on economic life that is human, moral and Christian must be shaped by two questions: What does it do for people? What does it do to people."

In this context, the draft letter directly challenges the American economic and political systems to address the maldistribution of economic wealth and to do a much better job of representing the poor and disadvantaged.

The letter states: "No one can claim the name Christian and at the same time acquiesce in the hunger and homelessness that exists around the world and in our own country. We intend this letter to be an invitation and a challenge . . . to those who may be tempted to a narrower perspective."

It is this narrower perspective that is particularly disturbing to me. Over the past few years, interest in economic issues has exploded in this country. It dominates the news media; it dominates debates in the Congress; and it increasingly dominates how people order their lives.

Students get MBAs by the tens of thousands each year, corporate law firms flourish, multi-national organizations expand, and heretofore esoteric subjects such as trade balances, Third World debt, prime rates, and tax write-offs have become the centerpiece of everyday conversations.

But in all of this, we seem to have lost sight of the fundamental fact that economic decisions, policies, and institutions should all be at the service of human beings. The economy was made for people, and not the other way around. It is these disturbing signs of our time that have directed the pastoral concerns of the American Bishops to address the moral aspects of economic activity.

In developing its positions, the Bishops' draft letter lays out three basic principles which should help shape U.S. economic policy:

First, the fulfillment of the basic needs of the poor is of the highest priority;

Second, increased participation for those on the margins of society takes priority over the preservation of privileged concentrations of power, wealth and income; and

Third, meeting human needs and increasing participation should be priority targets in the investment of wealth, talent and human energy.

The Bishops then attempt to apply those principles to four economic issues central to American life: employment; poverty; economic cooperation among business, labor and government; and the United States and the world economy.

With respect to those four issues, the draft letter makes certain value judgments, of which I will posit but a few.

Moral Judgment One: The fact that no less than 15 percent of our nation's population live below the poverty line at a time of unprecedented material well-being is a "social and moral scandal that must not be ignored." In the midst of our euphoria concerning the recent economic recovery, we appear to have ignored the fact that over the past five years, the number of Americans living in poverty has increased by almost 10 million people, rising from 11.7 percent of the population since 1979, to over 15 percent in 1984. This stands in stark contrast to the two decades from 1960 to 1979 when we reduced the number in poverty from 22.2% to 11.7%. The number of children living in poverty has increased by over 50 percent during this time period. We simply cannot accept these consequences as "a cost of doing business." While some might claim that the poor are really better off now than several decades ago, due to programs such as food stamps and Medicaid, the recent trends are clear, and, I repeat, they are morally unacceptable.

Moral Judgment Two: This country should not accept an unemployment rate of over 7 percent, which consigns millions of our people to economic misery and social despair every year. The Bishops letter states that "the most urgent priority for U.S. domestic economic policy is the creation of new jobs with adequate pay and decent working conditions." The moral unacceptability of current unemployment levels becomes vividly clear when we understand that the message delivered to a person looking for a job is: "We don't need your talent, we don't need your initiative, we don't need you." That message is being delivered today to over 8 million Americans.

If every effort were being made to create the jobs required, one might argue that the situation today is the best we can do. But such is not the case. The country is doing far less than it might to generate employment, and it shows no sign of making a full-scale commitment to this goal. Somehow, we have come to accept the notion that massive unemployment in this country is a socially acceptable consequence, if not a necessary condition, of wringing out inflation and moving on to the "high-tech economy" of the future. The Bishops note that toleration of present unemployment rates would have been unthinkable 20 years ago. It should still be regarded as morally and economically unacceptable today.

Moral Judgment Three: It is grossly inequitable that the richest 20 percent of Americans receive more income than the bottom 70 percent combined. In America today, the rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. Unequal distribution of income and wealth in the United States has become significantly more pronounced in recent years. The fraction of national income received by the richest 20 percent of the population was lower in 1983 than at any time since statistics began to be collected on this issue in 1947.

The recent poverty trends are even more scandalous. In 1960, 22.2 percent of our people were living in poverty; by 1979 we had reduced that figure to 11.7 percent; but since 1979 it has skyrocketed to 15 percent!

The top 1 percent of families in this country hold almost 20 percent of the net assets; while the bottom 50 percent of American families hold only 4 percent of the country's net assets. These levels of inequalities in the distribution of income and wealth are the greatest of any industrialized country in the world. Simple justice demands that we do better.

Moral Judgment Four: We must do more for the billions of people on this earth who live below any possible definition of a decent life. Half of the world's population live in countries where the per capita annual income is the equivalent of $400 or less. Almost 500 million people are malnourished or facing starvation. Such examples could be multiplied indefinitely, but they can never adequately portray the tragic disparity between these desperately poor countries in the material wealth of our own country.

The Bishops note that "we can neither understand the problems of the U.S. economy today nor propose plausible solutions to these problems without giving the most serious attention to the links that bind us to the rest of the world." In saying this, the Bishops are doing no more, but no less, than reaffirming the common Brotherhood of Man. As the most powerful nation on earth, we must accept the responsibility that our actions affect those in countries all over the world.

Locked together in a world of limited material resources, we can help or hurt one another by the economic policies we choose. Thus we have to be more responsible than in the past for these choices, because they often adversely affect people who have no opportunity to influence them. When we discuss trade issues in this country, or the impact of Third World debt, we must recognize our obligations to our silent brethren whose names and faces we will never know, but whose lives we touch every day.

RESPONSE

For making these, and many other moral judgments, the Bishops were immediately attacked from a variety of sources as being "well-intentioned, but."

Distinguished businessmen noted that the Bishops were "simply out of their depth," conservative columnists wrote that the Bishops were "cliche-ridden" or "guilty of child-like innocence," and a self-appointed group of prominent conservative lay Catholics attempted "a pre-emptive strike" against the draft letter before it was even issued.

Why was there such a concerted attack against this effort? I believe the answer lies in the state of politics in this country, best exemplified by the national election which had just been completed. The draft letter was withheld until after an election overwhelmingly won by those who ran a campaign on the notion that poverty, unemployment, injustice, and inequality are no longer issues in the forefront of the national consciousness; and that the best way to be elected is to avoid discussing our problems, and, instead, focus exclusively on our successes.

Many conservatives, who had praised the Bishops firm posture on abortion, faulted their latest draft statement on economic justice because it treads on "Caesar's turf." But many others were much less philosophical, and much more blunt.

In the main, opposition to the draft letter came largely from those who advocate policies which try to pay for tax cuts for the wealthy and middle class by slashing programs for the poor; run up dangerous deficits to be settled by future generations; quote slogans such as "a rising tide lifts all boats," while ignoring the fact that millions more of our people—mostly children—have dropped below the proverty line in recent years; believe that people who are in trouble have no one to blame but themselves; and that economic growth is somehow dependent upon the existence of large societal disparities which act as incentives to work, produce, and invest.

The draft letter apparently touches a raw nerve because it insists upon intruding into this make-believe world of political sloganeering and trickle-down economics with the stark reality of 35 million Americans living below the poverty line (with another 25 million just above); 8 million people unemployed (and several million others underemployed); the increasing concentration of income in the hands of the already wealthy; and record numbers of small business bankruptcies and failures of family farms.

We are often lectured that it is counterproductive, if not actually un-American, to pursue policies designed to distribute wealth fairly. We are given the negative appellation: "Redistributionists." But what is Government, if not a social compact between people designed to maximize the common good? In my opinion, government economic policy should certainly facilitate and promote the creation and expansion of societal wealth, but it must also help achieve the equitable distribution of such wealth throughout the entire society. I have little time for liberals who neglect the importance of the creation of wealth, and even less for conservatives who not only neglect, but deny the appropriateness of a government role in the redistribution of societal wealth. Good government must do both.

The problem with our current policies is not simply that they disregard redistribution, but that they are actually redistribut ing wealth in the wrong direction.

Reversing this recent trend, as called for by the draft pastoral letter, would, in my opinion, constitute both good economics and good social policy. More importantly, that is precisely the judgment reached by two distinguished Nobel Laureates in Economics—Professor James Tobin of Yale University, and Lawrence Klein of the University of Pennsylvania, when they testified on the Bishops' draft letter a few weeks ago before the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization at my invitation.

This is not to imply that the draft pastoral cannot be improved. It can, and undoubtedly, will be. Some of the criticisms such as the length of the letter (55,000 words) and the specificity of many of the solutions need to be addressed. Indeed, the Bishops are certainly not correct in all of their prescriptions—but the most effective ways to implement shared policy goals are always a matter for ongoing debate.

But the Bishops are making the point that, as a first priority, we must be sure that the poor of this country and of the world are part of the debate.

Moreover, it is important that we distinguish between pious claims, and moral action. Simply proclaiming that poverty should be eliminated; that everyone should have a job; and that people should be treated fairly, will do nothing.

The Bishops' draft letter calls upon us to: ". . . act as individuals, to heal the pain which injustice causes . . . (but we) all have a larger responsibility to remove the causes of injustice . . . This is our responsibility as citizens—a personal responsibility to be exercised through government and the political process."

Let me give you a striking example of how this process is working in the world today. I am proud as an American to see the overwhelming response that our people have made as individuals to the conditions of the starving people in Africa. As a Catholic, I am proud of the work that the Catholic Relief Services are doing not only in Africa, but around the world. But I am ashamed that the United States Government, over the past few years, has been instrumental in substantially reducing assistance to the poor people of the world through such institutions as the World Bank. It is simply morally unacceptable that at a time of such material well-being in the United States, our government has insisted upon reducing its budget deficit on the backs of the poor and defenseless.

The Catholic Bishops' draft Pastoral Letter has set forth a challenging set of moral imperatives and economic objectives. I believe that the American people and their government would do well to rise to the challenge.

The Bishops are undeniably right in calling us forward to a vision of America as a nation of compassion, where our primary commitment is to the common good, and not to seeing the world in terms of "Am I personally better off now than four years ago?"

The Bishops' letter is calling us to a second American Revolution that will be achieved gradually and only with great difficulty, but a far different Revolution than called for in the recent State of the Union address. The Bishops' revolution will require sharing, participating, and cooperating. It is a revolution which would elicit the best from human nature; and would reject the comfortable rationalization and complacent reassurance that competition—social Darwinism—somehow magically transmutes personal greed into social beneficence.

The Bishops are calling us to an opportunity to build a more just society. Past failures and frustrations must not lead us to abandon this goal. Can we not build a public consensus in this country that the common good takes precedence over private gain, that the poor should be fed, clothed and housed as much as the rich should be able to accumulate luxuries?

In sum, the Bishops' draft letter essentially says that this country can do better. At the very least, I think we need to listen . . . and try.

CONCLUSION

In 1960, a book entitled "The Other America" helped to awaken this country to the reality of poverty among us. If the Bishops' letter is taken seriously, then perhaps we won't need a similar book several years from now to shake us out of our lethargy once again.

Over the next few months, the Bishops draft letter will be discussed and debated within the Church. I have attempted, and will continue to attempt, to discuss and debate this issue in Congress. I hope that many of you here tonight will participate in this dialogue wherever possible. In June, the Bishops will release a second draft, and then in November, a third, and final draft, will be voted upon.

Let the debate on this Pastoral Letter become a means of shaking us out of our present lethargy, as others try to lull us into complacency by enveloping us in a cocoon of economic euphoria.

Let us use the time available to us over the next six months, to raise the issues in the Bishops' draft Pastoral Letter on the Economy to the same level of consciousness and discussion that we now experience on abortion and nuclear arms. As I have stated earlier, all three of these issues are interrelated and are part of the same cloth—all three must be woven into a seamless garment of respect and reverence for life. Abortion deals with issues affecting the creation of life, and nuclear arms raise issues concerning the possible end of life on earth. The letter I have spoken about tonight deals with the basic conditions of life as it is lived in this country and throughout the world for almost 5 billion people, day in and day out.

Let me close on a simple note. Niagara University's patron, St. Vincent, lived in 17th century France, the era of Louis XIII and Louis XIV, the "Sun King." Never in the history of the world had there been such material opulence, and rarely have there been such social disparities. To the outside world, seventeenth century France meant Versailles; but St. Vincent knew better, and worked tirelessly to provide a better life for the poor. The parallels to our time and our conditions are striking.

St. Vincent's life remains a beacon for us as we enter the 21st century. This Convocation on Peace and Justice is testimony that his followers at this University and elsewhere continue to hear the muted cries of the dispossessed, and plan to do something about it.●

THE POLITICS OF PARANOIA IN THE "CONTRA" DEBATE

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Aryeh Neier, vice chairman of Americas Watch, a distinguished and respected human rights monitoring organization, wrote the following in the April 29 New York Times:

A few days before the votes in Congress on President Reagan's plan to aid the Nicaraguan rebels, I testified at a Congressional hearing on their human rights practices. It was an ugly occasion, perhaps the ugliest of the scores of such hearings I have witnessed. It seemed to me to say something about the political climate today and, more troublingly, about the nature of American public life.

Mr. Neier went on to refer to some of the viscious, ad hominem attacks that were made on some of the witnesses by some of the Members in attendance.

Mr. Speaker, I bring this brief article to the attention of the Members because it refers to a hearing of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, which I have the honor to chair. I was personally embarrassed, as I know some other Members were as well, by the rudeness with which some of our colleagues treated witnesses who were appearing at the request of the subcommittee, simply because the views expressed by the witnesses contradicted the policy positions already held by the Members. Unable to attack the veracity of the testimony, these Members attacked the witnesses. They said things about our invited guests that would be ruled out of order if we said them about each other on the floor.

I am disturbed by the loss of civility in our Central America debate. I hope that my colleagues who engage in this behavior will examine their consciences.

The entire article follows:

THE POLITICS OF PARANOIA

(By Aryeh Neier)

A few days before the votes in Congress on President Reagan's plan to aid the Nicaraguan rebels, I testified at a Congressional hearing on their human rights practices. It was an ugly occasion, perhaps the ugliest of the scores of such hearings I have witnessed. It seemed to me to say something about the political climate today and more troublingly, about the nature of American public life.

Most members of Congress present seemed intent above all on discrediting the witnesses. At one low point, two Congressmen tried to impugn the testimony of a distinguished lawyer by linking his wife's stepbrother to the Sandinistas. What the witness had to say was disregarded.

The hearing struck me as emblematic of much of the debate on the rebels, or "contras." No doubt, the President's overheated rhetoric about the Sandinistas was a factor in poisoning the political atmosphere. Yet it does not seem fair to place all the blame on him. The debate also seems to reflect what the historian Richard Hofstadter described more than two decades ago as "the paranoid style in American politics."

As Mr. Hofstadter pointed out, the practitioners of the paranoid style perceive the enemy as "totally evil and totally unappeasable." In this vein, the Sandinistas have been portayed as trying to subvert neighboring countries, preparing to wage war against the United States, practicing genocide against their Indian minority and transforming their own country into a "totalitarian dungeon." They are also charged with being anti-Semitic and anti-Pope, driving hordes of "feet people" over the borders of the United States and even trafficking in drugs.

Not that all these things are entirely invented. "What distinguishes the paranoid style," according to Mr. Hofstadter, "is not the absence of verifiable facts (though it is true that in his extravagent passion for facts the paranoid occasionally manufactures them), but rather the curious leap in imagination that is always made at some critical point . . . from the undeniable to the unbelievable."

Mr. Hofstadter noted that a recurring aspect of the paranoid style is the significance that is attached to the renegade from the enemy cause. Certainly, Nicaraguan renegades have recently become celebrated figures in the United States, even though all we generally know about them is that, at some point, they exhibited bad judgment, either when they were allied with the Sandinistas or when they broke with them. Also, Mr. Hofstadter wrote, paranoid movements have "a magnetic attraction for demi-intellectuals" of a pedantic bent whose view of events "is far more coherent than the real world, since it leaves no room for mistakes, failures or ambiguities." Among the participants in the debate about the Sandinistas, there is more than one academic become a public figure who would seem to fit that description.

The paranoid, Mr. Hofstadter wrote, "constantly lives at a turning point: it is now or never in organizing resistance to conspiracy. Time is forever just running out." That sense of urgency is difficult to match, which may be why the paranoid style so often prevails in American politics.●

A MODEL FOR CORPORATE CITIZENSHIP

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, the Upjohn Co. is to be commended for setting a model for corporate citizenship. Last Friday, May 3, 1985, the Kalamazoo-based company announced an act of incredible generosity and public spiritedness.

In celebration of its centennial in 1986, Upjohn is giving $2 million to the community to develop an advanced math and science center for area high school students and teachers. This innovative project is one of the first of its kind in the Nation.

To further illustrate this act of generosity, I would draw the attention of my colleagues to the following Kalamazoo Gazette editorial applauding the Upjohn Co.'s commitment to the future of the Kalamazoo area.

[From the Kalamazoo Gazette, May 5, 1985]

UPJOHN'S CENTENNIAL GIFT IS EXTRAORDINARY

The Upjohn Co.'s announcement Friday of a $2 million gift of a math and science education center is a fine way to kick off Upjohn's centennial celebration in 1986. It underscores the special bond between the international pharmaceutical and chemical giant and the community in which it was founded.

Expected to open in September 1986, in renovated quarters in the Community Education Center ("Old Central") Building, the center will provide accelerated math, science and computer science education for public and private school students from throughout the Kalamazoo Valley Intermediate School District.

There are few similar programs in the country, and even those have key differences. It's expected to be a national model as a partnership between private enterprise and education.

Upjohn officials saw the need for advanced mathematics and science courses in all area school systems and brought their concept of a special center to the Kalamazoo area school officials. School officials, aware of a shortage of highly qualified and trained math and science teachers and the inability of individual districts to fully meet curriculum needs, accepted the concept with enthusiasm.

Moreover, the center operation will be turned over to the schools in a new and welcome blend of cooperation between the various school districts and the teachers unions, under the Kalamazoo Public Schools' administrative umbrella. The gift will provide top-notch facilities and also an endowment to ensure continued operation.

Top students and teachers will be brought together in an advanced technical and research environment equipped to provide instruction well beyond that which any single area high school can offer. The center also will provide area teachers with year-round technical assistance and in-service training, so the benefits will spread even further.

It's an exciting and innovative plan and reflects the positive relationship Upjohn has maintained with its home community over the past century. The $2 million gift represents a significant contribution even for an international concern with annual sales of $2.1 billion and net earnings of $173 million. But the good relationship is not all a one-way street. The area has been hospitable to the company through cooperation in the provision of services and in property tax breaks. The city of Kalamazoo presently is moving into position to grant the company a new property tax break on its proposed downtown research facility that could save Upjohn up to $1 million a year for up to 12 years.

Still, it would be easy for the Fortune 500 firm, which does business in 150 countries worldwide and owns facilities across the U.S. and internationally, to pay less attention to its own backyard. As Kalamazoo County's largest employer, providing jobs for about 7,800 county residents, Upjohn's impact is hard to measure in full. Property taxes paid by the firm to local cities, townships and school districts amounted to $11.5 million in 1984, for example. Upjohn officials figure the company's "total economic impact," on the county in 1984, including wages, goods and services procured locally, was some $441 million.

Over the years, the company has responded to special community problems and needs. There is hardly a facility or good cause that has not benefited from Upjohn support. Last year alone, Upjohn contributed $1.3 million to local non-profit human service, cultural and civic organizations.

The math and science center is an especially bold and creative venture and we applaud the Upjohn Co. for marking its 100 years as a responsible citizen with the extraordinary gift.●

THE COMMITTEE OF 21—NEW SUPPORT FOR SOVIET PRISONERS OF CONSCIENCE

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, today under the sponsorship of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus, 21 congressional wives formally launched a new human rights monitoring group focusing on political prisoners in the Soviet Union. The group—"The Committee of 21"—pairs 21 Soviet prisoners of conscience with the same number of congressional wives.

The 21 Soviet Prisoners of Conscience are leaders of the Soviet Refuseniks, Soviet citizens who have been denied the right to emigrate from the Soviet Union. The 21 leaders have been imprisoned by Soviet authorities on charges ranging from "hooliganism" to "anti-Soviet agitation," but the arrests and imprisonment of these individuals is primarily because of their leadership of the Refusenik movement and it is a clear violation of the Helsinki Final Act.

During a trip to the Soviet Union earlier this year, my wife, Annette, was asked by the Refuseniks in Moscow to form a group of congressional wives to monitor the cases of the political prisoners. They were afraid that, with a change in leadership and the possibility that the Soviet Government could again grant a larger number of exit permits, the political prisoners—the Shcharanskys, the Beguns, the Bernsteins—would be forgotten while others were allowed to emigrate. This would be a tragic circumstance, for those political prisoners have suffered the most for the goals of all Refuseniks.

Today at a press conference formally announcing the formation of the Committee of 21, an open letter "to all women of the West" from wives, mothers, fiancees, daughters, and sisters of refuseniks was made public. They told how they "are deprived of the right for happiness, normal life, tranquility and confidence in our children's and our own future." They described how "during the last months of pregnancy, searches are held of our apartments. At these searches the authorities confiscate belongings. * * * It isn't accidental that nearly every woman-refusenik who dares to give birth to a child in such conditions usually suffers from the menace of miscarriage."

Avital Shcharansky—the wife of Anatoly Shcharansky, who is one of the Prisoners of Conscience adopted by the committee—participated in the press conference. She has been separated from her husband now for years, but her commitment and conviction are an inspiration to those who work to see Refuseniks allowed to emigrate.

The Committee of 21 will coordinate efforts with other human rights groups to insure that the West does not forget the courageous men and women who languish in Soviet prisons. Every member of the committee has made the commitment to write to her adopted prisoner of conscience every 6 weeks, as well as writing to Soviet officials. They will also send packages, arrange visits, and carry out other supportive actions of these prisoners of conscience.

The purpose of this committee is not anti-Soviet or intended to be critical of the Soviet Government. In fact, its formation was announced today because of two important events that are taking place at this time.

First, today makes the opening of the Ottawa Conference of government experts on human rights as part of the Helsinki process. It is important that the Soviets observe the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, which they have already pledged to observe. Any future cooperation with the Soviet Union will be conditioned by Soviet observance of international obligations to which the Soviets have already agreed. If we are to expand cooperation with the Soviet Union, there must be an atmosphere of trust based upon the presumption that the Soviet Government will observe those agreements.

Second, tomorrow is the 40th anniversary of V-E Day—the anniversary of the Allied victory over Nazi Germany. The key to that victory was the American-Soviet alliance. Together our two countries achieved a most important victory over one of the greatest evils faced by mankind. The purpose today in forming the Committee of 21 with congressional spouses is an effort to help resuscitate the spirit of cooperation which once existed between our two countries.

Mr. Speaker, the 21 congressional spouses with the Refuseniks they have adopted are the following:

1. Delores Beilenson, the wife of Congressman Anthony Beilenson of California—Valery Senderov, a 40-year-old mathematician and resident of Moscow, arrested in June 1982, charged with anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, and sentenced to 7 years labor camp, 5 years internal exile.

2. Caroline Bonker, the wife of Congressman Don Bonker of Washington—Boris Kanevsky, a 40-year-old mathematician from Moscow, arrested in June 1982, charged with circulation of fabrications known to be false which defame the Soviet state and social system, and sentenced to 5 years internal exile.

3. Sally Dornan, the wife of Congressman Bob Dornan of California—Yuri Federov, a 41-year-old student from Moscow, was arrested in June 1970, charged with treason, anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, and stealing state property, and sentenced to 15 years in prison.

4. Valerie Frost, the wife of Congressman Martin Frost of Texas—Simon Shnirman, a 27-year-old chemical technician from Kerch, was arrested in January 1983, charged with draft evasion, and sentenced to 3 years in labor camp.

5. Jane Gephardt, the wife of Congressman Richard Gephardt of Missouri—Nadezhda Fradkova, a 37-year-old computer analyst from Leningrad, was arrested in August 1984, chared with "Parasitism", and sentenced to 2 years imprisonment.

6. Rita Gilman, the wife of Congressman Ben Gilman of New York—Feliks Kochubievsky, a 55-year-old electrical engineer from Novosibirsk, was arrested in September 1982, charged with circulation of fabrications known to be false which defame the Soviet state and social system, and sentenced to 2½ years in labor camp.

7. Theresa Heinz, the wife of Senator John Heinz of Pennsylvania—Iosef Bernstein, a 48-year-old engineer from Kiev, was arrested in November 1984, charged with resisting arrest, and sentenced to 4 years imprisonment.

8. Joanne Kemp, the wife of Congressman Jack Kemp of New York—Alexander Cherniak, a 36-year-old construction engineer from Kiev, was tried in March 1984, found guilty of forgery and embezzlement, and sentenced to 4 years imprisonment.

9. Annette Lantos, my own wife—Lev Shefer, a 54-year-old engineer from Sverdlovsk, was arrested in September 1981, charged with anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, and sentenced to 5 years imprisonment.

10. Kate Lowery, the wife of Congressman Bill Lowery of California—Anatoly Shcharansky, a 37-year-old computer technologist from Moscow, was arrested in March 1977; charged with treason, anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda; and sentenced to 3 years imprisonment and 10 years in a special regime camp.

11. Kathryn Porter, the wife of Congressman John Porter of Illinois—Zachar Zunshine, a 34-year-old physicist from Riga was arrested in March 1984, charged with circulation of fabrications known to be false which defame the Soviet state, and sentenced to 3 years imprisonment.

12. Landra Reid, the wife of Congressman Harry Reid of Nevada—Aleksandr Yakir, a 29-year-old electrical engineer from Moscow, was arrested in June 1984, charged with draft evasion, and sentenced to 2 years in a labor camp.

13. Nancy Siljander, the wife of Congressman Mark Siljander of Michigan—Stanislav Zubko, a 48-year-old chemist from Kiev, was arrested in May 1981, charged with illegal keeping of arms and illegal possession of drugs, and sentenced to 4 years labor camp.

14. Sheila Smith, the wife of Congressman Larry Smith of Florida—Yuri Tarnopolsky, a 49-year-old chemist from Kharkov, was arrested in March 1983, charged with circulation of fabrication known to be false which defame the Soviet state, and sentenced to 3 years labor camp.

15. Carol Vander Jagt, the wife of Congressman Guy Vander Jagt of Michigan—Yuli Edelshtein, a 26-year-old English teacher from Moscow, was arrested in September 1984, charged with drug possession, and sentenced to 3 years labor camp.

16. Janet Waxman, the wife of Congressman Henry Waxman of California—Mark Ocheretyansky, a 45-year-old construction engineer from Kiev, was arrested in 1983, charged with violation of passport regulations, and sentenced to 1-year labor camp.

17. Carol Williams, the wife of Congressman Pat Williams of Montana—Alexander Kholmiansky, a 35-year-old computer scientist from Moscow, was arrested in July 1984; charged with hooliganism, mailbox tampering, possession of gun ammunition; and sentenced 18 months in labor camp.

18. Wren Wirth, the wife of Congressman Tim Wirth of Colorado—Iosef Begun, a 52-year-old mathematician and Hebrew teacher from Strunino, was arrested for an unprecedented third time in November 1982, charged with anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, and sentenced to 7 years labor camp and 5 years internal exile.

19. Laurie Wyden, the wife of Congressman Ron Wyden of Oregon—Mark Nepomniashchy, a 54-year-old electrical engineer from Odessa, was arrested in October 1984, charged with circulation of false materials which defame the Soviet state, and sentenced to 3 years labor camp.

20. Millie Yatron, the wife of Congressman Gus Yatron of Pennsylvania—Yakov Levin, a 26-year-old watch technician from Odessa, was arrested in August 1984, charged with circulation of false materials which defame the Soviet state, and sentenced to 3 years labor camp.

21. CeCe Zorinsky, the wife of Senator Edward Zorinsky of Nebraska—Moshe Abramov, a 29-year-old ritual slaughterer from Samarkand, was arrested in December 1983, charged with hooliganism, and sentenced to 3 years imprisonment, which was subsequently modified to "working for the national economy."

Mr. Speaker, this fine committee of congressional spouses will make an important contribution in keeping alive the spirit of the Refuseniks, who have suffered so much. I am pleased to bring this fine organization to the attention of the Congress.●

HELP MOROCCO, A FRIEND IN NEED

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, the Kingdom of Morocco was one of the first countries in the world to extend diplomatic recognition to the newly independent United States of America in the 1780's. That friendship has deepened over the last two centuries, and today our relationship with Morocco is one of the closest and most important that we enjoy with any country.

Morocco is also a friend in need. Last week's edition of the New Republic has an article that describes the difficulties posed to Morocco by the so-called Polisario Front, yet another so-called liberation movement that in fact has no legitimate claim to the support of anyone in the territory that is ostensibly to be liberated.

The article discusses the specious, even bizarre, nature of the Polisario Front and goes on to present a strong case for maintaining an adequate foreign assistance program for our friend, Morocco. Since Congress seems determined to have a hand in managing our country's relations with Morocco, the New Republic suggests some ideas about how we could best go about it.

I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues at this point in the RECORD:

[From the New Republic, May 6, 1985]

FRIEND IN NEED

Of all the opera bouffe movements for "national liberation" perhaps the most preposterous is the Popular Front for the Liberation of Saquiyya al-Hamra and Rio do Oro. Usually referred to as Polisario, it lays claim to the territory of Morocco that was once the Spanish Sahara. The population of the region, a vast and desolate stretch of desert that contains substantial phosphate deposits, does not exceed 100,000. These souls do not constitute a nation or even a body politic in any meaningful sense of the term. Their struggle is against the elements, a primordial struggle altogether alien to the ideological wars mounted by Algeria (and, in the past, also by Libya) in the name of the indigenous inhabitants.

This, of course, is the key to the conflict: Polisario is a front, but not a front for the Western Saharans, who have neither the time nor the inclination for such politics. It is a front for Algeria, whose ambitions in the area are inversely proportional to the legitimacy of its interests. Not that there aren't any locals enlisted in Polisario; there are the usual sort of restless brigands who, in a time of transition, are drawn to revolutionary dogma and to revolutionary violence. Polisario is heavily armed by the Algerians, who themselves have a long history of animus to the moderate Moroccan monarchy. It has taken to shooting up the Spanish fishing fleet off the Saharan coasts and harassing Morocco's soldiers in the desert. It also assassinates, practices sabotage, and tortures. One thing Polisario won't countenance, however, is a referendum. Why not? For the usual reason such "freedom movements" don't want the people to vote: they'd lose. instead of elections, they've announced a government in exile, which the Organization of African Unity has admitted to its roster as a member state.

In the very difficult political circumstances of the Islamic world, Morocco has been a faithful friend of the United States. It is host, for example, to the largest Voice of America facility in the world. Of course, some of the country's political maneuverings elude understanding. After having prepared the way for the Camp David agreements, King Hassan denounced them. More recently, he has teamed up, at least nominally, with Colonel Ammar al-Qadhafi, the scourge of North Africa. Still, we have a substantial interest in the stability of this pro-Western and moderate Moslem regime only eight miles from Spain. We have acknowledged that interest for some time through economic assistance and military aid, last year to the tune of $90.7 million and $44.6 million, respectively. This year the administration has asked for $88.8 million and $51.9 million. Some of the money is designed to help Morocco defend itself against Polisario, and that's as it should be.

But there are always a few dreamy congressmen who want us to behave as if the world were a harmonious place. Representative Howard Wolpe of Michigan, chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa of the House Foreign Relations Committee, has introduced an amendment to the foreign aid legislation that would prevent U.S. military personnel from training Moroccan soldiers so long as a "conflict between Morocco and the Polisario Front continues in the Western Sahara." Of course, if there were no conflict, Morocco might not need our help. Behind Wolpe's silly language lurks the silly notion that every conflict can be solved through conciliation. But this is precisely the kind of statement that encourages Polisario and its Algerian patrons not to conciliate. Representative Stephen Solarz of New York has introduced an alternative amendment that makes American training in the Western Sahara dependent on "an internationally recognized settlement" of the conflict. It is a distinction without a difference.

Representatives Tom Lantos of California and Gerald Solomon of New York see the situation in North Africa more realistically. They have offered a bipartisan amendment that acknowledges the reasons for our aid: "to support Morocco's legitimate defense needs and to discourage aggression by any country in North Africa against another." One charge no one has made is that Morocco is aggressing against anyone. This is the amendment that should pass.●

WORDS, WORDS, WORDS

HON. GEO. W. CROCKETT, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit for the RECORD an article by Anthony Lewis that appeared in the Sunday, May 5, 1985, New York Times.

In his editorial, Mr. Lewis suggests that the Reagan administration tends to rely on inflated rhetoric to help justify foreign policy decisions when it finds that no rational explanations are readily available. The danger of this tendency towards exaggeration is that questions of national interest can hinge more upon Mr. Reagan's choice of words than on consistent principles of foreign policy.

Mr. Lewis points in particular to the administration's recent decision to impose an economic embargo on Nicaragua, a country of 3 million desperately poor people whom the President has described as an "extraordinary" and "unusual" threat to the national security of our Nation. According to Mr. Reagan, the Nicaraguan Government's imposition of "totalitarian internal rule" and carrying out of "aggressive activities in its region" make an embargo necessary to protect our interests.

If we accept these facts, and if we agree that opposition to such activities is one of our foreign policy priorities, how then, as Mr. Lewis asks, can the Reagan administration reconcile its policy of "constructive engagement" with the racist regime in South Africa, which carries out equally "totalitarian" and "aggressive" policies against its own nonwhite population and its neighbors? The Government of South Africa today denies basic civil and political rights to over three-quarters of the population, represses all political opposition, invades, and destabilizes the neighboring states in southern Africa, and defies world opinion by continuing its illegal occupation of Namibia.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to read this very important article, and to recognize the grave inconsistencies that lie at the very heart of this administration's foreign policy.

[From the New York Times, May 5, 1985]

WORDS, WORDS, WORDS

(By Anthony Lewis)

There was a time when we expected the President of the United States to use the English language with a certain respect for its meaning and dignity. No more. The degradation of political rhetoric has gone so far that we are numbed. We react not at all when the President uses words as mere instruments of ideology, mocking truth.

How far the process has gone was evident in the Executive Order issued by President Reagan last week to impose an embargo on Nicaragua. "I find," he said, "that the policies and actions of the Government of Nicaragua constitute an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States."

AN EMBARGO BASED ON HYPERBOLE

Stop and think for a moment about those words. Nicaragua is a country of three million people, desperately poor and backward, shattered by a terrible earthquake, riven by a civil war. Can anyone conceivably believe that it presents a "threat" to the United States? An "extraordinary threat"?

What words remain, after such preposterous hyperbole, to describe a situation that would really threaten our national security? That is the trouble with cheapening the coin of language: When everything is urgent, nothing is.

The reaction of our allies to the embargo of Nicaragua is further evidence of what Presidential words have become. If the leading country of the alliance were facing an extraordinary or even a moderately serious threat to its national security, the allies would naturally care. But at the summit conference in Bonn they made clear they did not agree with the embargo—and Secretary of State reported that reaction as if it didn't matter.

Then there are the grounds stated by President Reagan for imposing the embargo. If taken seriously, they would establish an important new principle of American foreign policy: that the United States is prepared to cut off all trade and transportation links with a country that carries out "aggressive activities" in its region, "subverts its neighbors," and imposes "totalitarian internal rule."

Consider, then, the case of Country X. It has illegally occupied a neighboring land for nearly 15 years now, resisting pleas by the United States and most other governments to get out. It has enforced the occupation by Draconian measures, arresting local opponents in large numbers, holding them for years without trial, torturing them.

Country X has also sent its army into another nearby country in recent years. It has supported a terrorist war against still another country. Last year it agreed to stop that war; but the terrorism still has continued.

Internally, over the last 10 years X has stripped eight million of its people of their citizenship. It forbids 73 percent of its people to vote, regardless of their educational or other qualifications, solely because of their race. For 25 years it has imprisoned, tortured, killed and exiled the leaders of the opposition to its totalitarian system.

If President Reagan were serious about the grounds for his embargo on Nicaragua, he would cut off all trade and air links with South Africa. For of course South Africa is Country X. It occupies Namibia. Its army spent years in Angola, raided Lesotho and supported terrorism in Mozambique. Internally, it uses its army and police to enforce a system of state racism that deprives most South Africans of elementary rights.

The Nicaraguan election last fall had its faults. But if anything like it happened in South Africa, it would be regarded as a miracle of freedom—and would surely be so hailed by George Shultz. Imagine a South Africa in which people were allowed to vote regardless of race.

Nobody claims that Nicaragua's Army has invaded another country. The South African Army occupies Namibia and has been in three neighboring countries. By destabilizing activities or political means, South Africa presses the whole region to conform to its views.

South African activities that affront U.S. notions of humanity or respect for frontiers get only plaintive little taps on the wrist from the Reagan Administration. When South Africa arrested leaders of the opposition United Democratic Front this winter on treason charges, the State Department actually issued a statement calling on both the regime and its opponents "to look beyond shortsighted actions and tactical postures."

When the police killed 19 blacks at Uitenhage, President Reagan blamed the victims.

The President's words about Nicaragua, then, express no general foreign policy principle. They represent only an obsessive fear of the Sandinistas. American action designed to limit Nicaraguan connections with the Soviet Union would be understandable. But obsessions do not produce rational results. And words divorced from reason do not increase credibility.●

H.R. 2410, THE HEALTH PROFESSIONS EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE AMENDMENTS OF 1985

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADIGAN], I am pleased to introduce H.R. 2410, the Health Professions Educational Assistance Amendments of 1985. This bill reflects the provisions of H.R. 2251, which was amended and reported favorably by the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment on May 2, 1985. It would reauthorize and revise the health professions educational programs in title VII of the Public Health Service Act.

This legislation should never have been necessary. Last year the work of this subcommittee led to a bill that passed the Congress by an overwhelming, bipartisan vote. But President Reagan pocket-vetoed that legislation, giving the Congress no opportunity to overrride. H.R. — is essentially identical to the provisions in that vetoed bill.

The President's pocket-veto created chaos among students who do not know if they will have funds to continue, or begin, their professional training. This action has also prevented from taking effect numerous provisions needed to reduce student loan default rates and strengthen collection procedures.

This year the President has again proposed to eliminate the educational assistance programs in title VII.

The administration's rationale for these dramatic proposals is that there is "a steadily increasing supply of health professionals and greatly improved distribution of health care practitioners among medically underserved areas of the country."

That argument draws on the current perception that there is or will soon be a surplus of physicians. The administration, however, ignores the actual purpose of these programs:

Scholarships and subsidized loans are targeted to financially disadvantaged students.

Program support is directed to meet persistent national shortages in primary care, public health and other disciplines, not specialized doctors.

Even with an increase in the total number of physicians, these national needs would go unmet.

Clear national shortages exist in each of these areas. Termination or reduction of Federal support will have numerous disastrous consequences:

Health professional opportunities will be restricted only to the children of wealthy families. Past gains in minority enrollments in the health professions, which already are being reversed, will be lost.

Efforts to meet national needs in primary care, public health and other disciplines will be seriously damaged; faced with rising debts, medical students will prefer more lucrative subspecialties.

Programs in title VII of the Public Health Service Act include:

First. HEAL insurance for market-rate student loans;

Second. HPSL low-interest student loans;

Third. Scholarships for students of exceptional financial need;

Fourth. Capitation assistance to schools of public health;

Fifth. Support for departments of family medicine;

Sixth. The area health education centers;

Seventh. Support for programs to train physician assistants;

Eighth. Programs and traineeships in general internal medicine, general pediatrics, family medicine, and general dentistry;

Ninth. Assistance for students from disadvantaged backgrounds;

Tenth. Project grant authorities for health professions schools;

Eleventh. Support for schools with advanced financial distress; and Twelfth. Support for programs and traineeships in health administration, public health and preventive medicine.

This bill would also:

For the first time, set aside 50 percent of new Federal HPSL loan funds for students from disadvantaged backgrounds;

Provide for the improvement of health professional training in geriatrics; and Substantially strengthen the loan insurance fund and improve collections under the HEAL Program.

We cannot sacrifice such basic needs. These small programs provide critical training necessary for appropriate care of the American people. These programs have enjoyed strong bipartisan support in the past, and I hope that will continue.●

ERA WINS AWARD AS 1985 SBA PRIME CONTRACTOR OF THE YEAR

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today it is with great pride that I commend Engineering Research Associates [ERA], a northern Virginia firm, for winning the award as the Small Business Administration's 1985 Prime Contractor of the Year.

ERA was founded in 1977 as a high technology organization specializing in computer-based electronic systems. The principal applications of these techniques include: tactical reconnaissance, electronic warfare, and computer-based training systems. During the past year and a half, the company has won two multimillion dollar procurements in competition against some of the country's corporate giants. These procurements are the Air Force's Sentinel Bright Voice Processing Training System and the Navy's Thetis B Program.

ERA is entirely owned by its employees. Since 1978 the firm has experienced a compound growth of approximately 30 percent per year. In 1984, the company's revenues exceeded $12 million; the company has shown a profit every year since its inception.

ERA's success is a tribute to a free enterprise system which makes it possible for innovation and entrepreneurship to take its place alongside established corporate America in fostering this country's economic growth and national security. Since the award the company has received is such a prestigious one, I am honored to enter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following names of all ERA employees during the year leading to this award, and offer my personal congratulations to each of them.

STOCKMAN SEEMS SIDETRACKED IN HIS CASE AGAINST AMTRAK

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, a sound rail passenger system is indispensible to this Nation's economic infrastruture. As a modern industrial nation, we should be strengthening Amtrak, rather than entertaining proposals which would spell the end of this essential service.

At attempt to reduce the Federal budget by slashing Amtrak's appropriations would rank among the most short-sighted and illusory cuts made by this Congress.

By decimating the Amtrak portion of the Federal budget, we would be cutting bone and muscle, rather than fat.

Tom Wicker has written an incisive article laying out some of the facts and figures behind the Amtrak budget issue.

I commend this article to the attention of my colleagues, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD:

STOCKMAN SEEMS SIDETRACKED IN HIS CASE AGAINST AMTRAK

(By Tom Wicker)

NEW YORK.—David Stockman, boy genius of the Reagan administration, threw a tantrum the other day before a Senate subcommittee. If senators did not have "the courage, the foresight, the comprehension" to "pull the plug" on what he called an "irredeemable" Amtrak rail passenger system, he saw little hope for deficit reduction or for avoiding a "whopping tax increase."

There, there, little man. It won't be as bad as all that, if Amtrak survives. Take Elizabeth Dole's word for it.

As secretary of transportation, she affirmed last September that she shared the view of Federal Railroad Administrator John H. Riley that Amtrak had made "great strides" toward "modern, cost-efficient intercity rail passenger service"—running in 1985 "more route miles than it did in 1981 at approximately 28 percent lower funding."

Mrs. Dole, far from sharing young David's hysteria about what he cutely called a "mobile money-burning machine," had asked for a $765-million Amtrak subsidy for fiscal 1986.

Stockman and President Reagan squawk frequently about a $35-per-head subsidy that each Amtrak passenger supposedly receives. This prestidigitation requires adding the Amtrak subsidy to the amount that Amtrak business travelers can deduct from their income taxes, and dividing by 20 million passengers; presto! $35 a head.

Young David is so distraught that he apprently forgets some of the other numbers—surely so brilliant a budget director knows them—he might be expected to crunch. For example:

Sixty-five percent of airline revenues are for business travel; so for each airlines passenger, business travel deductions alone provide a subsidy of $33. In 1984, moreover, air-traffic control cost the federal government $2.1 billion, or $9 for each of 221 million air passengers; so by young David's irrelevant arithmetic, the federal subsidy per air passenger was $42.

From its ticket revenues—which pay 60 percent of its costs—and subsidy, Amtrak is required to spend $116 million annually to maintain the Northeast Corridor right-of-way, over which also move the freight trains of Conrail (which earned $500 million in 1984) and every rail commuter service from Boston to Washington.

If, as young David urges, Congress pulls the plug on Amtrak—a House subcommittee has voted to continue the rail system in operation—the government will have to pay $2.1 billion in labor-termination costs over the next six years, an obligation inherited from the private railroads; $3 billion in modern locomotives, equipment, specialized shops and Northeast Corridor plant will be scrapped, with little market for salvage; and about 150,000 jobs in affected business sectors will be jeopardized (25,000 railroad employees will be thrown out of jobs).

But the young genius told the senators that few programs ranked lower than Amtrak "in terms of the good they do, the purpose they serve and the national need." Boyish overstatement again—Amtrak carried 20 million passengers last year, while receiving a smaller federal subsidy (in current dollars) than in 1978; and in the Northeast Corridor 160,000 commuters on various services rode over Amtrak-maintained right-of-way every day.

The Empire State Passengers' Association points out that at least 1,200 people board a train daily in Albany, N.Y., alone; and asks, pertinently, who—if Amtrak goes—will pay to operate Penn Station for the great tide of commuters from Long Island and New Jersey into and out of New York City? Killing Amtrak also would nullify the two bond issues New Yorkers have voted for high-speed rail service, with $100 million already invested.

Aside from New York and the Northeast (never high concerns for Reaganites), Amtrak serves 25 American communities (and surrounding regions) that have no air or bus service, 52 more that have no bus service and 94 that have no air service. Almost a million passengers got on or off trains at places without bus service in fiscal 1984.

So young David shouldn't get so wrought up about Amtrak; and returning White House colleagues might calm him with news that the West German government, planning infrastructure investments for the next decade, has decided to put 34 billion marks into its railroads and only 28 billion into its highway network. Now that's a grown-up decision.●

HOUSE CON. RESOLUTION 135

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I voted for House Concurrent Resolution 135, which expressed the sense of the Congress that the President should not visit a cemetery where Nazi Waffen SS were buried. I also was one of dozens of Congressmen who signed a letter to the President making the same point, and encouraging him to visit the site of Nazi concentration camp. In addition to these efforts, I personally called the White House to speak with the President's advisers to counsel against the published itinerary and also signed a letter to Chancellor Helmut Kohl requesting that he release President Reagan from his promise to visit Bitburg Cemetery. I also expressed the hope that if the President decided to go ahead with his scheduled visit he would, using his gift of communication, be able to put the visit in a clear and positive perspective.

I believe that the President was able to accomplish just that and Mr. Speaker I'd like to submit a copy of President Reagan's moving Bitburg speech into the RECORD. The speech was a classic:

I have just come from the cemetery where German war dead lay at rest. No one could visit here without deep and conflicting emotions. I felt great sadness that history could be filled with such waste, destruction, and evil. But my heart was also lifted by the knowledge that from the ashes has come hope, and that from the terrors of the past we have built 40 years of peace and freedom—and reconciliation among our nations.

This visit has stirred many emotions in the American and German people, too. I have received many letters since first deciding to come to Bitburg Cemetery, some supportive, others deeply concerned and questioning, others opposed. Some old wounds have been reopened, and this I regret very much, because this should be a time of healing. To the veterans and families of American servicemen who still carry the scars and feel the painful losses of that war, our gesture of reconciliation with the German people today in no way minimizes our love and honor for those who fought and died for our country. They gave their lives to rescue freedom in its darkest hour. The alliance of democratic nations that guards the freedom of millions in Europe and America today stands as living testimony that their noble sacrifice was not in vain.

No, their sacrifice was not in vain. I have to tell you that nothing will ever fill me with greater hope than the sight of two former war heroes who met today at the Bitburg ceremony, each among the bravest of the brave, each an enemy of the other 40 years ago, each a witness to the horrors of war. But today they came together, American and German, Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway and Gen. Johanner Steinhoff, reconciled and united for freedom, they reached over the graves to one another like brothers and grasped their hands in peace.

To the survivors of the Holocaust: Your terrible suffering has made you ever vigilant against evil. Many of you are worried that reconciliation means forgetting. I promise you, we will never forget. I have just come this morning from Bergen-Belsen, where the horror of that terrible crime, the Holocaust, was forever burned upon my memory. No, we will never forget, and we say with the victims of that Holocaust: "Never again."

The war against one man's totalitarian dictatorship was not like other wars. The evil world of Nazism turned all values upside down. Nevertheless, we can mourn the German war dead today as human beings, crushed by a vicious ideology.

There are over 2,000 buried in Bitburg Cemetery. Among them are 48 members of the SS. The crimes of the SS must rank among the most heinous in human history. But others buried there were simply soldiers in the German army. How many were fanatical followers of a dictator and willfully carried out his cruel orders? And how many were conscripts, forced into service during the death throes of the Nazi war machine? We do not know. Many, however, we know from the dates on their tombstones, were only teenagers at the time. There is one boy buried there who died a week before his 16th birthday.

There were thousands of such soldiers to whom Nazism meant no more than a brutal end to a short life. We do not believe in collective guilt. Only God can look into the human heart. All these men have met their Supreme Judge, and they have been judged by Him, as we shall all be judged.

Our duty today is to mourn the human wreckage of totalitarianism, and today, in Bitburg Cemetery, we commemorated the potential good and humanity that was consumed back then, 40 years ago. Perhaps if that 15-year-old soldier had lived, he would have joined his fellow countrymen in building this new democratic Federal Republic of Germany devoted to human dignity and the defense of freedom that we celebrate today. Or perhaps his children or his grandchildren might be among you here today at the Bitburg Air Base, where new generations of Germans and Americans join together in friendship and common cause, dedicating their lives to preserving peace and guarding the security of the free world.

Too often in the past, each war only planted the seeds of the next. We celebrate today the reconciliation between our two nations that has liberated us from that cycle of destruction. Look at what together we have accomplished. We who were enemies are now friends. We who were bitter adversaries are now the strongest of allies. In the place of fear we have sown trust, and out of the ruins of war has blossomed an enduring peace. Tens of thousands of Americans have served in this town over the years. As the mayor of Bitburg has said, in that time there have been some 6,000 marriages between Germans and Americans, and many thousands of children have come from these unions. This is the real symbol of our future together, a future to be filled with hope, friendship, and freedom.

The hope we see now could sometimes even be glimpsed in the darkest days of the war. I'm thinking of one special story—that of a mother and her young son living alone in a modest cottage in the middle of the woods. One night as the Battle of the Bulge exploded not far away, three young American soldiers arrived at their door—standing in the snow, lost behind enemy lines. All were frostbitten; one was badly wounded. Even though sheltering the enemy was punishable by death, she took them in and made them a supper with some of her last food.

And then, they heard another knock at the door. This time four German soldiers stood there. The woman was afraid, but she quickly said with a firm voice, "There will be no shooting here." She made all the soldiers lay down their weapons, and they all joined in the makeshift meal. Heinz and Willi, it turned out, were only 16. The corporal was the oldest at 23. Their natural suspicion dissolved in the warmth and comfort of the cottage. One of the Germans, a former medical student, tended the wounded American.

Now, listen to the rest of the story through the eyes of one who was there, now a grown man, but that young lad that had been her son. He said, "Then mother said grace. I noticed that there were tears in her eyes as she said the old, familiar words, 'Komm, Herr Jesus. Be our guest.' And as I looked around the table, I saw tears, too, in the eyes of the battle-weary soldiers, boys again, some from America, some from Germany, all far from home."

That night—as the storm of war tossed the world—they had their own private armistice. The next morning the German corporal showed the Americans how to get back behind their own lines. They all shook hands and went their separate ways. That happened to be Christmas Day, 40 years ago.

Those boys reconciled briefly in the midst of war. Surely, we allies in peacetime should honor the reconciliation of the last 40 years.

To the people of Bitburg, our hosts and the hosts of our servicemen: Like that generous woman 40 years ago, you make us feel very welcome. Vielen Dank [Thank you].

And to the men and women of Bitburg Air Base, I just want to say that we know that, even with such wonderful hosts, you job is not an easy one. You serve around the clock, far from home, always ready to defend freedom. We are grateful, and we're very proud of you.

Four decades ago, we waged a great war to lift the darkness of evil from the world, to let men and women in this country and in every country live in the sunshine of liberty. Our victory was great, and the Federal Republic, Italy, and Japan are now in the community of free nations. But the struggle for freedom is not complete, for today much of the world is still cast in totalitarian darkness.

Twenty-two years ago, President John F. Kennedy went to the Berlin Wall and proclaimed that he, too, was a Berliner. Today, freedom-loving people around the world must say: I am a Berliner, I am a Jew in a world still threatened by anti-Semitism, I am an Afghan, and I am a prisoner of the Gulag, I am a refugee in a crowded boat foundering off the coast of Vietnam, I am a Laotian, a Cambodian, a Cuban, and a Miskito Indian in Nicaragua. I, too, am a potential victim of totalitarianism.

The one lesson of World War II, the lesson of Nazism, is that freedom must always be stronger than totalitarianism, and that good must always be stronger than evil.The moral measure of our two nations will be found in the resolve we show to preserve liberty, to protect life, and to honor and cherish all God's children.

That is why the free, democratic Federal Republic of Germany is such a profound and hopeful testament to the human spirit. We cannot undo the crimes and wars of yesterday, nor call the millions back to life. But we can give meaning to the past by learning its lessons and making a better future. We can let our pain drive us to greater efforts to heal humanity's suffering.

Today I traveled 220 miles from Bergen-Belsen and, I feel, 40 years in time. With the lessons of the past firmly in our minds, we have turned a new, brighter page in history. One of the many who wrote me about this visit was a young woman who had recently been bar mitzvahed. She urged me to lay the wreath at Bitburg Cemetery in honor of the future of Germany, and that is what we have done. On this 40th anniversary of World War II, we mark the day when the hate, the evil, and the obscenities ended, and we commemorate the rekindling of the democratic spirit in Germany.

There is much to make us hopeful on this historic anniversary. One of the symbols of that hope came a little while ago when we heard a German band playing the American national anthem, and an American band playing the German national anthem. While much of the world still huddles in the darkness of oppression, we can see a new dawn of freedom sweeping the globe. And we can see—in the new democracies of Latin America, in the new economic freedoms and prosperity in Asia, in the slow movement toward peace in the Middle East, and in the strengthening alliance of democratic nations in Europe and America—that the light from that dawn is growing stronger.

Together let us gather in that light, and walk out of the shadow. Let us live in peace. Thank you, and God bless you all.●

A TRIBUTE TO SARAH McCLENDON

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 22, the University of Missouri School of Journalism paid a deserved and, I believe overdue, tribute to one of this Nation's most effective journalists, Sarah McClendon.

On the concluding day of its Annual Journalism Week Program at Columbia, MO, the school presented its annual honor medals to seven outstanding leaders in their fields. One of the 1985 Missouri honor medals was presented Monday evening to Mrs. McClendon.

I should point out to the House that these medals, coming from one of the Nation's leading institutions in the field of journalism education, are marks of great distinction. They are awarded only to men and women who have made great and lasting contributions to the field in which they work and to the people they serve.

Sarah McClendon, a correspondent who is familiar to many of us in this House because of her long experience in covering Washington, is a native of my State of Texas—and as a Texan, I am proud to salute her. She is also a graduate of the institution which honored her. One of a number of Missouri journalism graduates who have compiled distinguished records here in Washington as well as many other parts of the Nation and the world.

The Missouri medal winners are not cited for one specific story or article. This is a prize given on the basis of contributions to journalism over many years of dedicated service.

In Sarah McClendon's case, this award was based on her record of enterprise and independence in coverage of national and regional news over her years in the Capital—for her courage in asking the hard questions that had to be asked for the sake of her readers in Texas and elswhere—and for her skill and diligence in digging out the news that matters from the White House, the Congress, and the rest of the Washington scene. And beyond that, I believe Sarah McClendon was also being honored for her determined and continuing work over many years to fight for the rights of women in journalism—a fight that has produced some impressive results.

Mr. Speaker, I want to add my congratulations to Sarah McClendon for this latest public evidence of the high regard in which she and her work are held. But I also want to congratulate the University of Missouri's Journalism School for having the perception to know a distinguished journalist when it sees one.●

THE ASBESTOS HYSTERIA

HON. WAYNE DOWDY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. DOWDY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in recent months, much attention has been focused on the problems of asbestos in our Nation's schools. There has been grave concern over the potential health risk to children in schools because of asbestos-containing materials.

It is ironic that asbestos, once specified by building codes, architects, and engineers to protect and save lives from fire, has become a source of anxiety for parents, students, and educators.

It is important that we determine under what conditions asbestos-containing materials pose a significant health risk and how we can best eliminate that risk.

Caution must be exercised in our efforts, because indications are that improper removal can cause relatively high exposures to workers and can leave a residual asbestos concentration in a building that is higher than it was before removal.

The Detroit News recently ran an excellent four-part series on asbestos during the week of March 3 of this year which I hope that all my colleagues will take a moment to read. Because of the length of the article, I have instead submitted the following editorial from the Detroit News for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Environmental Protection Agency long ago should have set a national air monitoring standard for asbestos in schools. Individual States are now beginning to set State standards because our Federal agency has not moved forward. EPA should begin at once its procedure for setting air monitoring standards.

[From the Detroit News, Mar. 7, 1985]

THE ASBESTOS HYSTERIA

Special writer Michael J. Bennett's four-part series on the asbestos dilemma, which ended yesterday, revealed a host of disturbing facts about the way the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is handling the asbestos issue. The asbestos commonly used in school buildings, for example, may not be nearly as dangerous to health as has been alleged. Even if it were, the current hysterical rush to remove it could do more harm than good. We believe Mr. Bennett also raised serious questions of whether science has been twisted to serve political ends.

The EPA ruled three years ago that asbestos posed a serious health hazard, and that school buildings should be inspected for its presence. Asbestos was widely used for a time after World War II as insulation for pipes and to make decorative ceilings. If material that crumbles is found, school boards must notify parents and staff, and then decide on what, if anything, to do about it.

Asbestos in school buildings became a major national issue when the Service Employes International Union got its hands on studies by Dr. Irving J. Selikoff of New York City's Mt. Sinai Hospital. Dr. Selikoff was tracking a high incidence of lung cancer among World War II shipyard workers who installed asbestos as an insulation material. The union that represents school custodians demanded asbestos rules from the EPA, ostensibly to protect members' health. (A major removal program may also provide lucrative job opportunities for contractors and unions, it's worth noting.)

The EPA should have recognized early on that there was something imperfect about the Selikoff studies. Other scientists said that the shipyard workers utilized red and blue asbestos, not the white variety used by the building trades. It is true that red and blue asbestos fibers lodge in the lungs and may cause cancer 20 or 30 years later, but it is also true that the lungs seem to easily expel white asbestos fibers.

Further, more than 80 percent of the shipyard cancer victims were heavy smokers, and their lung X-rays show the same lesions that would be on the lungs of heavy smokers. Dr. Selikoff himself has sharply reduced his own estimates of the potential hazards of white asbestos. First, the Quebec government studied the health of women in two asbestos-milling towns, where air and water are laden with white asbestos fibers, and found no link to cancer. Further, some EPA officials have said consistently that it is impossible to write an air quality rule on asbestos that makes any sense because the scientific knowledge about these fibers is so uncertain.

The EPA subjected its studies to the peer review of four scientists who all treated them harshly. They questioned the methodology, and said some of the scientific premises were wrong. In academe, harsh peer review is enough to kill such studies. Nevertheless, the EPA, eager to avoid the wrath of environmental extremists and opportunistic politicians, ordered a school inspection program.

By leaving it to individual school districts, EPA would get political credit for "doing something" but would avoid the sticky question of who should finance an expensive cleanup. Washington offers grants and loan guarantees totaling $50 million for asbestos removal, but the total cost could be many times that amount. In Michigan alone, the cost would be $73 million, it's estimated.

New evidence shows that the best thing to do about asbestos is leave it alone if it is not flaking off, or encase damaged areas with plastic paint or other covering. Complete removal coats shelves, furniture, floors, ceilings, hot air pipes, and everything else with the very fibers the program was intended to contain. Removal is therefore a self-defeating option at a cost no school board can afford.

Reporter Bennett made some telling additional points that go to the heart of the whole environmental debate in this country. Environmental extremism is difficult to defend against because scientists can't prove a negative—they can't prove that cancer or other risks from any given substances don't exist. So irresponsible extremists can always play on the fears of risks that might exist.

The asbestos case also rests on the "one fiber can kill" argument. That is, no amount of asbestos can be allowed in the environment, because as little as one fiber supposedly can make the body go haywire. This can't be proved (or disproved), but for extremists seeking to impose their values on society it has the virtue of forestalling attempts to weigh risks versus benefits. As Mr. Bennett pointed out, environmental activism exists not to be satisfied, at least on environmental concerns. Many who profess environmental concerns actually are pursuing larger political goals—to remake society along the lines they prefer. Asbestos is a classic example of the strategy. In that it seeks to use parental hysteria over the safety of children, however, it is all the more reprehensible.

The series most important contribution was to point out that many supposedly "objective" scientists have willingly lent their prestige to the asbestos scare without careful consideration of the evidence. We suspect it's not the first time that has happened. This sort of abuse, if unchecked, will wind up creating great public skepticism about science and cost society dearly. The EPA should review the evidence impartially, and state and local officials should put a hold on crash programs to remove asbestos until a clearer picture of the risks and benefits emerges.●

NATIONAL PARKS AND ACID RAIN

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, while much has been said and written about acid rain, the body of information to date on the subject has tended to focus on the Eastern United States. Recently, the World Resources Institute [WRI], a nonprofit policy research center, published a report describing acidic deposition in the West. The report entitled "The American West's Acid Rain Test" was the result of over 18 months of research on the characteristics relevant to acid deposition in the Western United States.

The risk of damage to various Western ecosystems is only now becoming apparent as research information has become more readily available. Under language I coauthored to the Energy Security Act of 1980, a national monitoring system for acid deposition was established. This research effort, the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program [NAPAP], is expanding the base of information available on acid deposition. Under this program, the Western United States, for the first time, has come under close review.

Those Western monitoring sites are now beginning to report data needed to analyze the potential risk of acid rain to the West. What this data and analyses are pointing to is that the geophysical characteristics of the Western United States make potential for damage from acid rain different from what is being experienced in the Eastern United States. The WRI report notes that the soil characteristics, precipitation patterns, and geological characteristics differ greatly in the West from the East. In certain instances, these characteristics increase the potential acid rain risk; in other instances, the risk is lessened. The WRI report notes that much of the precipitation in the Western United States is in the form of snow. The report noted that studies have revealed that as much as half the acids in snowpacks can be released in the first 10 percent of melt, creating "acid pulses" that can severely harm sensitive aquatic systems. Even within a given area the potential danger can differ. According to the WRI, indications are that acidic deposition occurs at high elevation because the concentrations of acids exceed those of natural alkaline materials. It goes on to note that at lower elevations, deposition is less acidic because relatively more acid is neutralized.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Recreation, I am interested in the acid deposition data being developed in the West because many of the monitoring sites are at or near national park units. Already, collected data has raised some disturbing developments that affect national park units. The WRI report notes that episodes of temporary complete acidification of portions of lakes have been observed in the West. Such was the case at Emerald Lake in Sequoia National Park. The report goes on to note the risk of surface water acidification at 11 national park units located in high mountainous regions. High ozone levels have been documented at Yosemite and Sequoia National Parks. In the Southwest, important archaeological ruins—sandstone formations—at the Mesa Verde National Park are vulnerable to acid damage.

Based on the reports of air quality problems experienced at national park units around the country, the Subcommittee on National Parks and Recreation has scheduled oversight hearings for May 20 and 21, 1985, on air quality in the parks. We will be interested in further exploring some of the points of concern raised by the WRI report, as well as the air quality problems the national parks in other regions are facing.

Our national park units, so often referred to as our "crown jewels," represent a great resource to the people of the United States. Many of us are renewed and refreshed as we admire the wonder and beauty of these resources. Threats to these resources, be it from air and water pollution or development, must be addressed in a responsible manner if we are to pass on to future generations the majestic legacy of our National Park System.●

INTRODUCING BY REQUEST THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL TO REAUTHORIZE THE RAILROAD SAFETY PROGRAM

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, by request, the President's proposal to reauthorize the Federal Railroad Safety Act.

This bill authorizes $27.267 million in fiscal year 1986 and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1987 for the Rail Safety Program. Authorizations are not included in the bill for either the State Participation Program or for research and development activities.

The bill also includes a technical amendment to the Federal Railroad Safety Act. Under section 208 of the act, the Secretary of Transportation is authorized to issue subpoenas and require the production of documents. However, there is no specific provision for the enforcement of subpoenas and orders in court. The technical amendment would clarify that the Federal district courts have jurisdiction to enforce such subpoenas and orders.

I strongly support the reauthorization of the Federal Railroad Safety Program, and recognize that the safety of rail operations in this Nation is essential to vital passenger transportation services and efficient freight transportation. In recent years, the safety of railroad operations has greatly improved. This improvement has been accomplished in large part through cooperative efforts of both rail labor and management, along with the guidance of the Federal Railroad Administration.

The Energy and Commerce Committee is scheduled to consider legislation concerning reauthorization of the Federal Railroad Safety Program this week. Therefore, I feel that it is important that this bill be introduced so that my colleagues will have the benefit of the administration's position on this issue.●

JUDGE WILLIAM HENRY HYER RETIRES

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, one of the most honorable of professions in our land today is the practice of law. Upholding the will of the people of our great Nation is not an easy task. In this field of checks and balances, constant questioning, and varied interpretations, it is only the most honorable and professional individuals who come to light as men of great deeds. Such a man is William Henry Hyer, bankruptcy judge of the Central District of California.

After a law career that spanned nearly four decades, Judge Hyer will retire on May 31, 1985. His absence from the bench will not go unnoticed.

William Henry Hyer was born in Olathe, KS, on December 3, 1920. Education was very important to young Hyer. He attended the University of Kansas where he became a life loyal member of Sigma Chi Fraternity. After graduating with a B.S.B. degree in 1942, Hyer joined the U.S. Air Force as an aviation cadet, and served valiantly for 4 years, attaining the rank of staff sergeant.

Again thinking of his education, William Hyer enrolled in the University of California in 1946. He was graduated 2 years later with a juris doctor degree. San Bernardino, CA, was the site of Hyer's first law practice, which he set up in 1949. He served as a legal officer in Civil Affairs Army Reserve Unit, San Bernardino, after being commissioned a first lieutenant in military intelligence.

On February 15, 1964, Judge Hyer was appointed bankruptcy judge for the Southern District of California, now known as the Central District. After his appointment, Hyer's caseload increased steadily, necessitating additional staff and three office moves. Judge Hyer now holds court in San Bernardino, the city where he first chose to practice law.

Judge Hyer is a man of many talents and varied interests. His love for his fellow man is evident in his participation in community events. It is no wonder he is so well respected by the citizens of southern California and admired by his colleagues. Bankruptcy Judge Hyer and his wife, Phyllis Ruth Graeber, have raised two children: a son, William Henry IV and a daughter, Hallie Ann.

After retiring at the end of this month, Hyer intends to keep active. His plans include traveling to visit his friends and family across the United States, improving his golf game, hunting, and fishing.

Mr. Speaker, once again I am proud to represent such an outstanding human being. I ask you and my colleagues here in the House of Representatives to join with me in expressing deep appreciation for selfless years of service, strong admiration for an impressive career, and best wishes for a happy and healthy retirement to Judge William Henry Hyer—a remarkable man whose service to his community, his State, and the Nation will stand for years to come as a symbol of the best that each of us can be.●

IN SUPPORT OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 192

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues two editorials concerning House Joint Resolution 192 which would recognize April 24, 1986, as National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man and commemorate the Armenian genocide which recently appeared in the New York Times. They both concisely argue the importance of this resolution and urge its passage.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 27, 1985]

THE ARMENIAN DEAD

(By Florence Avakian)

This week marks the 70th anniversary of the 20th century's first act of genocide: the massacre of 1.5 million Armenians by Ottoman Turkey. Even today, Turkey has never admitted its guilt. Why must the United States connive at that ugly denial?

In 1923, when the genocide ended, almost one-half of the world's Armenian population had been slaughtered on its ancestral land, which it had inhabited for more than 3,000 years.

Using language reminiscent of his remarks about West Germany and the Nazi Holocaust, President Reagan, in not wanting "to harm relations with an important ally," opposes a pending Congressional resolution memorializing the Armenian martyrs. And in 1983, he said of the 1915-1923 genocide, "There's virtually no one alive today who was living" at that time. Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger has spoken of the "so-called Armenian genocide resolution."

How painful this is not only for the thousands of survivors still alive worldwide but also for the overwhelming majority of Armenian-Americans who for decades have sought peaceful means to redress their grievances and who deplore today's violence by a few young Armenians who, frustrated by years of denials and distortions, are assassinating Turkish officials.

Reagan Administration waffling on Turkish genocide ignores mountains of objective testimony, eyewitness accounts and documents from non-Armenian diplomats, missionaries, journalists and historians, as well as American officials—all authenticating the premeditated, systematic annihilation of a people.

Henry Morgenthau Sr., Ambassador to Turkey from 1913 to 1916, wrote of "sadistic orgies" and "race extermination" in his frantic cables to Washington. Maj. Gen. James Harbord, upon returning from the Armenian areas in 1919, called it the "most colossal crime of all ages." Thirty years later, Rafael Lemkin, deeply removed by the Armenian tragedy as well as the Nazi Holocaust, coined the word "genocide"—a term Hitler put into practice after he chillingly commented, "Who today remembers the extermination of the Armenians?"

It was on April 24, 1915, that the carnage began, after an edict by Interior Minister Talaat Pasha to "destroy completely all Armenians living in Turkey." Community leaders were hanged and all Armenian males were taken away and bludgeoned to death. Women, children and the elderly were rounded up in all towns and villages and marched hundreds of miles to the sun-scorched deserts of Syria. Few made it. Those surviving starvation or thirst were raped, disembowled, drowned, buried alive or hauled into harems. Women's breasts were cut off and babies were speared; mothers, clutching their children, threw themselves into rivers. The waters ran red.

To help the human wrecks of this mass murder, in 1919 Congress, with State Department cooperation, aided Near East Relief, an American organization.

I know why Turkey denies the genocide. But how can we explain why there are only some 35,000 Armenians now left in Turkey out of a pre-1915 population of more than two million? And why does Turkey now find it necessary to systematically destroy all traces of Armenian culture—monuments, churches, artifacts—in its eastern provinces?

As an Armenian born in this country, I understand why the Administration and the State Department want Turkey's support for strategic reasons, even if this means propping up a despotic regime to the tune of almost $900 million for fiscal year 1985 alone.

But what is hard to understand is why a great democracy would immorally lend its influence to Turkish propaganda. Over the years, would Presidents from Woodrow Wilson to Jimmy Carter—even Ronald Reagan, in a 1981 proclamation—hundreds of members of Congress, and international diplomats, have paid tribute to martyrs of a "so-called" or "alleged" genocide?

A Congressional resolution that remembers the Armenian victims is a resounding statement to peoples all over the world that America wishes to go on record not only against genocide but also to champion the foremost human right—that of life itself.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 29, 1985]

THE SORROWS OF ARMENIA

Americans with their scant sense of history must be mystified by the resurgence of Armenians' anger about an atrocity that occurred 70 years ago. Impermissibly, that anger has recently been invoked by terrorists to justify the murder of Turkish diplomats. But fittingly, it also moved Armenians the world over to memorial observances last week. They plead that Turkey at least acknowledge the massacres of their ancestors and that the State Department remove the word "alleged" from its references to the 1915 slaughter.

Turkey's indignant rejoinder has been that acknowledging any official guilt for such remote events would only reward terrorism. But that is not a cogent reason.

What did happen in 1915? Armenians assert that two million of their forebears were killed or driven into exile by the Ottoman regime in an attempt to liquidate a long-persecuted Christian minority. They cite firsthand accounts by American and German diplomats, contemporary press reports, the regime's own records and the testimony of survivors.

They are disputed by Turks on every point. Turks maintain that an advancing Russian Army was inciting rebellion among Armenians, requiring their resettlement. Turkish diplomats single out as objective the scholarly history of Sanford and Ezel Kural Shaw, who give this appraisal:

"Armenians, claim that as many as 2 million were massacared, but no counts of the dead were ever taken, and the actual total can only be inferred. These claims are based on the supposition that the prewar Armenian population of the Empire was 2.5 million. According to the Ottoman census of 1914, however, it was at most 1.3 million. Half of these people lived in the areas affected by the deportation, but . . . it appears that about 400,000 people were actually transported in 1915-16. In addition, some 700,000 Armenians fled to the Caucasus, western Europe and the United States. As 100,000 remained in Turkey after the war, one can conclude that about 300,000 died if one accepts the Ottoman census reports, or 1.3 million if the Armenian figures are utilized."

So scholars trusted by Turks put the minimum toll at 300,000. Why then should the State Department call the massacres "alleged"? The official excuse that the numbers are in dispute is obviously not the reason. Turkey is an important ally. Indeed, Defense Secretary Weinberger has even pleaded with Congress not to strain relations by designating April 24 as a day of remembrance for Armenian victims. Armenia's sorrows deserve better than that.●

BILLS INTRODUCED TO IMPROVE SAFETY AND CAPACITY ON TWO WASHINGTON, DC AREA BRIDGES

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation calling for studies on the feasibility of improving the safety, capacity, and operational characteristics of two bridges connecting northern Virginia and Washington, DC—the Theodore Roosevelt Bridge and the Rochambeau Bridge, also known as the 14th Street Bridge.

More specifically, one bill would call for the Secretary of Transportation to conduct a feasibility study of adding two lanes to the Theodore Roosevelt Bridge between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the District of Columbia. The other bill would involve the study of improving the interchange between the George Washington Memorial Parkway and I-395 in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Recent repair work initiated by the National Park Service on Memorial Bridge has once again focused attention on the limited ability of the spans across the Potomac River to handle the normal daily load of traffic.

Unfortunately, even when all the bridges are operating at full capacity, there is a serious congestion problem. It is my belief that improvements can be made on all the Potomac bridges, and I have initiated discussion with the District of Columbia, Virginia, and Federal officials to find workable solutions. Two possibilities have emerged, one short-term on the 14th Street Bridge, and one long-term on the Roosevelt Bridge.

The short-term solution would be to redirect DC-bound George Washington Memorial Parkway traffic from the 14th Street Bridge northbound span to the center span now reserved for high occupancy vehicle traffic. This would remove the dangerous merge that now exists from the GW Parkway to northbound I-395, and could be accomplished swiftly through the construction of a new ramp at relatively low cost.

The long-term solution involves extensive redecking of the Roosevelt Bridge to accommodate an additional lane in each direction. It is my belief that this solution, which would help smooth out traffic flow to and from Washington, DC, on three major northern Virginia commuter arteries—I-66, U.S. Route 50, and the GW Parkway—warrants consideration.

These major improvements are crucial in this area for those who travel these routes daily and for those who may be visitors and tourists of the Nation's Capital area. I urge the support of my colleagues for these two important projects.●

EXTENSION OF TAX-FREE ROLLOVER PERIOD

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce today the introduction of a bill to extend the time period for tax-free rollovers of qualified retirement plans from 60 to 90 days. The last Congress rectified a defect in the law by requiring notification of the availability of tax-free rollovers upon distribution of retirement plan funds. It is my hope that this Congress will complete the process.

This bill will lend uniformity to the law. Currently, warranties are for 90 days. One has 90 days to respond to a suit. I believe there should also be 90 days to roll over retirement funds.

There has been a great proliferation of investment vehicles for retirement funds, which has presented people with a wide—and sometimes confusing—array of choices. Special care must be exercised when investing these funds, and for many people, 60 days is not an adequate period of time to compare all methods available in order to meet one's retirement needs. Any mistakes are compounded by time, possibly subjecting the retiree to dependence on the Government for assistance. Thus, 90 days is both the logical and needed period of time to facilitate this process.

According to the IRS, many people have been put at a financial disadvantage due to too short a rollover period and a lack of knowledge as to the availability of this provision. This bill completes the reversal of that. It is my hope that my colleagues will join me in this effort and ensure the bill's swift enactment.●

INDIAN COUNTRY GAMBLING REGULATION ACT

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, when I introduced the Indian Country Gambling Regulation Act last October, nearly 80 Indian tribes nationwide were, in the absence of Federal gambling regulations, operating high stakes bingo parlors on their reservations and rancherias. Since that time, the problems which accompany unregulated gambling have proliferated at an alarming rate in Indian country. As trustees for the Indians, Congress should take immediate remedial action to bring order to this chaos.

Indian bingo is an activity which has grown in popularity since the 1981 Seminole Tribe ruling in Florida that Indian gambling is outside the legal jurisdiction of State law. This decision was based upon the Indians' unique position within the Federal system, for while possessing certain governmental powers, they are neither States nor foreign nations, nor completely sovereign. They are instead partially sovereign, and though reservations are located within State boundaries, tribes are generally not considered subject to State or local authority.

In California, the State attorney general reports that the effect of nonregulated, high-stakes gambling is posing serious problems which threaten the peace and safety of the State. Specific incidents of Mafia-backed gaming operators, and establishment of other forms of gambling under the guise of bingo, that is, bingo jack, bingo slot machines, bingo horseracing, bingo roulette, et cetera, are being discovered with alarming frequency. And these incidents are but a sample of what is occurring nationwide.

Thus, in light of the absence of Federal regulation of Indian gambling enterprises, I am reintroducing today legislation which would require the tribes to comply with each State's already established gambling regulations. Specifically, the measure would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to approve tribal ordinances permitting gambling, provided: First, the gambling does not violate the public policy of the State within which the tribal land is located; second, the gambling is conducted only by the tribe's governing body; third, the gambling operation employs only tribal members; and fourth, the proceeds are used for tribal government operations and not for personal gain.

I applaud the Indians' efforts to become self-reliant, and to abolish the curse of the dole by curbing the tragic tides of unemployment and alcoholism which are found on their reservations. However, Congress should be cautious in its endorsement of just any business endeavor simply because of the revenues which may accrue. In the case of Indian gambling, the monetary end does not justify a means which poses serious risks to Indians and their non-Indian neighbors. Gambling, because of the attraction it holds for organized crime, is both inappropriate and undesirable as an unregulated industry, and is not an activity which Congress, as guardian of the Indians, should be promoting or even permitting on Indian reservations until regulation is established.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues' immediate cosponsorship of the Indian Country Gambling Regulation Act.●

NICARAGUA TRADE EMBARGO

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which invokes a trade embargo with Nicaragua and a resolution calling upon our OAS neighbors to do the same.

Nicaragua today enjoys many trade advantages with the United States. It is a member of the GATT; it holds most-favored-nation status; and it benefits from the generalized system of preferences.

Nicaragua sells a great deal of its agriculture products to the United States. Many of these commodities, such as sugar, tobacco, and beef, compete with American products in depressed markets here at home.

In light of the Sandinistas' revolutionary threat to their peaceful neighbors and their increasing courtship of the Kremlin, I think it's time that the United States began to reevaluate its trade relationship with Nicaragua.

Nicaragua has received and deployed the most powerful army in Central America. It has also failed since 1983 to make any payments of either principal of interest on its debt to the United States. It is high time that the United States ceased its friendly trading practice with a nation that can afford to amass a tremendous military threat, yet cannot afford to live up to its debts.

I urge my colleagues to support this embargo, and I call upon our friends of the Organization of American States to institute similar measures. Our region must join together to demonstrate our outrage over Nicaragua's military buildup and the refusal of the Sandanistas to institute democratic reforms.●

NATIONAL LIBRARY WEEK

HON. JOHN E. GROTBERG

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. GROTBERG. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to speak on National Library Week, which was observed during the week of April 14 to 20, 1985. This week is a tribute to the libraries and librarians of the country who serve our population of readers. National Library Week is a week to honor our educational institutions and to recognize the fact that we are living in an age of information. Our educational infrastructure thoroughly rests on libraries as a foundation; and the future of our information age depends on the future of public libraries.

I would especially like to mention the Illinois library system as a leader in the Nation. The libraries in Illinois have always been on the cutting edge of advancement in providing library services. When the delegation from the Illinois Library Association was recently in my Washington office, they repeated the past accomplishments and future projects of the outstanding libraries throughout the State of Illinois. I am proud to represent many of them here in the U.S. Congress. Libraries provide hours of pleasure and entertainment and are a link to our cultural heritage. I am, and will continue to be, a strong supporter of the services provided by public libraries and will be a voice in the Congress for their continued growth and existence.●

EXPLANATION FOR ABSENCE

HON. BUTLER DERRICK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained on Thursday, May 2, 1985. Thus, I was unable to cast my vote on House Resolution 127, legislation expressing the sense of the House of Representatives concerning Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry. Had I been present I would have voted "yea."●

CALIFORNIA VETERANS COALITION

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the fine work of the California Veterans Coalition, a Statewide community-based veterans services organization headquartered in San Francisco, that is working on behalf of veterans of the Vietnam war. The coalition's efforts stand out for their work in providing educational and health services for those veterans who have been exposed to agent orange.

Today, 10 years after all U.S. troops pulled out of Saigon, there is still a legacy of hurt and pain. Many of our soldiers have been exposed to potentially life-threatening chemicals, many emitted from their own weapons, and yet the U.S. Government still moves far too slowly in responding to this public health crisis. During the 98th Congress, we passed the Veteran's Dioxin and Radiation Exposure Compensation Standards Act. This legislation is intended to assure compensation to veterans and their survivors for disabilities resulting from their service in the U.S. Armed Forces.

The California Veterans Coalition has been very active in San Francisco in helping to locate former military service personnel along with civilians who served in Vietnam. They are working to establish prototype procedures for the Veterans' Administration to work cooperatively with local groups in helping place appropriate veterans on the agent orange registry so they can receive proper health education and medical services to offset any adverse health problems.

The California Veterans Coalition performs vital information and referral services in low- to moderate-income areas, six of which are located in the city and county of San Francisco. They advise veterans in the detection and prevention of agent orange-related health problems and inform them of specialized tests and screenings conducted by both private and public agencies. This is part of the group's effort to put together a veterans health care network linked to the local health care system.

More than 200,000 veterans nationwide who have been exposed to agent orange have received physical examinations and filed with the Veterans' Administration. This number is a mere pittance in terms of the 2.5 to 3 million exposure level. Like other sad stories from the Vietnam war, the problem of exposure to agent orange will not go away. But we need to recognize the problem and provide the best possible care to those veterans and their families who are suffering as a result of that conflict. I commend the California Veterans Coalition for their dedication and hard work.●

SOVIET JEWRY

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday was Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry when more than 200,000 people rallied in front of the United Nations to protest the treatment of Jews in the Soviet Union. Because in the last year Soviet Jews have endured greater discrimination and persecution than at any other time in recent Soviet history, it is more important than ever that we speak out loudly on behalf of our Jewish brethren in the Soviet Union. Today more than 100 students from the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry are here from New York City and the surrounding area to do just that—to rally and to speak out on behalf of the plight of Soviet Jewry.

The year 1984 marked the nadir for Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union. Only 896 Jews were permitted to leave, the lowest single year total since 1970. In fact, the 1984 total represents less than 2 percent of the 1979 peak year emigration figure of 51,320. The reduction in the number of Jews granted exit visas has meant that the number of refuseniks stranded in the Soviet Union has climbed to over 20,000. This figure, however, includes only those Jews who submitted formal applications to leave for Israel and have received official refusals; it does not include the estimated 380,000 others who have initated the complex process of applying for a visa.

These numbers are all the more shocking when one considers what is occurring in the Soviet Union right now; namely, a new wave of officially sanctioned anti-Semitism. This campaign to eradicate Jewish culture from Soviet society has taken on many ugly forms, including the stepped-up harassment of refuseniks and the arrest and imprisonment of several Hebrew teachers. Most Soviet Jews who apply to emigrate are routinely dismissed from their jobs and forced to take menial jobs. In addition, they are often attacked in the media, arbitrarily arrested, and their personal property is confiscated by Soviet authorities.

When Mikhail Gorbachev assumed power in the Soviet Union, many hoped that the repression of Soviet Jews would be halted or at least significantly reduced. This has not happened, however. Indeed, only 246 Soviet Jews were permited to emigrate from the Soviet Union during the first 3 months of this year, and the campaign to eradicate Jewish culture from Soviet society continue unabated.

I find these developments extremely distressing. It is more imperative than ever that we continue our efforts to ensure that all Soviet Jews are given the right to emigrate and are permitted to freely exercise their religion while they remain in the Soviet Union.●

AIRLINE PILOTS PENSION RELIEF BILL

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, along with 13 of my colleagues from the Ways and Means Committee, a bill which is designed to correct an unintended problem created by the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982 [TEFRA, Public Law 97-248].

As you know, Mr. Speaker, TEFRA made a number of modifications in the treatment of tax-qualified corporate pension plans. In addition to lowering both the contribution and benefit limits originally established under ERISA, it increased to 62 the age at which the maximum annual benefit could be drawn from a defined benefit plan. Under these new requirements, any retirement prior to age 62 would result in actuarial reductions in the maximum annual benefit. However, these provisions overlook the unique circumstances of one group of employees who are required by the Federal Government to retire prior to age 62—commercial airline pilots. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that commercial airline pilots, are the only private sector employees in the United States with a retirement age mandated by the Federal Government.

For over 20 years, the Federal Aviation Administration [FAA] has required by regulation (FAR 121.383(c)) that commercial pilots retire at age 60 for reasons of public safety. This unique requirement was recognized by Congress on two previous occasions when it excepted airline pilots from the national policy established by the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and when it provided an exclusion for airline pilots from ERISA's participation and eligibility standards (section 410(b)(3)(B)).

Mr. Speaker, what we have here is conflicting Federal regulations that result in airline pilots sustaining a substantial penalty in potential pension benefits and never being able to obtain the benefit level available to all other retirees in tax qualified pension plans. Mr. Speaker, while the Congress has judged it sound national policy to encourage longer working careers and has imposed a reduction in maximum pension benefits for voluntary early retirement, it is clearly inequitable to apply this provision to those who, through the actions of the Federal Government, have no choice but to retire prior to age 62.

It is my intention and that of my cosponsors to correct this inequity at the earliest possible date and I hope that others will joint us in supporting this effort.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. ROLFE ARNHYM

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to recognize and honor Mr. Rolfe Arnhym as he leaves his position of executive vice president for the Pasadena Chamber of Commerce.

Rolfe first came to the chamber's attention as chairman of the Armed Forces Day breakfast when, under his leadership, attendance was increased from 100 to more than 500. Shortly thereafter, in September 1978, he began his tenure as the chamber's guiding force.

Rolfe's belief in discipline, order, challenge, long hours and constant activity began to pay off in the establishment of a new role for this organization in the community. Pasadena Chamber of Commerce is currently nationally known and viewed as a leader in chamber circles.

Some of the achievements during Rolfe's stewardship are the adoption by UCLA of the Rose Bowl as home for UCLA football, the St. Patrick's Day parade, the excellent working relationships with all levels of government and the increase in chamber assets from $100,000 to $700,000. The role as a key decisionmaker and active partner in the community is one of Rolfe's proudest legacies for the chamber.

As Rolfe leaves Pasadena to take on new challenges with Long Beach, we wish him many years of continued excellence, and thank him for his outstanding contributions to this community.●

MS. WALMAR GRAY CELEBRATES 50 YEARS OF SERVICE WITH AMERICAN RE-INSURANCE COMPANY IN NEW YORK

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to publicly acknowledge the accomplishments of Ms. Walmar Gray of Forest Hills, NY, who on May 13, 1985, will celebrate her 50th year of service with American Re-Insurance Co.

Mr. Speaker, American Re-Insurance Co. is a subsidiary of the Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., a well-respected firm in New York. The company has reaped many benefits from Ms. Gray's years of service, and from the enthusiasm with which she approaches her job. As the retrospective premium accountant in the underwriting accounting department, "Wally" Gray performs the vital task of accumulating data needed for corporate financial reports, as well as servicing clients on an individual basis. Her top-notch work has made a significant contribution to the smooth and efficient operation of the underwriting accounting department, in conjunction with the leadership and direction of assistant vice president Kenneth Shefcik and the company's other fine officers.

Mr. Speaker, one of the many talents Wally has brought to American Re-Insurance is her skill in dealing with people. All of us have had occasion, on our interactions with businesses and institutions, to be put off or experience frustration with "the system." But clients of American Re-Insurance who work with Ms. Gray have had a very different experience. Her people-oriented approach to doing business has served the company well, and has been of great benefit to many New Yorkers. Walmar Gray, who is preparing to retire after her 50 years of invaluable service, will be greatly missed by American Re-Insurance and its clients.

I would like to congratulate Ms. Gray on her 50th anniversary with the company, and extend to her my best wishes for the future. She has made an important contribution to the city of New York, and I ask all of my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in celebrating with her 50 years of service with American Re-Insurance Co.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. TOM HALL

HON. ROBERT E. BADHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, today, I would like to take a moment to recognize and honor Mr. Tom Hall who has served as general manager of the Industrial Council of the City of Commerce since 1960. He will be honored at a banquet on June 24 in the City of Commerce as his retirement on July 1, 1985, will mark his completion of 25 years of service in this capacity.

As general manager of the industrial council, he has served his community by participating in many activities, including the Rio Hondo Boys and Girls Club of Bell Gardens, where he served as president and spearheaded a building drive for their new club house and office building; the United Crusade; served on the California Taxpayers Association L.A. Tax; Crippled Children's Society; Community Outreach Program, and is presently president of the Southeast Industry Education Council. He has worked closely with the Montebello Unified School District in their Adult Education Committee and the Vail Career Center.

So, it is with great pride that I congratulate Mr. Tom Hall on both his retirement and his 25 years of dedicated and outstanding service to his community.●

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE CHILDREN'S NUTRITION RESEARCH CENTER

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, President Lyndon Johnson once said: "* * * to heal and to build in support of something worthy is * * * a noble task." Such a task is embodied in the development of the Children's Nutrition Research Center [CNRC] at the Texas Medical Center in Houston.

Of the five human nutrition centers in the Nation, the CNRC is the only facility focusing on the nutritional needs of expectant mothers, infants, and children. Last summer, the House of Representatives approved $49 million for construction of the permanent facility to house CNRC, as a part of the Baylor College of Medicine. With land donated by Baylor and funding from the Federal Government, once again we have a strong partnership of public and private funds working to build a stronger Houston, a better Texas and a brighter tomorrow for all.

Research conducted by CNRC scientists will contribute to the health of all Americans and has proven already to be an integral part of the renowned research community of the Texas Medical Center. The mission of the Center is to establish national standards for the dietary needs of women during pregnancy and nursing, and to determine the most desirable diet for growth and development of children from conception through adolescence.

I am very proud to have the Children's Nutrition Research Center within my congressional district and as part of the Texas Medical Center. The activities undertaken here will reach far beyond our city. I believe that such efforts will make tremendous contributions, through better nutrition, to the health of our Nation's future generations. Those who have been involved with this Center have a vision that the information learned through hard work and unrelenting research will be used to help assure the health and development of young people throughout the world. A primary obligation of the community of man is to provide for its children. Through the Center we celebrate man's commitment to make this a better world for our children.●

AUTOMATIC COMPENSATION FOR OUR FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced two bills to provide automatic compensation to former prisoners of war held by the enemy in either the Asian and European Theaters of World War II or the Korean conflict. I do so on a date of melancholy historic note. Mr. Speaker, 43 years ago yesterday, May 6, the Japanese captured Corregidor, the strategic safeguard island of the Manila Harbor. With Bataan captured a month before, Corregidor gave Japan control of the Philippines. Scores of valient Americans on Corregidor held out until May 7 of 1943 before finally laying down arms.

Recognizing this country's responsibility to those held as POW's after Bataan and Corregidor and throughout World War II, Congress passed Public Law 97-37, the Former Prisoner of War Omnibus Act. I, like many of my colleagues, hailed passage of that act as just assistance for the veterans who suffered in the POW camps of our World War II enemies. But the remedy has been neither swift nor satisfactory. The Advisory Committee on Former Prisoners of War, established under Public Law 97-37, recorded the dismaying situation of our former POW's. Let me quote from the committee findings:

It is clear that the progress to date is not satisfactory, the efforts started too late, entirely too many delays have been experienced, and sufficient emphasis and interest by key officials has not always been evident.

They go on to advise:

We are obliged to point out that prompt and effective action is essential. The overwhelming majority of former POW's are from World War II and their average age is over sixty. If the VA does not demonstrate the ability to effectively rate the claims of former POW's in consonance with the medical knowledge now available, we will have no choice other than to recommend that a disability award be made to all former POW's based upon geographical location and tenure of imprisonment. Former POW's cannot, cannot wait any longer for equity.

Late last year, I introduced legislation similar to the automatic compensation bills I have introduced today. Unfortunately, Congress lacked the time to act in 1984. Today, I urge my colleagues to move swiftly on my two new bills. The need is great and the unpaid debt to our veterans still looms large. Public Law 97-37 provided a good first step. However, the growing body of evidence of the problems suffered by our ex-servicemen dictates that our Government take the final step and grant automatic compensation for our former prisoners of war.

My legislation addresses the veterans who fought in the Asian and European Theaters of World War II and those of the Korean conflict. Automatic disability compensation of 60 percent would be granted to any veteran held by the enemy for more than 30 days. The bills also liberalize the definition of POW to include civilians who were captured and servicemen who evaded capture, but never rejoined our forces. These changes importantly bring American compensation into line with that of other countries, most particularly with that of Canada.

The advisory committee's report provided at least four key reasons why, I believe, automatic compensation is appropriate. Again, I quote from the report.

The adjudication of claims for service-connected disability by former POW's is profoundly and negatively affected by four factors. First, the number of former POW's is very small in relation to the total number of veterans. Second, the POW experience is so different from the experiences of most citizens, most veterans and even more combat veterans. Therefore, adjudicators and physicians who participated in the rating process are rarely exposed to former POW's. Third, former POW's generally have nonexistent or poor medical records covering the period of captivity and immediately thereafter. Fourth, the normal adjudication process requires clear medical evidence or etiological proof of the origin of disabilities. We are concerned that these factors are not sufficeintly addressed or compensated for in either the law or VA administrative directives and practices. Because of these factors, it has been difficult to implement Public Law 97-37.

Mr. Speaker, none of these factors since the report has changed for the better. Instead, we confront each day the loss of these men and the suffering of their families.

The former POW's still await just and fair treatment, and I believe the 99th Congress will move swiftly and vigorously to assist these veterans and their families.●

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE PATRICIA SCHROEDER

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today, I, and 24 colleagues, are introducing the Field Office Closing Justification Act. This bill requires executive agencies to provide Congress with at least 120 days notice prior to making any significant changes in their field office structure that will adversely affect Federal employees.

Over the last several years, the Reagan administration has sought to cut dramatically the regional structure and field organizations of agencies throughout the Federal Government. Such efforts have met with congressional scrutiny and resistance. In recent months, the Office of Management and Budget has attempted to finesse these changes through administrative sleight of hand.

There is no dispute. Field offices cost money. Yet, apparently it is money well-spent for services well-appreciated. Polls indicate that Americans feel good about those government services with which they have direct contact, be it tax assistance, Social Security information, or soil conservation advice. Their hostility to government comes from the billions and billions of dollars of spending which they do not see.

On February 20, 1985, the administration issued a booklet entitled "Management of the United States Government, Fiscal Year 1986" announcing plans for the closings of hundreds of regional and field offices but providing no details. Earlier in February, the Civil Service Subcommittee sent letters to all Federal agencies with field structures asking for information on their plans for reorganization. Little information was provided. In the meantime, rumors run wild, agency morale sags, productivity sinks and congressional offices struggle to get some answers.

The President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control—the Grace Commission—may have possibly uncovered the reason for such furtive action by the administration.

GAO [the General Accounting Office] has documented that in some cases the opposition to structural reform comes from Government employees directly affected by reorganization. Employees encouraged Congressional intervention using such tactics as: emphasizing human and financial losses when an office within their district is closed or consolidated; applying pressure through protest marches, letters, and telephone calls; using alliances between Congressional staff and agency personnel; and enlisting support and influence of former employees of affected agencies. (Report to the President, Page III-7).

Although the Grace Commission might find such activity by Federal workers and their Congress ominous, I do not.

The Field Office Closing Justification Act does not preclude the administration from streamlining the Government. It does not prevent office closings or consolidations. This bill simply requires each agency to advise Congress of their reorganization plans and to provide us with the justification and impact of such plans. Hopefully, this will encourage more thoughtful, more deliberate, and more consumer-response activity.●

A TRIBUTE TO JEANNETTE RANKIN

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, today I am paying tribute to a person whose courage and leadership should truly serve as an inspiration to all Americans. Just to say that Jeannette Rankin was the first woman elected to Congress does not illuminate all the fortitude, determination, and ingenuity she possessed as a leader in the fight for those causes she so doggedly embraced.

She worked fervently so that half of the American population would have the right to vote. Three years before her first election to Congress in 1916, she traveled 9,000 miles, sometimes on horseback, speaking and organizing for suffrage.

In recalling Ms. Rankin's bid for Congress, we can also clearly see the qualities that made this woman a great American. Her campaign, she said, was not for Congress, but for women's suffrage and peace. She used a grassroots and direct-mail postcard campaign virtually unheard of in her day—and did all this in a time when only 12 of 48 States even allowed women the right to vote. Once in Congress, Jeannette Rankin authored the first bill for Government-sponsored instruction in maternity and infant hygiene and also introduced measures to provide equal pay for equal work, regardless of gender.

In her commitment against war, she demonstrated the tenacity of a truly great leader. While there are probably few people who do not support the cause of peace, there are also few who would have upheld this cause by opposing America's entry into the world's two Great Wars. Jeannette Rankin was one of those few. Forty-four years ago, as Congress agreed to march head-on into World War II, she stood alone in this Chamber—not only as the sole woman, but also as the sole "nay."

Jeannette Rankin lives on not just as a symbol of dedication to world peace, workers' interests, and women's rights, but as a symbol of ingenuity, determination, and courage. I am proud to do her honor today.●

THE INTRODUCTION OF A BILL RELATING TO MOTOR FUEL BLENDING STOCKS

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which is designed to correct an anomaly which currently exists in the Tariff Schedules of the United States [TSUS] with respect to the tariff treatment of motor fuels.

Under the current law, the Customs Service has interpreted the tariff schedules to impose substantially higher duties on components of motor fuels than are imposed on finished motor fuels. This classification process has resulted in significant uncertainty with respect to the ability of the companies, who historically have manufactured finished motor fuels from imported components, to continue this activity on an economic basis. Consequently, such manufacturers' ability to supply products to independent marketers of motor fuels at a competitive price has been impaired.

During the debate on this issue in the 98th Congress, several members of the domestic refining industry expressed opposition to legislation to correct this problem. These refiners allege that increased imports pose a significant threat to domestic refiners. It is important that the Congress address this issue with an understanding of the circumstances which led to an increase in imports, as well as an understanding of the minimal effect of these imports on the refining segment of the petroleum industry.

While it is true that imports of finished gasoline and blendstock components have, in terms of percentage, increased, it appears that such imports, as the percentage of available supply, are not a substantial factor. It is difficult to believe that this minimal market penetration imposes a significant threat to the viability of domestic refiners. Rather, imports of finished motor gasoline and blending components perform only the function of exerting appropriate discipline on prices at the wholesale level.

Congress' failure to eliminate this obvious anomaly in the tariff schedules will not avoid the importation of finished motor fuels. Rather it will only ensure that the manufacture of such fuels from blending components of foreign origin will take place outside the customs territory of the United States and will thereby deny domestic entities the ability to manufacture motor fuels from such components.

During consideration of this issue during the 98th Congress the House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Committee on Finance directed the International Trade Commission [ITC] to institute an investigation for the purpose of gathering and presenting information on the tariff classification and treatment of those products potentially affected by a reclassification of catalytic naphtha and other motor fuel blending stocks. The results of this study were released in April 1985. The report addresses three main tariff classifications: First, the tariff treatment of naphthas and other motor fuel blending stocks; second, the tariff treatment of fuel-use ethyl alcohol, gasohol, and other gasohol/ethyl alcohol mixtures as it relates to the possible circumvention of the provisions of TSUS; and third, the tariff treatment of fuel-use methyl alcohol. This legislation would enact the recommendations put forth by the ITC.

It is essential that Congress act to resolve this obvious anomaly which exists with respect to the treatment of motor fuel blendstocks and finished motor fuels under the tariff schedules. I urge my colleagues to support the enactment of this legislation.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE MARTIN VERHAGE OF PROSPECT PARK, NJ, DISTINGUISHED CITIZEN, COMMUNITY LEADER AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 10, the residents of Prospect Park, my Eighth Congressional District and State of New Jersey will join together in testimony to the lifetime of outstanding public service that our people have received from a most distinguished citizen, esteemed community leader and good friend, the Honorable Martin VerHage, whose exemplary good deeds on behalf of the people of Prospect Park have truly enriched our community, State and Nation. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in deep appreciation of all of his good works and share great pride in the success of his achievements with his good wife Gertrude on this most joyous occasion.

Mr. Speaker, Martin VerHage is an outstanding individual who throughout his lifetime has earned the respect and esteem of all of us who have had the good fortune to know him. He has served the borough of Prospect Park as councilman for 33 years and has been a staunch supporter and active participant in many civic and community improvement programs.

In addition to his faithful service on the governing body of Prospect Park, he has served 57 years as a volunteer fireman, was police commissioner of Prospect Park for 22 years, part-time patrolman for 10 years during the World War II period and was employed as chief custodian of the Prospect Park Public School for 39 years.

In his daily pursuits Martin has extended the richness of his wisdom and expertise—always giving willingly and unselfishly of his time—in helping others. We applaud his knowledge, training, hard work and personal commitment that has enabled him to achieve the fullest confidence and strongest support of the people of our community. By his example and many accomplishments in civic, community and charitable endeavors, Martin VerHage has personified a special quality of leadership, dedication and sincerity of purpose in his responsible service to our people.

Although he completed his 33 years on the borough council on January 1, 1985, he continues to be of service to the community. His ever presence in the municipal complex and active participation in public affairs attest to his dedication to the community in which he was born.

Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of our way of life here in America and I appreciate the opportunity to call your attention to Martin VerHage's lifetime of outstanding public service. As we gather together in testimony to his many contributions to the quality of life and way of life in our community, we do indeed salute a distinguished citizen, community leader and great American—the Honorable Martin VerHage of Prospect Park, NJ.●

HONORING SOROPTOMIST'S "WOMAN OF DISTINCTION", MAGDALENA APARICIO

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding work of an individual who is being honored as "Woman of Distinction" by the East Los Angeles Soroptomists.

Magdalena Aparicio was born in El Paso, TX and came to East Los Angeles in 1946. She is a graduate of Garfield High School and has worked in the East Los Angeles community for over 30 years.

Maggie, as she is known by her friends and associates, has given many years of dedicated service to her favorite cause. She has worked to increase the number of women and minority owned businesses through her involvement in the banking and business sectors.

I would like to mention just a few of her accomplishments which have earned her this auspicious award. Maggie has spent 18 years working in the banking industry. She was assistant manager for the Pan American Bank, Commerce City Bank, and Bank of America. Later, she became executive director of the East Los Angeles Business Development Center. She organized the first West Coast Business Women's Conference. She was a founding member of the East Los Angeles Sheriff's Youth Athletic League.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that her husband Leo and her four sons Danny, Richard, Michael, and David are very proud of her. She has certainly earned the respect and admiration of her community.

I would like to ask my colleagues to join with me in giving our best to Mrs. Magdalena Aparicio, the East Los Angeles Soroptomist's "Women of Distinction."●

CONTRIBUTIONS OF LIONESS CLUBS

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, as the Member of Congress privileged to represent New York City's 15th District, it is my great honor to rise in recognition of the contributions of some outstanding women of Manhattan, the Lionesses of District 20-R2. Both as Lioness Club members and as citizens these women are valuable participants in our community.

In 65 nations of the world more than 68,000 women in over 2,700 Lioness Clubs are serving the needy of their communities and the world. Lioness Clubs assist their sponsoring Lions Clubs in a vast variety of service activities, and they also plan and implement projects of their own in their communities. Woman's roles in society, combined with her unique talents and capabilities, make Lioness Clubs an invaluable asset to each area they represent and also to the entire world. Among the numerous community activities the Lionesses perform are: work with young adults, child care, health services, helping the aged, ecological concern, and vocational assistance. Additionally, Lioness Clubs participate in international relations programs such as International Club Twinning, whereby clubs enter into a sisterhood alliance that may include cultural exchange, cooperative service projects, and exchange hosting of travelers. Lionesses provide a link between their communities and the rest of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues in the House will want to join me in paying homage to the achievements of these women and the effort they put into their work. They truly epitomize the concept of community service.●

MEXICAN HOLIDAY

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, each year Mexico celebrates its national independence day on May 5, a national holiday known as El Cinco de Mayo. It commemorates a battle at the city of Puebla, Mexico, in which Mexican defenders held off an invasion of French troops in 1862.

The significance of the holiday lies in Mexico's spirit of independence. Then, as now, the quest for freedom and self-determination guided the nation, its leaders and its people. The commitment to national sovereignty and dignity was symbolized by the Mexican patriot, Benito Juarez, who orchestrated the defeat of the French.

Mr. Speaker, my constituents in west Texas join their neighbors in the state of Chihuahua and our sister city of Ciudad Juarez in this celebration of freedom, and we offer our best wishes for this day of national celebration.

Thank you very much.●

TAKEOVERS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, most of us in the Congress are aware of the increasing numbers of hostile takeovers of major corporations in this country; most of us are also aware of the negative consequences these takeovers hold for the productivity, the future growth, and the health of our economy.

Mr. Speaker, no one questions the legitimate takeover of a company—this represents American capitalism at its best. But these "takeovers" which I am concerned about are not takeovers in the traditional sense—they are not undertaken with the goal of acquiring a company as an ongoing entity; rather they are financial ploys, the primary goal of which is the enrichment of a few at the expense of the long term health of U.S. companies.

The financing for corporate raids appears to be coming in increasing amounts from banks and thrifts searching for high yield investments to prop up poor profit performance. We could be using capital to modernize housing, plants and farms—instead, we are encouraging nonproductive and economically harmful activities which have destabilized our credit markets for which the Federal Government bears the ultimate risk.

No one fully understands the impacts these hostile takeovers hold for our economy. We do know that since 1981, 115 of the Fortune 500 companies have disappeared as a consequence of takeovers. Takeover mania is forcing corporate America to focus solely on maximizing current stock prices to the detriment of future growth, jobs and wealth. Long term capital expenditures, research and development efforts and social contributions are being sacrificed because they do not positively affect stock prices in the short run. And management spends an inordinate amount of time devising ways to stop hostile takeovers—this in turn hurts the competitiveness of U.S. companies.

Mr. Speaker, I think this activity raises serious antitrust and national security concerns. I will introduce legislation today which would place a moratorium on takeovers financed by junk bonds. The moratorium would expire on December 31, 1985. The bill is narrow in scope yet would provide Congress the needed opportunity to study this new takeover mechanism and the potentially damaging economic impacts without sacrificing additional companies in the meantime. I urge my colleagues to join me in opposing these damaging and unproductive takeovers by supporting this legislation.●

CONVEYING FOREST SERVICE LANDS TO BALL, LA

HON. JERRY HUCKABY

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to convey certain U.S. forest lands to the town of Ball, LA, located in my Fifth Congressional District in Rapides Parish. The lands to be transferred without consideration total approximately 40 acres east of Ball and would be used as a community recreational complex.

The town of Ball is the third largest incorporated municipality in Rapides Parish and is growing rapidly. In fact, the major Federal highway in the area was enlarged and upgraded to four lanes. However, the town has no recreational facilities to speak of to accommodate the citizens of Ball. It is surrounded by national forest lands or other towns and parishes, leaving Ball virtually no room to expand its city limits.

This 40-acre tract is ideal for development as a public recreation area. Former mayor of Ball, Tommy Hollingsworth, initiated an application for a special use permit 2 years ago to proceed with the construction of a recreational facility there. The town having limited financial resources to pay for the development of this type of recreational complex proposed—which includes tennis, basketball and volleyball courts, ballfields, restroom facilities, picnic areas, trails, and playground equipment—its local civic Optimist Club agreed in a spirit of community cooperation to improve, construct, and maintain this recreation area.

Hollingsworth, the current mayor of Ball, Clyde Moore, and other town officials worked closely with the U.S. Forest Service on this matter. Unfortunately, the Service could not approve a special use permit for this proposed complex because it was not compatible with the type of recreation opportunities normally offered on national forest lands. Significant capital investments of permanent improvements proposed in this project are not considered a judicious long-term allocation of Federal lands. Furthermore, operation and maintenance of public facilities under permit are often higher than what the permittee anticipates or is able to finance over a long period. Other avenues were investigated, such as land exchanges or donations, but to no avail.

Mr. Speaker, because the lands in question are presently being utilized for public purposes and will continue to be managed by the town for such purposes, it seems reasonable to me that this land should be conveyed to the town of Ball without consideration. It will allow this community which is essentially surrounded by federally owned land to accommodate the growing demand for increased recreational opportunities. I urge timely and expeditious consideration of this bill.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO LARRY MARSHALL, OUTGOING PRESIDENT OF THE LONG BEACH JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on May 11, the Long Beach Junior Chamber of Commerce will hold its 54th Annual Installation and Awards Banquet to honor its new president and incoming officers and directors. I take this opportunity today to congratulate the Jaycee's outgoing president, Mr. Larry Marshall, on a job well done over this past year.

A native of Idaho, Larry first began his involvement in the Jaycees in 1975 in Kennewick, WA. As a member of the Kennewick Jaycees, Larry served as its director, 1975–76, and State director, 1976–77. He would later serve as district director of the Washington State Jaycees, 1977–78.

Moving to southern California in 1977, Larry quickly joined the Monrovia Jaycees in 1977 and served as State director. The following year, he joined the Long Beach Jaycees and served as director twice, external vice president, State director and, of course, president.

An employee of the Ralph Parsons Co. in Pasadena, Larry was, among other things, selected Key Man of the Year for 1983–84 and is noted as one of the Outstanding Young Men of America for 1984.

Mr. Speaker, Larry Marshall has served well as president of the Long Beach Jaycees. He has earned the respect of this peers, and helped make Long Beach a better place to live and work.

My wife, Lee, joins me in saluting Larry on this special occasion. We wish him continued success in all his future endeavors.●

A SYMBOL OF COURAGE AND DEMOCRACY: KIM SANG HYON OF KOREA

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to acquaint my colleagues with a story of courage and commitment. Secure and comfortable, few Americans appreciate the struggle to maintain democratic principles in the Third World. One of America's staunchest allies, the Republic of Korea, has been praised by the Reagan administration and well-intentioned American economists for its recent achievements in the field of economic development. Democracy too, is becoming a part of the Government of the Republic of Korea.

For 32 years, Kim Sang Hyon, a former member of the Korean Assembly, has toiled to safeguard the cause of political freedom in the midst of economic priorities. Often a lonely task, Kim Sang Hyon, like his colleague Kim Dae Jung, has paid the price of this vigilance. The victim of antidemocratic presidential decrees, as well as personal harassment, he has persisted in carrying the message of democratic reform.

Given America's democratic tradition, it is hoped that the U.S. Government will now offer encouragement and support to Kim Sang Hyon and his associates. Sometimes we have confused our defense and strategic interests with our own sense of democratic mission. It is not too late to remedy this difficulty. Let us offer our warmest praise to Kim Sang Hyon for keeping the flame of democracy alive in Korea. In the face of adversity, he has represented America's true interest in foreign affairs and the best interest of his country, the championing of democracy.●

VITOLS HONORED DURING SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to pay tribute to an outstanding member of the Pennsylvania small business community—Mr. Elmars Vitols, president of Vitols Tool & Machine Corp.

His Philadelphia, PA, manufacturing firm was selected as the outstanding subcontractor in the Small Business Association's region III encompassing all of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia, the District of Columbia, and Virginia.

Mr. Vitols will be honored during Small Business Week, May 5–11 along with other outstanding Federal procurement prime contractors and subcontractors, and small business people and business advocates from each State, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico.

Vitols Tool & Machine Corp. is one of only 15 machine shops of its size to have been approved to participate in the Navy Nuclear Spare Parts Procurement Program.

I applaud Elmars Vitols and other 14.2 million outstanding small businesses whose vital role in our Nation's economy should not be overlooked.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. JARED TRUSSLER

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pride and pleasure to announce to my colleagues that Mr. Jared Trussler, president of Trusco Tank Inc., a small business in San Luis Obispo County which is located in my congressional district, has been selected by the Small Business Administration as the Central California Small Business Person of the Year.

This honor is the result of stringent competition among more than 100,000 small businesses in the central California area, and I believe that it reflects well, not only upon Trusco Tank, but upon the entire small business community.

Mr. Trussler founded his company in 1970 in a barn loft, which is in the time-honored tradition of American enterprise. Mr. Trussler had little more than an idea and the determination to carry it through, but he was willing to take the risk, and his hard work has paid off. Today, Trusco Tank is one of the central coast's most successful businesses and one of its largest employers.

Mr. Speaker, Jared Trussler's story illustrates why we must continue to keep America the kind of Nation in which individual initiative and ideas can flourish. Small businesses are a tremendous source of innovation, and they are the greatest source of new jobs in this country.

America needs small business in order to keep up its economic growth and generate new ideas and products. If we look at the beginnings of many of today's corporate giants, we see that a lot of them began as small concerns. Eastman-Kodak, McDonald's, and scores of other large corporations were once smaller than Trusco Tank.

Trusco Tank may not ever become as large as an IBM, but it is doing a great job of competing in its market, and I salute Mr. Trussler for being selected as the Small Business Person of the Year for Central California.●

CINCO DE MAYO—THE HISPANIC CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED STATES

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, May 5—Cinco de Mayo—is one of the most celebrated days in Mexican history. This Mexican national holiday commemorates the anniversary of the Battle of Puebla which was fought on May 5, 1862. Mexican troops under General Ignacio Zaragoza—outnumbered 3 to 1—defeated the invading French forces of Napoleon III.

This celebration is not just a military commemoration, Mr. Speaker. More important, it is remembered as a triumph of the human spirit, a triumph of courage in the face of almost certain disaster. It is a celebration of the Mexican national spirit overcoming foreign intervention and imperial domination.

This great occasion is not only observed in Mexico with parades, festivals, dances, and speeches, but Hispanics here in the United States remember this important date as well. It is an occasion when all Americans—Hispanics and non-Hispanics—celebrate and acknowledge the important contributions of Hispanics to our country.

Long before English-speaking colonists arrived at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock, Hispanics were in this country. My home State of California was first settled by Mexican colonists.

Our national culture has been greatly enriched by many Hispanic contributions to our language, art, music, and food, but the most important contribution has been our Hispanic fellow-citizens themselves. Hispanics have shown their patriotism through outstanding service in our Armed Forces. A significant number of Hispanics have been awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor. Hispanics have been outstanding members of U.S. Olympic teams; they are among our Nobel laureates.

Though Hispanics have contributed much to our Nation, they have also faced serious problems—barriers in education, housing, and employment, and discrimination in many areas.

Just as the badly outnumbered Mexican troops at the Battle of Puebla did not despair but went on to achieve a remarkable victory, Hispanics in the United States are struggling to break down those barriers to achieve the American dream. I salute our Hispanic friends and neighbors on this important occasion. In San Mateo County and throughout our Nation they contribute richly to what is our great and pluralistic American heritage.●

SOLIDARITY SUNDAY FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 5, the 85 constituent agencies of the Coalition to Free Soviet Jewry sponsored Solidarity Sunday to reaffirm the resolve to secure freedom for Soviet Jews and for beleaguered people everywhere. For this reason, it is highly appropriate that we here in Congress salute that event by participating in this special order recognizing the ever-deteriorating plight of the Jews of the Soviet Union.

In recent days, the Soviet Government has sharply increased its discrimination against Jewish culture and religion by arresting Hebrew teachers on false criminal charges, attacking Hebrew teaching circles as subversive and practicing anti-Semitic ideology under the cloak of "Anti-Zionism." One person who has been arrested and incarcerated is Iosef Begun, and I would like to bring you up to date on his deteriorating condition.

In 1983, Hebrew teacher and Jewish activist Iosef Begun was sentenced to 7 years in a labor camp and 5 years of internal exile on charges of anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. His family has repeatedly been denied the right to visit him at the camp, and Soviet officials have failed to answer questions about his health, which is known to be in critically poor condition.

In protest to his father's incarceration and being cut off from the outside world, Iosef Begun's son Boris began a hunger strike on March 4, 6 months after the family last heard from him. Western visitors to the younger Begun reported that he looked half-dead, weighed slightly under 100 pounds, that his veins were swollen and popping out of the side of his head, and that he had suffered permanent damage to his vision because of his hunger strike. One eyewitness said that although he was only 19, he—the younger Begun—looked 40.

On April 12, 1985, Boris Begun received a telegram from the Soviet authorities saying that Iosef Begun had been transferred to another prison. The telegram made no mention of the site of this new prison. The authorities also returned to Boris packages and mail that he had sent to his father. As of this writing, Iosef Begun's whereabouts are unknown.

Mr. Speaker, the plight of Iosef Begun and the toll it has taken on his family is but one example of the persecution and terror facing the Jews of the Soviet Union. Every day we read about some new refusenik who has been denied a visa or who has lost his or her job or has been thrown in jail on charges of "anti-Soviet propoganda" or "hooliganism." We have a moral obligation to speak out against injustice in this world wherever it occurs, against whomever it is being committed, and the Jews of the Soviet Union are no exception. Many of the Jews of Russia today are the survivors of or the children of survivors of the victims of Nazi persecution during the Second World War. How ironic it would be if the Jews were to have survived the physical torture of the Nazis only to succumb to the forced assimilation of the Soviet Government.

We cannot sit idly by and watch another great Jewish culture and civilization disappear into the darkness. By means of Solidarity Sunday, we reaffirm our resolve to keep the pressure on the Soviets, to let them know that we are determined to help the Jews of Russia to live as Jews without fear of persecution and to be able to emigrate, should they choose to do so. It is our solemn duty to speak out on behalf of Soviet Jewry, and we can do no less.●

IN SUPPORT OF CONSUMER AND HOMEMAKING EDUCATION

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, for many years vocational home economics education has played an important part in the education of our young citizens. I know that in my home State of Arkansas, the consumer and homemaking education program has helped countless young students get a better start on adult life by giving them the skills necessary to handle a home and family, such as financial responsibility, consumer choices, parenting skills, child development, proper nutrition, and managing home and work responsibilities.

In fact, just last October Congress recognized the contribution of consumer and homemaking education when it passed the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act, Public Law 98-524, reauthorizing Federal support for this worthwhile program. Homemaking education has been a line item in the vocational education budget until this year, when the administration proposed eliminating it as a line item beginning in fiscal year 1986, and including the funds as part of the title II basic grant. This proposal could have an adverse effect on homemaking education.

Although the same $32 million amount that was appropriated in fiscal year 1985 would be added to the basic grant amount for fiscal year 1986, the funds would no longer be earmarked especially for homemaking education. This would mean that States could choose not to fund the program, or to fund it at lower levels.

I believe that this would be a mistake. Homemaking education adds another dimension to the education of our children. Dedicated home economics teachers help young people come to terms with adult life and learn to cope with many of the everyday problems that they will face. In a recent letter to me, Dr. Reba Davis, president of the Arkansas Alliance of Professional Organizations of Home Economics and Related Fields, stated, "I am convinced that without this dedicated group of professionals at work, the social problems of rape, suicide, divorce, drugs, teen pregnancy, and others would drastically increase."

In Arkansas, over 27 percent of all secondary school students elect to take home economics courses, and of that number 39 percent are young men. These statistics speak well of Arkansas' excellent home economics program.

Home economics is unique and vital because it is the only field that has the family as its focus. For the stability of our Nation, it must continue to be recognized as a national priority, and should certainly remain a separate line item in the fiscal year 1986 budget.●

JOINT RESOLUTION FOR NATIONAL HOLSTEIN DAY

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a joint resolution that May 25, 1985, be proclaimed "National Holstein Day." The Holstein breed of dairy cattle produces upward of 90 percent of the Nation's milk supply, and U.S. holsteins are recognized worldwide as being the superior strain of holstein breeding stock. In addition, the genetic pool of the holstein breed in the United States has become the primary source of genetic material for the development and improvement of dairy cattle in the world, and the Holstein-Friesian Association of America maintains the only official, complete genetic data bank and lineage record for all purebred, registered holstein dairy cattle in the United States.

This association, which is a nonprofit membership organization of more than 44,000 breeders of purebred, registered holstein dairy cattle, was organized May 25, 1885, and chartered by the Legislature of New York as a union of two predecessor organizations dating back to 1871. The association, through its many programs and services to the dairy industry has provided and continues to provide an environment, incentives, and genetic data for continued improvement of the holstein breed.

Accordingly, I introduce this joint resolution today to proclaim May 25, 1985, as National Holstein Day and give the Holstein-Friesian Association of America the recognition they so clearly deserve.●

ELIE WEISEL INTERPRETS THE IMPORTANCE OF OUR VICTORY OVER NAZI GERMANY

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, this year freedom-loving people around the world are celebrating the anniversary of the victory of America and our allies over Nazi barbarism.

No one has so eloquently captured the eternal moral significance of that triumph as well as the poet and writer, Elie Weisel.

Mr. Weisel, a survivor of the Buchenwald death camp, made the following remarks in an impassioned appeal to President Reagan that the President cancel his visit to the military cemetery in Bitburg. Mr. Weisel's statement came at the White House after President Reagan presented him with the Congressional Gold Medal of Achievement.

Mr. Weisel's statement, though unsuccessful in convincing Mr. Reagan to avoid Bitburg, is enormously moving in its assessment of the importance of allied victory in World War II. He measures well the debt we all owe to the 300,000 American soldiers who laid down their lives in the defense of civilization against the depravity of the Nazis. In that, Mr. Weisel was as successful as any speaker I have ever heard. I wanted to share his statement with every Member of Congress and the American people.

Mr. Weisel's remarks on that day follow:

ELIE WEISEL INTERPRETS WORLD WAR II ERA

Mr. President, speaking of the conciliation, I was very pleased that we met before, so a stage of the conciliation has been set in motion between us. But then, we were never on two sides. We were on the same side. We were always on the side of justice, always on the side of memory, against the SS and against what they represent.

It was good talking to you, and I am grateful to you for the medal. But this medal is not mine alone. It belongs to all those who remember what the SS killers have done to their victims.

It was given to me by the American people for my writings, teaching and for my testimony. When I write, I feel my invisible teachers standing over my shoulders, reading my words and judging their veracity. And while I feel responsible for the living, I feel equally responsible to the dead. Their memory dwells in my memory.

Forty years ago, a young man awoke and he found himself an orphan in an orphaned world. What have I learned in the last 40 years? Small things. I learned the perils of language and those of silence. I learned that in extreme situations when human lives and dignity are at stake, neutrality is a sin. It helps the killers, not the victims. I learned the meaning of solitude, Mr. President. We were alone, desperately alone.

IMPOSSIBLE TO COUNT ALL THE NAMES

Today is April 19 and April 19, 1943, the Warsaw Ghetto rose in arms against the onslaught of the Nazis. They were so few and so young and so helpless. And nobody came to their help. And they had to fight what was then the mightiest legion in Europe. Every undergound received help except the Jewish underground. And yet they managed to fight and resist and push back those Nazis and their accomplices for six weeks. And yet the leaders of the free world, Mr. President, knew everything and did so little, or nothing, or at least nothing specifically to save Jewish children from death. You spoke of Jewish children, Mr. President. One million Jewish children perished. If I spent my entire life reciting their names, I would die before finishing the task.

Mr. President, I have seen children, I have seen them being thrown in the flames alive. Words, they died on my lips. So I have learned, I have learned, I have learned the fragility of the human condition.

And I am reminded of a great moral essayist. The gentle and forceful Abe Rosenthal, having visited Auschwitz, once wrote an extraordinary reportage about the persecution of Jews, and he called it, "Forgive them not Father, for they knew what they did."

OPPOSITE OF LOVE IS INDIFFERENCE

I have learned that the Holocaust was a unique and uniquely Jewish event, albeit with universal implications. Not all victims were Jews. But all Jews were victims. I have learned the danger of indifference, the crime of indifference. For the opposite of love, I have learned, is not hate, but indifference. Jews were killed by the enemy but betrayed by their so-called allies, who found political reasons to justify their indifference or passivity.

But I have also learned that suffering confers no privileges. It all depends what one does with it. And this is why survivors, of whom you spoke, Mr. President, have tried to teach their contemporaries how to build on ruins, how to invent hope in a world that offers none, how to proclaim faith to a generation that has seen it shamed and mutilated. And I believe, we believe, that memory is the answer, perhaps the only answer.

TRIED TO CARRY THEM IN TRIUMPH

A few days ago, on the anniversary of the liberation of Buchenwald, all of us, Americans, watched with dismay and anger as the Soviet Union and East Germany distorted both past and present history.

Mr. President, I was there. I was there when American liberators arrived. And they gave us back our lives. And what I felt for them then nourishes me to the end of my days and will do so. If you only knew what we tried to do with them then. We who were so weak that we couldn't carry our own lives, we tried to carry them to triumph.

Mr. President, we are grateful to the American Army for liberating us. We are grateful to this country, the greatest democracy in the world, the freest nation in the world, the moral nation, the authority in the world. And we are grateful, especially, to this country for having offered haven and refuge, and grateful to its leadership for being so friendly to Israel.

And, Mr. President, do you know that the Ambassador of Israel, who sits next to you, who is my friend, and has been for so many years, is himself a survivor? And if you knew all the causes we fought together for the last 30 years, you should be prouder of him. And we are proud of him.

And we are grateful, of course, to Israel. We are eternally grateful to Israel for existing. We needed Israel in 1948 as we need it now. And we are grateful to Congress for its continuous philosophy of humanism and compassion for the underprivileged.

And as for yourself, Mr. President, we are so grateful to you for being a friend of the Jewish people, for trying to help the oppressed Jews in the Soviet Union. And to do whatever we can to save Shcharansky and Abe Stolar and Iosif Begun and Sakharov and all the dissidents who need freedom. And of course, we thank you for your support of the Jewish state of Israel.

But, Mr. President, I wouldn't be the person I am, and you wouldn't respect me for what I am, if I were not to tell you also of the sadness that is in my heart for what happened during the last week. And I am sure that you, too, are sad for the same reasons.

SPEAK TRUTH TO POWER

What can I do? I belong to a traumatized generation. And to us, as to you, symbols are important. And furthermore, following our ancient tradition, and we are speaking about Jewish heritage, our tradition commands us "to speak truth to power."

So may I speak to you, Mr. President, with respect and admiration, of the events that happened?

We have met four or five times. And each time I came away enriched, for I know of your commitment to humanity.

And therefore I am convinced, as you have told us earlier when we spoke, that you were not aware of the presence of SS graves in the Bitburg cemetery. Of course you didn't know. But now we all are aware.

May I, Mr. President, if it's possible at all, implore you to do something else, to find a way, to do something else, to find a way, to find another way, another site? That place, Mr. President, is not your place. Your place is with the victims of the SS.

Oh, we know there are political and strategic reasons, but this issue, as all issues related to that awesome event, transcends politics and diplomacy.

The issue here is not politics, but good and evil. And we must never confuse them.

For I have seen the SS at work. And I have seen their victims. They were my friends. They were my parents.

Mr. President, there was a degree of suffering and loneliness in the concentration camps that defies imagination. Cut off from the world with no refuge anywhere, sons watched helplessly their fathers being beaten to death. Mothers watched their children die of hunger. And then there was Mengele and his selections. Terror, fear, isolation, torture, gas chambers, flames, flames rising to the heavens.

ONLY THE KILLERS ARE GUILTY

But, Mr. President, I know and I understand, we all do, that you seek reconciliation, and so do I, so do we. And I too wish to attain true reconciliation with the German people. I do not believe in collective guilt, nor in collective responsibility. Only the killers were guilty. Their sons and daughters are not.

And I believe, Mr. President, that we can and we must work together with them and with all people. And we must work to bring peace and understanding to a tormented world that, as you know, is still awaiting redemption.

I thank you, Mr. President.●

REA'S BIRTHDAY

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to take note of the fact that on May 11, we will mark the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration, an event that has special significance in my district of Pennsylvania.

The late Gov. Gifford Pinchot of Pennsylvania was one of the leaders in the Nation in bringing electric service to the rural areas of the Keystone State. Governor Pinchot's estate, Grey Towers, is located in Pike County, PA, which is a part of my congressional district. The estate is now owned by the Federal Government and stands as a monument to Governor Pinchot and his foresight.

Fifty short years ago, many rural farms and rural homes did not enjoy the benefits of electrical power. Today, because of the REA and electric cooperatives, there are very few areas of our Nation without power.

Governor Pinchot ordered a study of Pennsylvania's utility industry and the man who carried it out, Morris L. Cooke, became the first head of the REA. The man who succeeded him, John M. Carmody, was also a Pennsylvanian.

I am proud of what those Pennsylvanians accomplished. The success of the REA becomes evident each evening as darkness falls and the lights click on across rural America.●

BUDGET CUTS OF THE ADMINISTRATION HAVE HURT THE VISITING NURSE ASSOCIATION

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, 1984 marked the 80th anniversary of the Visiting Nurse Association of the Greater Youngstown area [VNA]. For 80 years the VNA of the Greater Youngstown area has provided quality home health care to the people in the Youngstown community. I rise today to commend the VNA for the fine work it has done and for the 80 years of vital service it has provided to the Youngstown community. I also rise to express my concern over the administration's cutbacks in Federal entitlement programs that have significantly hindered the efforts of the VNA across the country. No where are the services of the VNA more vital than in my home district, which has been victim in recent years of some of the highest unemployment levels in the entire country.

The purpose of the VNA is as clear and as necessary as it was 80 years ago—the provision, with a family-centered approach, of skilled nursing and other therapeutic services on a part-time basis in the home or specific clinic settings that contribute to meeting the health needs of individuals and families, and the promotion of health and prevention of illness, both physical and mental. In light of the many changes that have taken place in the health care delivery system in recent years the VNA is committed to meeting the new challenge of the 1980's: to ensure that quality comprehensive coordinated home care services are accessible to all in the community and are utilized by them when needed.

In recent years, Mr. Speaker, the VNA of the Greater Youngstown area has found it increasingly difficult to meet this challenge. Cutbacks and changes in entitlement programs at the Federal level have adversely impacted upon and continue to effect the VNA. The continued increase in more narrow interpretations of Medicare guidelines and eligibility for service reimbursement had a negative impact on the VNA's staff and patients in the Youngstown area. The disturbing result has been a reduced volume of service, as well as revenues. The overall economy of the Youngstown area has been seriously stifled by mass unemployment. My district has not experienced the so-called economic recovery. The economic situation has impacted on the VNA in that fewer people, because of their financial situation, have any health coverage that includes home health care benefits.

Another growing problem for the VNA has been the increasing numbers of elderly in the Youngstown community. Because of advances in scientific knowledge and technology, advances in medical care and treatment, and improvements in environmental controls, life expectancy has risen dramatically. Today the fastest growing segment of the population is in the age group 85 years and older. It is anticipated that the elderly population in the Youngstown area will continue to increase. In wake of recent cutbacks in Federal funding programs by the Reagan administration, the VNA is faced with a pressing challenge to meet the growing need for long-term home health services. Many times home health care service can prevent or postpone premature institutionalization.

The Visiting Nurse Association of the Greater Youngstown area has provided the people in my district with much needed and quality home health care service for over 80 years. They continue to provide vital services to our community and action must be taken to ensure that vital Federal programs to assist the VNA in their work are not cut back or eliminated. We here in Congress must not turn our backs on this Nation's elderly and those who desperately need the services the VNA provides. I urge my colleague to do the human thing—oppose further cuts and reductions in entitlement programs for the elderly and home health programs.●

NEW YORK VIETNAM VETERANS MEMORIAL COMMISSION

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I invite the Members to join me in commending the New York Vietnam Veterans Memorial Commission. Yesterday they celebrated the opening of a memorial to New Yorkers who served in Vietnam with an old-fashioned ticker tape parade. The memorial, located in my congressional district in lower Manhattan, is a glass block sculpture etched with excerpts of letters sent to and from Vietnam. The letters will form the basis of "Dear America," a book whose proceeds will be directed to a unique "living memorial" to Vietnam veterans. This living memorial is a program dedicated to resolving the problems of the unemployed and underemployed New York Vietnam veteran. The program includes a model jobs program, job skills training, and specialized employment counseling and support services. This creative initiative, conceived and conducted by the commission, deserves our enthusiastic support. The commission's efforts enable New Yorkers to commemorate the Vietnam veteran.

I am familiar with the needs of Vietnam veterans and the failure of this administration to provide the health, employment, educational, and supportive services they need. One of my efforts in Congress has been to ensure that Federal funds and resources allocated for the Vietnam veteran with readjustment problems actually reaches the veteran in need. In some ways, arriving home was the most traumatic event of all for men and women returning from Vietnam. Returning soldiers and nurses were treated as pariahs, the protagonists of an unpopular war. The monument erected by the New York Vietnam Veterans Memorial Commission serves to remind us of the commitment demonstrated by those who served in Vietnam. Our efforts in Congress can contribute to providing the health and human services deserved by those who served.

Let us express our gratitude to the commission for assuming the task of raising funds to serve those who served in Vietnam, in memoriam and in life. Let us renew our commitment to the veterans of Vietnam by ensuring that those urgently needed services are provided.●

ALDINE ISD OBSERVES 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the Aldine Independent School District observed the 50th anniversary of its founding on May 4, and I would like to take this opportunity to commend the administrators, faculty members, students and parents—past and present—on the tremendous progress made over the years in the Aldine ISD.

Fifty years ago, on May 4, 1935, the residents of the communities of Higgs, Brubaker, Westfield, and Aldine came together to vote on whether or not to merge their schools into one unified system. As a result of that vote, the old Common School District No. 29 was transformed into the current-day Aldine Independent School District.

At ceremonies I attended last Saturday, more than 8,500 guests—and more than 10,000 students—joined together to celebrate the progress Aldine ISD has made over the last half century. Attending those ceremonies were M.O. Campbell, the current superintendent of the Aldine ISD, and the two surviving former superintendents: John Earl Barden, who served as superintendent from 1941–44, and Dr. W.W. Thorne, who headed the Aldine ISD from 1958–72.

With 36,000 students 2,000 teachers, a total of 3,200 employees—counting support staff—and 34 schools, the Aldine ISD is the second largest school district in Harris County.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the Aldine ISD on its 50th anniversary. Those of us familiar with the educational excellence of the Aldine ISD—which, incidentally Mr. Speaker, my mother attended—know that under M.O. Campbell's leadership, that tradition of excellence will continue in the years ahead.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

VETERANS HEALTH CARE BUDGET CANNOT BE REDUCED FURTHER

HON. G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, within the next few weeks, the House and Senate will be making major decisions on the budget for fiscal year 1986. Many Federal programs will be affected. The decisions we must make will not be easy. We all have different priorities.

A very high priority of mine is veterans health care. I want my colleagues to fully understand the impact of any budget reductions in funds to operate the VA's health care system. Who is better able to relate the problems in the field than the people in the field?

According to the Chiefs of Staff at VA hospitals nationwide who responded to a recent survey, inadequate budgets are already taking their toll. More cuts in the budget will mean longer waiting lists, the turning away of certain non-service-connected veterans, and delays in many surgical procedures.

There follows a report from the Chief of Staff at the VA medical center in Hines, IL:

EDWARD HINES, JR., HOSPITAL,
Hines, IL, February 11, 1985.

HOWARD H. GREEN, M.D.,
Chief of Staff (11), VA Medical Center, White River Junction, VT.

DEAR HOWARD: In response to your letter dated January 2, 1985, I submit the following responses:

a. The Hines VA Hospital is a general medical and surgical health care facility with 1,156 operating beds consisting of 317 medical, 254 surgical, 240 psychiatric, 135 spinal cord injury, 118 intermediate medicine, 47 neurology, 25 rehabilitation medicine, and 20 blind rehabilitation beds. Additionally, Hines currently has 120 NHCU beds with a project in progress to increase these beds to 240.

b. Hines is primarily affiliated with the Stritch School of Medicine and Dentistry, other affiliations are active with Loyola University, the University of Illinois College of Medicine, and Chicago Medical School. These affiliations provide approved residency training programs in 16 medical and 3 dental specialties.

c. We, at Hines, will manage our budget to preclude any dollar deficit at the end of the fiscal year. However, as dollars have been reduced, staffing has been reduced accordingly. We have experienced dollar decreases in both personnel services and all other, while at the same time patient workload continues to increase. These decreases have occurred with some impact on programmatic activities. We have now reached our point of saturation and any further reductions could result in drastic changes.

Patients in health care facilities, such as Hines, with comprehensive rehabilitation programs requiring long hospital stays with intensive nursing care, have caused an additional drain on our resources under DRG reimbursement. The resource allocation model currently utilized indicated for last fiscal year that Hines will lose in excess of five million dollars from its recurring base over the next five years. The amount of loss actually incurred this year was minimal compared to the total figure; however, the message was "loud and clear" that we must make some major programmatic changes or suffer the consequence.

It is a known fact that any DRG reimbursement methodology does not adequately address rehabilitation programs. This fact, along with the fact that Hines Hospital has been given and has internally shifted considerable resources into its rehabilitation efforts, is causing a major allocation problem. Under this allocation methodology, our hospital budget is squeezed to the bone and will essentially mean that in many cases these concepts will erode.

d. Obviously, the monetary deficit on personnel, supplies, and equipment will greatly impair the hospital's ability to function as a comprehensive health care facility. As these resources diminish, so will our ability to recruit and retain the high caliber clinicians and technical staff essential for our various treatment modalities. The continually increasing workload without corresponding budgetary increases has put this facility in a precarious position relative to providing the highest quality patient care. Current resource austerity, felt primarily in the area of personnel services and equipment funding, if continued will soon compromise the services our clinicians are able to provide to our veterans.

It appears that our most logical course of action would be to implement reductions in programmatic services and/or ward closures. However, if either of these actions were to transpire, the results will not only impact patient care programs and services, but also erode the educational and research activities to the degree of reducing or eliminating affiliations. The end result will be a hospital providing primary suboptimal care to our veterans. On the national basis the VA system will be required to shrink either horizontally, vertically, or both (horizontal shrinkage dictating a dramatic reduction in the services provided nationwide; vertical shrinkage resulting in contraction of the full spectrum of tertiary care programs, many of which are engaged in pioneering research and educational activities).

If such drastic reductions become necessary, then I envision the eventual closing or consolidating of VAMC's rather than reducing programs beyond the point where they cease to effectively function as a viable health care program.

Not only do we struggle with a budgetary deficit, we also must contend with unreasonable mandated regulations—mandates such as the reduction of GS 11-15 positions where, at Hines, the majority of positions classified in these grades are in direct patient care categories; 3.5% pay raises when it would require an 18.3% pay raise to achieve parity with parallel positions in the private section; elimination of special salary rates for certain hard to recruit category positions, primarily Title 38; 5% reduction in pay for employees who are already underpaid; Deficit Reduction Act (DEFRA), etc.

While we experience these mandates and the continued erosion of the budget, we continue to experience an increase in workload. With the advent of health care management by DRG, DRG dumping and the general economic decline of certain sections of our population have all attributed to this increase.

Capital equipment within the health care arena is in constant technological flux. Advances are rapidly occurring, and outdate what is now considered state of the art. Our equipment must be updated routinely and provided to our clinicians who wish to continue advancing treatment modalities. For the recent past, equipment funding has been, for all practical purposes, nonexistent at this hospital as well as others in this district. Funding for both additional and replacement equipment has not kept pace with needs (both fair wear and tear, as well as acquisition of new technology). Again, I point out that without the timely maintenance, replacement, and acquisition of appropriate and adequate technologies, retention of quality staff will be problematic resulting in further reduction of quality patient care. Physicians, nurses, and other health care personnel will not provide care at institutions where equipment is outdated and life-threatening. I also mention the legal liability we have towards our patients in assuring them of safe and appropriate treatment.

As new facilities are constructed, equipment money is readily available to purchase modern technology. These facilities are equipped with "state of the art" equipment having an average life of approximately ten years. What the planners fail to consider is what happens in ten years when this equipment becomes worn out and ready for replacement. No provisions have been made to fund this expense, and the hospital is faced with a dilemma.

We have not experienced a backlog in patient surgery due to specific dollar deficits. We continue to perform our surgical procedures in addition to the limited referrals from other VAMC's within normal waiting periods. However, as stated previously we have reached the point of saturation, and any additional dollar reduction will impact our ability to provide service to the veteran. We could anticipate either a large backlog or reduction of cases or both.

WILLIAM R. BEST, M.D.,
Chief of Staff.●

REQUESTING THAT A MEDAL OF HONOR BE AWARDED TO JOHN YANCEY (USMC RET.)

HON. TOMMY ROBINSON

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join with my fellow Arkansans in honoring the courage of Capt. John Yancey of Little Rock, AR.

On December 8, 1941, the day after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, John enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps. This was just the beginning of a long series of heroic acts and sacrifices by Captain Yancey on behalf of his country. In November 1942, while still a first lieutenant, John Yancey, with a small group of men, took and held an important piece of jungle.

John Yancey, in the finest tradition of the Marine Corps, once again displayed his fine character and bravery during the Korean conflict. During the fight for the Chosin Reservoir in North Korea, one of the most costly of the war, John Yancey, after suffering three serious wounds, led several platoons against overwhelming odds to retake and hold Hill 1282. It is for this action, and subsequent action on Hill 698 that I request that Mr. Yancey be awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Mr. President, the Medal of Honor is given to those servicemen and women who have served "above and beyond the call of duty" in the face of the enemy. Captain Yancey exemplifies the incredible courage, dedication to duty, and professionalism associated with this high honor. Many marines have attested to the fact that Captain Yancey's actions saved Hill 1282 as well as numerous American lives. For these reasons, I strongly support the request of these marines that the Congressional Medal of Honor be bestowed on John Yancey.●

CHASE MANHATTAN CHAIRMAN'S REMARKS ON DEFICIT

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today, we find ourselves in the midst of one of the most significant budget debates of recent history. The continued growth of the Federal budget deficit has reached such proportions that the strength and stability of our economy, which we Americans have worked hard to secure, is being threatened by a near unanswerable national debt. If we do not act wisely and decisively to roll back the tide of deficit spending, the future of the economic base upon which much of the greatness of this Nation is founded, will certainly be undermined.

The seriousness of the deficit warrants careful consideration of all possible means of deficit reductions. I ask my colleagues to seek advice about the various proposals from all perspectives of analysis of the problem. In order to provide an alternative view of how the deficit might be treated, I call to the attention of my colleagues the remarks of Willard C. Butcher, chairman of the board of the Chase Manhattan Bank, NA. On February 5, 1985, Mr. Butcher gave the following remarks to the American Mining Congress:

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT: THE NEED FOR BIPARTISANSHIP

Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen.

It is a great pleasure for me to take part in this annual meeting of the American Mining Congress. I have had a deep interest in—and even a close emotional attachment to—your industry since my first mine viewing expedition to Bingham Canyon, almost 30 years ago. I thought then and I believe now that mining is a most essential industry to this country. Indeed, while the word "critical" is often overworked, the mining business is in fact "critical" to the vital interest of our nation.

My own industry, like yours, has taken some hard knocks over the last couple of years. Bankers and miners alike have felt the impact of a whole constellation of economic factors.

First, the strong U.S. dollar has on the one hand encouraged overseas export of metals to the United States, thus displacing domestic manufacturers, and on the other hand, helped close off export markets abroad.

Second, high worldwide interest rates, have depressed economic activity in other countries and reduced overseas demand for U.S. products.

Third, foreign competitors have been subsidized in a number of countries.

Fourth, and closely related, we find a different kind of subsidized foreign competitor—namely, sovereign producers whose primary goal is to secure foreign exchange and improve local employment.

Fifth, demand has been reduced for a number of metals due to the increased production of small cars and a shift toward high-tech products and production methods that require less metals.

And sixth, we have experienced sharp commodity price deflation.

These six factors are a formidable list.

But many observers—and I number myself among them—believe that the primary, principal, and most important factor responsible for our uncompetitiveness and the resultant trade deficit is the extraordinary strength of the U.S. dollar.

And the most important cause of the dollar's strength is the relatively high level of U.S. interest rates.

And the most significant underlying cause for that high level of rates is the other great deficit that afflicts our nation—the burgeoning federal budget deficit.

And it is this subject—the budget deficit—that I have chosen for my remarks today.

Now before anybody heads for the door—let me assure you that I am well aware there's been an awful lot of talk lately about the budget deficit. And some of you may think that by addressing this topic yet again, I'm "beating a dead horse." Well ladies and gentlemen, I guarantee you—this deficit "horse" is far from "dead". It's very much alive and galloping out-of-control.

The central facts about the deficit are simple, stark, and terribly serious.

In fiscal 1984, the United States overspent its income by $175 billion. Our national debt last year soared to more than $1.5 trillion. That debt required an interest expenditure of more than $150 billion.

To put these numbers in perspective, compare them with the experience during the Kennedy Administration some 20 years ago, just before the huge buildup of the Vietnam War. In 1964, President Kennedy's entire budget was $115 billion. That's $35 billion less than our interest cost to service the national debt last year.

The future is no more inspiring. The government's own deficit projections—without any spending reductions or tax increases—are 218 billion dollars this year . . . 225 billion next year . . . 240 billion in 1987 . . . and 235 billion in 1988.

I realize these numbers differ with those proposed over the weekend by the Reagan Administration. However, I would remind you that the Reagan budget has not yet been adopted.

In any event, the numbers we're talking about numb the mind. And none of us will take heart from an estimate I saw the other day—that if we don't arrest the deficit's growth, total publicly held debt in 2004 would be between 10 and 12 trillion dollars.

Now, how did we come to be immersed in such a fiscal morass?

Some of the deficit's growth is due to our long recession, that accelerated spending and depressed revenues.

But even if we hadn't had a recession, last year we would have had a federal deficit in excess of 100 billion dollars! So, clearly, something other than the recession has been at work.

That "something"—the real culprit—is the fact that growth in government spending continues, in an ever-increasing degree, to outstrip revenue growth.

We are simply living beyond our means. To paraphrase the popular TV commercial, "We're spending money the new-fashioned way—we're not earning it!" And it's our economy, ultimately, that will pay the budget IOU's.

The situation is no different than if you or I, for a protracted period of time, lived beyond our income. Eventually, things would catch up to us. And so it is with our government deficit.

The fact is, government over the years has created spending programs of sweeping promise and lofty intent. At the same time, it has become evident that voters eager to receive benefits have not been as eager to pay for them.

As Illinois' new senator, Paul Simon, said recently: "What the public wants are more services and lower taxes. And we have given them both!"

We are in an intolerable situation that is steadily growing worse. That hasn't prevented some people—including a few prominent economists—from saying "deficits don't count."

Well, ladies and gentlemen, I beg to differ. Deficits do count and furthermore, they're not self-correcting either.

We may not know the precise outcome of our growing mega-deficits—or which of the consequences will exact the highest toll. And, frankly, I don't care to find out.

But the basic conclusion of deficits is incontrovertible. We can't continue to live on borrowed money without living on borrowed time. No individual, no corporation, and no nation can persist in running up debts without sooner or later paying a severe price.

We pay that price because we have no choice but to finance our deficits. And government has only two options in accomplishing this. Neither one is acceptable.

In the first, government prints more and more money to cover the deficit. This would rekindle inflation, and the hard-won ground on that front would be tragically sacrificed for an unworthy cause.

In the second option, the money supply remains in control, reversing the recent course of interest rates and returning them to even higher levels. Government then moves in as a primary borrower, and corporations and individuals are forced to take a back seat in the market. That would return us to square one—again grappling with the consequences of a recessionary economy.

Now, we have been fortunate over the past several years to have been able to keep the money supply in reasonable control without squeezing out the private sector. We've managed this largely because of a huge importation of capital. Foreign investors, in fact, have financed about half of our fiscal deficit.

But ladies and gentlemen, our excessive reliance on overseas capital cannot be assumed to be a permanent solution. Indeed, there is nothing permanent about it. And the more we depend on it, the more vulnerable our own financial base becomes—and the more subject we become to adverse external influences.

And that's the last thing that any of us needs—particularly the mining industry.

The real point is, ladies and gentlemen, we must take the deficit seriously. It is a real, not a paper, tiger. And we continue to ride it at our peril.

As Bob Dole has correctly put it, the budget deficit is far-and-away our number one domestic economic problem—just as the trade deficit is far-and-away our most threatening international economic problem.

So what can we do about it?

Perhaps a look back at how we got to where we are will help point the way to how we get to where we want to be. If one looks at a reasonably broad sweep of history—let's say back to the Kennedy years—we find that the government then took in 19 percent of GNP in taxes and spent about 19 percent. Today, we still take in 19 percent in taxes—even after the so-called Reagan tax cuts. But spending has sped ahead and now accounts for a full 25 percent of GNP.

So clearly, we must attack government spending.

Any meaningful attack on expenses must be aimed at three areas. First, the administrative budget, second social spending, and third defense.

In the first area, some people around this town suggest that we can solve our deficit problem by cutting the administrative budget. The fact is we can't. Indeed, while there may be additional administrative "fat" that can be cut—we've already done a good job in cutting administrative expenses.

Moreover, according to some projections, even if we had no administrative budget—we'd still end fiscal '85 with a budget deficit. In other words, the three elements of defense, interest, and entitlements alone are expected this year to exceed total government revenues.

Our largest hurdles are defense and entitlements, which together comprise 69 percent of the federal budget—27 percent for defense, 42 percent for entitlements.

As for defense spending, a lot can be done—without compromising our nation's military power—by judiciously determining the weapons systems we really need and how we pay for them, in rational, multi-year procurement programs. We simply must find savings in our defense budget.

As to entitlements, we must control more vigorously our social spending. The principal guideline here should be to spread the penalties of such actions evenly across our society. The pain should be shared by everyone except by the poor, as defined by the various means tests.

I'm convinced the time has never been more ripe for an earnest, bipartisan effort to close the budget gap. That is what is required—bipartisanship—a cooperative effort to forge a workable compromise.

The administration has proposed cutting the budget by about $50 billion by fiscal 1986. This ought to form the basis of any deficit-cutting program. We have got to wring that $50 billion and more out of the deficit if we are to reach our targets. And our most critical targets, in my view, are attaining deficit to GNP ratios of 4 percent in 1986, 3 percent in 1987, and 2 percent in 1988.

Now, what about taxes?

Clearly, spending cuts must occupy center stage. Cutting spending must be our primary focus—our first priority. And any tax increases or revenue enhancements must be secondary issues.

However, to attain the kind of bipartisan effort necessary to cut the deficit may well require some give-and-take on the revenue side—to form the basis of a compromise that all sides can accept.

But in any case, we must not yield to the temptation to try to balance the budget principally by imposing higher taxes. We've been there before. And it doesn't work.

If new taxes are necessary, our goal should be to discourage consumption, not investment and savings. Indeed, the personal savings rate in this country is already much too low—about 6-plus percent of Americans' disposable income—compared to 11 percent in West Germany and 18 percent in Japan.

I consider it a positive sign that the level of debate about the budget deficit has intensified recently. Indeed, there is no shortage of specific proposals these days for trimming the deficit. And the last thing you need today is to hear my own personal laundry list of specific cuts. Frankly, there isn't one that I can think of that won't have some pain attached to it. So I'll spare you the Bill Butcher prescription this afternoon.

It isn't ideas that have been wanting. It's been the will to make some unpleasant decisions.

Four years ago when President Reagan took office, he pleaded that he would control inflation and get the country moving again. He has done both. And what is needed now is similar bold determination to solve the deficit problem.

If we are successful in cutting the fiscal deficit—we will have made a giant step toward redressing the other great imbalance—the trade deficit—that so directly affects the people in this room.

But clearly the place to start is with the budget deficit. And the time to start is now.●

THE IRAN AND IRAQ CONFLICT

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, since the resolution of the hostage crisis, the United States has essentially turned away from Iran. The atrocities that so shocked us several years ago did not vanish simply because we turned our attention to other things. Yesterday thousands of Iranians in the United States, Europe, and, under threat of personal danger, in Iran itself staged demonstrations to draw attention to the terrible human suffering that is the daily lot of Iranian citizens. I issued a statement in support of the continuing effort to set the Iranian people free of the Khomeini regime. I would like to enter that statement into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to recall to my colleagues the recent suffering which has occurred inside Iran.

I am speaking in an act of solidarity and support for the overwhelming majority of the people of Iran. I want to help bring to the attention of the American people the tragedy of the ongoing war between Iran and Iraq.

This war is most tragic because of the senseless death and destruction being inflicted. So far, only on the part of Iran, 1 million people have been killed or wounded; 3 million have become homeless and refugees, in addition to billions of dollars in war damage. In the last assault by the Iranian armed forces, there were nearly 60,000 casualties. This most recent offensive was launched only to counter the Iranian people's growing desire for peace. At all costs, the Khomeini regime seeks to keep the flames of war ablaze, and to prevent them from being extinguished in the ashes of hundreds of thousands of war dead. Because of the people's hatred for this conflict, the regime finds itself trying to induce the belief in these war stricken peoples that it loves peace—when in reality the culture of the present rulers in Iran can be bascially said to be founded on a hysterical battle against all manifestations of liberty, both in nature and in society.

The regime can only survive by promoting death, grief and sorrow, while showing hostility toward all forms of civil and human rights and internaional norms.

Both the Iranian and the Iraqi Governments have repeatedly been accused of using chemical warfare in the form of toxic gases. The casualties have by no means been limited to military personnel only. The civilian population: old men, wives, small children, have been killed and wounded by the thousands; their homes, towns, and livelihoods destroyed.

The consequences for the fabric of these societies, among the oldest in our Western civilization, of destruction, mass migration and economic and political chaos are unimaginable to those of us who have not been there. The American public can only have the vaguest image of the suffering of the people of both countries.

Compulsory conscription of adolescents—children by our standards—has become a feature of the Iranian war effort. I ask those of us observing this tragedy, how would you feel if your 15-year-old son were sent to the front in a bloody war, for a religious purpose in which you did not believe?

This war has dragged on for nearly 5 years. The people of Iran support the idea of peace, support the idea of an end to this senseless and bloody conflict which is draining their nation of its lifeblood, and killing off its next generations.

The movement for peace and freedom in Iran under the leadership of the National Council of Resistance is getting stronger. Solidarity demonstrations have taken place in capitals around the world; in addition, demonstrations have taken place repeatedly inside Iran, in the face of brutal repression by the Khomeini regime.

And today, here and in 10 other major cities around the world, we express our solidarity and support for the movement for peace and freedom in Iran.

Solh, solh azadi: Peace, peace freedom.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO REPEAL 5-PERCENT FLOOR ON DEDUCTIONS FOR MEDICAL EXPENSES IN THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to make all medical expenses deductible by repealing the 5-percent floor on the medical deduction from section 213 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. I urge my colleagues to join me in this repeal.

The medical component of the current cost of living index is rising faster than any other section of our economy. Medical expenses are increasing annually at an 8- to 10-percent rate—2½ times that of the entire economy as a whole. This increase in medical costs and services destroys the savings of the elderly, the poor, and even the middle class as many times they are unable to protect their earnings from the 5-percent floor.

Preventive health care is a vital part of keeping medical costs low. I believe that when we raised the floor on deductibility of medical expenses to 5 percent in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, we actually have discouraged individuals from seeking the care that they need. It is my firm belief that we should not place any impediments through the Tax Code or through Federal regulations to the receipt of adequate health care.

This legislation would repeal the 5-percent floor and simply allow all of our citizens—rich and poor, young and old alike—to deduct all their legitimate, reasonable and customary medical expenses from their tax basis in each fiscal year.

We all recognize that when an individual is in a catastrophic health situation, where their medical expenses are high, they can deduct those expenses from their income tax to the extent that it exceeds 5 percent of their income.

I am concerned that there are a number of our citizens, particularly the elderly, who are postponing or even avoiding medical care because of this 5-percent floor, thereby, when illness strikes, it is much more severe and ultimately is much more costly to our economy. By removing the 5-percent floor we will actually gain in revenues as we gain in productivity. People will attend to their illnesses in a much more timely manner, and sickness and disease will be arrested in the early stages.

The legislation that put the floor into place and then raised it to its current 5 percent level was done in a mistaken attempt at economy. Now is the time to correct this inequity in our Tax Code.

Thank you for the time, Mr. Speaker. I invite my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.●

SMALL BUSINESS AND THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in expressing my support for the small businesses of America and for the agency designed to assist them, the Small Business Administration [SBA].

Small business is an integral segment of American society. This Nation was transformed from a colony based on agriculture to the world's greatest industrial giant. Undeniably, it was the small enterpreneur with a sharp eye for expansion opportunities that provided the spark for this transformation. In a time of economic recession, shortage of resources, and an ever increasing budget deficit, we, as a nation, cannot afford to hinder in any way the valuable contributions that the small businesses makes to our society.

This Nation is currently enjoying an economic recovery for which small business is the backbone. During the recent recession it was small business that was hit hardest, yet the creation of new small businesses and the expansion of existing ones were the leading source of new jobs or replacement for jobs lost because of plant closures. In 1981 and 1982 alone, small business created some 2.6 million new jobs while big business lost 1.6 million. Clearly, the President's vaunted net employment increase during his first term of office was a result in the growth of small business. Without the contributions of small business, our Nation could not continue down the road toward good economic health. Small firms have proven their vital leadership role in job creation, product innovation, and the development of new technologies. The contributions of small business can be seen in every aspect of our economy.

Minority owned small businesses have played a significant role in this expansion as well. In the 1972 to 1982 period the number of minority owned businesses increased by 43 percent, and account for 5.7 percent of the total small businesses in the United States. California has the greatest concentration of minority owned small businesses; 19 percent of the total number. Almost half of these businesses are located in the Los Angeles metropolitan area, the area which I in part represent.

Undoubtedly, some of these contributions would not have been made without the assistance of the Small Business Administration [SBA]. The SBA has helped foster hundreds of thousands of small businesses who probably would never have gotten passed the planning stages without it's assistance. The accomplishments of the SBA are impressive. Since it's founding in 1953 the SBA has made or guaranteed more than $35.7 billion in loans, helped thousands of small firms win Government procurement contracts, created over 33.4 million hours worth of work, contributed over $468 billion to the gross national product, and $142 billion of income-tax revenue. When the SBA was created there were approximately 4 million small businesses in the United States. Today there are more than 13 million, certainly the SBA had some part in that growth.

The SBA has been especially beneficial in assisting minority businesses which, in turn, improves the conditions of economically depressed areas. However, minorities often face economic disadvantages which prevent them from opening their own businesses such as the lower level of family income. According to a study conducted by the National Federation of Independent Business [NFIB], 25 percent of new businesses are founded by personal and family savings. This poses a setback for blacks and Hispanics whose yearly median family income is 58 percent and 69 percent respectively, of the median income of all races.

Of utmost importance to small, disadvantaged businesses is the 8(a) procurement programs. In this program the SBA acts as the prime contractor and subcontracts out to small, economically, and socially disadvantaged firms interested in obtaining Government contracts. In fiscal year 1984 some 4,944 Government contracts were awarded to 1,716 disadvantaged firms, 208 of which were owned by women, for a value of $2.6 billion.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my colleagues that small business is in many ways the key to our economic well-being. Without small business our potential for job expansion will be inhibited and our gross national product will shrink. The SBA has been tremendously vital to the growth of small business, and is an agency we cannot afford to lose.●

RETRAINING OUR FARMERS

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, all across our country, the clouds of a massive agricultural crisis are taking shape, threatening to throw thousands of farmers out of business and pulling down with them many rural banks and businesses. As a result, an increasing number of individuals are losing their livelihood due to this turn in the economy and the ripple effects that will likely spread through agriculturally dependent communities. Many of the individuals affected by this crisis must now consider new lines of work, they are in fact, "dislocated workers."

In the past, the term "dislocated worker" has conjured up the image of a steelworker in Pittsburgh or an auto worker in Detroit; but in Missouri, a State with relatively low unemployment, the face associated with the phrase is that of one of the hundreds of farmers who are expected to abandon farming this year because they have gone bankrupt or can no longer borrow enough money to plant a crop and purchase necessary equipment.

Measures must be taken to ease the distress of farmers as they face the reality of having to retrain themselves for a new career. Most farmers have a very specific set of skills, and because most of them will have to seek work unrelated to agriculture, new job skills are essential.

Title III of the Job Training and Partnership Act [JTPA] provides one such measure. Under title III, grants are provided to States on a formula basis for programs and services to dislocated workers. Programs authorized under title III provide training to persons out of work because of any permanent closure of a plant or facility. On February 20, I joined 15 Members of Congress in writing to Acting Secretary of Labor, Ford B. Ford urging him to issue a letter to all Governors informing them of the option available to States of including dislocated farmers as dislocated workers in order to participate in training programs under title III of JTPA. I understand that a copy of this letter has been presented to our new Secretary of Labor, William Brock. I am submitting a copy of the letter for the RECORD.

I urge States to take advantage of the opportunities under title III of JTPA and make their services for dislocated workers widely known to their agricultural communities. Participation in these programs represent one small way the Federal Government can help our struggling farm families begin the difficult task of making new lives for themselves.

The letter follows:

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, DC, February 20, 1985.

Hon. FORD B. FORD,
Acting Secretary of Labor,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. FORD: As you are aware there is growing concern regarding the current economic crisis many farmers are about to face. An increasing number of farmers are losing their livelihood due to the economic downturn and the ripple effects that are likely to spread throughout agriculturally dependent communities across the country.

Title III of the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) provides grants to States on a formula basis for programs and services to dislocated workers defined under the Act, Section 302(a), as individuals who:

1. have been terminated or laid-off or who have received a notice of termination or layoff from employment, are eligible for or have exhausted their entitlement to unemployment compensation, and are unlikely to return to their previous industry or occupation;

2. have been terminated, or who have received a notice of termination of employment, as a result of any permanent closure of a plant or facility; or

3. are long-term unemployed and have limited opportunities for employment or reemployment in the same or a similar occupation in the area in which such individuals reside, including any older individuals who may have substantial barriers to employment by reason of age.

The agricultural industry is undergoing many of the same changes with regard to the numbers of people needed to provide products as are such industries as steel and automobile manufacturing. These changes are permanent and will not be reversed. Since most farmers have very specific sets of skills, and because most of them will have to seek work unrelated to agriculture, job retraining will be of paramount importance.

In our judgment it would not conflict with Congressional intent to include dislocated farmers under this deliberately broad definition. It is not apparent though, that States are utilizing title III programs to serve such farmers. One possible reason why these programs are not widespread is the uncertainty regarding the definition of "dislocated worker." It is critical therefore, that States be made aware of their option to serve dislocated farmers under JTPA. Title III funds could be used to provide training and support services to dislocated farmers and others dependent on the agricultural economy in a coordinated effort with other necessary social services.

We strongly urge that you issue a letter to all the Governors informing them of this option under the law. That is, that dislocated farmers may be defined as dislocated workers in order to participate in training programs under title III of the JTPA. Without a uniform policy, we are concerned that unnecessary hesitancy will weaken the efforts of the States to meet this growing need.

Prompt attention with respect to this issue is crucial. We do not want this unmet need to go unattended for lack of definition. If we can be of any assistance in facilitating action on this issue, please inform us.

Sincerely,

THE OUTRAGE AT IBNET

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, May 2, I introduced with the full support of the Republican members of the Select Committee on Hunger (Mr. EMERSON, Mr. EVANS, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. MORRISON of Washington, Mr. SMITH of Oregon, and Mr. BEREUTER) a sense of the Congress resolution which expresses outrage at the forced evacuation of over 60,000 famine victims from a feeding camp in northwestern Ethiopia.

I have asked the Foreign Affairs Committee to expedite consideration and bring the following resolution to the floor under a unanimous-consent request:

SUSPEND THE RULES AND PASS THE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION, H. CON. RES. 140 WITH AMENDMENTS

In the sixth paragraph of the preamble, strike out "half" and insert in lieu thereof "one-third", and insert "in Ethiopia" before the semicolon.

In subsection (a) of the first section, strike out "civilized".

Material proposed to be deleted appears in [brackets] and material proposed to be inserted appears in italic.

H. CON. RES. 140

MRS. ROUKEMA submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to the forced evacuation of the Ibnet feeding camp in Ethiopia.

Whereas from April 28 to April 30, 1985, Ethiopian army troops ousted about 60,000 famine victims from the Ibnet feeding camp in the Gondar Administrative Region and then destroyed the camp;

Whereas many of those in the Ibnet feeding camp were at risk of death from famine;

Whereas several thousand of those at the Ibnet feeding camp were children under 5 years of age;

Whereas approximately 52,000 people who were sent away from the Ibnet feeding camp were forced to travel on foot;

Whereas relief officials of a private and voluntary organization stated that as many as half of those who were forced to walk may die;

Whereas the United States Government has provided about [half] one-third of all relief assistance going to famine victims in Ethiopia; and

Whereas Agency for International Development officials reported there were 800 tons of United States-donated food at the Ibnet feeding camping which was meant for famine victims and is now being provided to the local population who are less in need than those who were at the camp; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That (a) the Congress joins with Agency for International Development Administrator McPherson in expressing outrage at the forced evacuation of the Ibnet feeding camp in Ethiopia and urges that [civilized] nations join in condemning the action of the local Administrator of the Gondar Region for allowing this henious action to occur.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the Ethiopian Government—

(A) should take necessary's steps to ensure that the forcible evacuation and destruction of refugee facilities never happens again; and

(B) rectify the situation by assisting those famine victims who were displaced;

(2) the United Nations monitor the migration of the former inhabitants of the Ibnet feeding camp, investigate what humanitarian aid is being provided for them, and report back to the donor community;

(3) the Agency for International Development ensure that none of the United States-donated food is diverted from famine victims;

SEC. 2. The Clerk of the House of Representatives shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President with a request that the President transmit a copy to the Government of Ethiopia.

Information from reliable sources confirms that from April 28 to April 30, 1985, Ethiopian Army troops, acting on the orders of local government leaders, forcibly evicted 60,000 famine victims from the Ibnet feeding camp in the Gondar Administrative Region of northwest Ethiopia. As the evacuation was in its final stages, the camp was burned to the ground. Until this heinous act, Ibnet had been the largest feeding center for famine victims of Ethiopia.

Of the 60,000 refugees evicted from Ibnet, approximately 52,500 were forced to travel on foot too. This group includes several thousand children under the age of 5 and several thousand adults who were weak from famine and associated diseases. Yet, this group now finds itself on a forced migration through the rugged highland mountains of Ethiopia. Some private voluntary officials predict as many as half of these people may die before they reach suitable refuge.

Officials of the Agency for International Development have reported that there were 800 tons of U.S.-donated food at Ibnet, which was intended for consumption by these famine victims. Reports indicate that this food is now being distributed to the local population surrounding the former camp who are less in need than the refugees ousted from the camp.

In our best humanitarian tradition, the U.S. Government is providing one-third of all the food aid going to the famine victims in Ethiopia. The American people have responded to the tragedy unfolding in Africa with characteristic generosity. Yet, the Ethiopian Government has callously neglected its own people. Although the local administrator is said to be responsible for this outrageous act, the Ethiopian Government bears ultimate responsibility for allowing this incident to develop.

House Concurrent Resolution 140 calls upon the nations of the world to condemn those responsible for this heinous act. It also calls upon the central government in Ethiopia to rectify the situation and prevent a recurrance. The resolution directs AID to take the steps necessary to ensure that no U.S.-donated food aid is diverted or misused. The measure also asks the United Nations to monitor the migration of the Ibnet refugees to determine what necessary humanitarian aid is being given to them.

As ranking Republican on the Select Committee on Hunger, I recently had the unparalled opportunity to visit Ethiopia and study the famine situation. It was a soul-searing experience. The suffering of the victims of this terrible combination of the cruel hand of nature and callous political neglect is unimaginable and inhumane. Surely, the U.S. Congress should raise its voice in moral outrage. It should clearly articulate to the United Nations and the Ethiopian Government that never again should there be such reprehensible action and that all such efforts should be undertaken to prevent any recurrence.●

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I wish to share with you, and my colleagues the plight of Marina Shenderovich, a 25-year-old refusenik. As you know, Soviet Jews long for the freedom and liberty that we take so readily for granted in this country. I appeal to you in the name of compassion that our commitment on their behalf never be lessened, but rather deepened and strengthened.

A while back, it had come to my attention that a number of student organizations at Rutgers University, the State University of New Jersey, were concerned about the treatment of a former biology student at Moscow University. Her name is Marina Shenderovich and today she faces the reign of oppression as do so many of her fellow Jews in the Soviet Union.

Her situation is one of desperation. The daughter of an engineer and an English teacher, she was refused an emigration visa in 1979 for unstated reasons. As a result, she was forced to curtail her studies at the university.

The Rutgers student body hopes that, if Ms. Shenderovich cannot leave the Soviet Union permanently, she will at the very least be able to spend 4 years in the United States to resume her studies. Officials at Rutgers University are willing to evaluate her application prior to her leaving the Soviet Union. However, the Soviet Union has made no effort to release her records.

As Americans, we are committed to a democratic form of government as the best way to protect the rights, well-being, and dignity of all men and women. As elected officials, we believe in justice and equality under the law. Let each one of us speak out with more vigor than ever before. We must demonstrate to the world at large, but most importantly to the refuseniks, that we will work endlessly until the human rights of all are affirmed.●

IN HONOR OF RED TINDOL, GEORGIA SMALL BUSINESSMAN OF THE YEAR

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, this week, the Georgia Small Business Association is presenting their Man of the Year Award. It would be difficult for me to know of a person who is more qualified to be recognized for this honor than my good friend, Red Tindol.

I first became acquainted with Red in 1953, when he was employed by a big business firm, Orkin Exterminators. In fact, I had my own small business at that time, and Red Tindol tried to buy me out.

When Red decided to leave Orkin and start his own small business, he risked all his assets in this venture. During this period of time, he learned firsthand of the frustrations that small business people face—the difficulty of making a payroll, the frustration of fighting the Federal bureaucracy and it's cumbersome regulations, and the difficulty of choosing between taking a financial risk to expand or facing possible extinction if he didn't.

So, Red Tindol has known both sides of the business spectrum—the big business side and the small business side. Today, he is an extremely successful businessman who has learned how to handle the pressures and the problems of small business. His career and his life are an inspiration to all struggling small business people.

Mr. Speaker, I was a small businessman for 23 years, and, although I've been out of small business for about 13 years, I've never lost my concern for the problems that face our Nation's small business men and women.

The history of our Nation is an unparalleled success story. America has always been the land of opportunity where hard work pays off.

Open and honest competition in the American marketplace is what makes it possible for people to succeed through hard work. Along with you, I will always work to keep the marketplace competitive.

I am concerned that the free enterprise system be kept healthy in this country and that small business growth is encouraged.

The administration's 1983 report on small business shows that small firms are providing half of all jobs and creating two-thirds of new jobs in the private sector.

According to that report, in 1981 and 1982, small businesses created 2.6 million new jobs, while large businesses lost 1.6 million jobs.

So, it is still true that small business is the backbone of America, and this backbone must be kept strong.

Mr. Speaker, as we consider cuts and changes in the Small Business Administration this year, I urge my colleagues to remember that small business is a major employer and a significant factor in reducing unemployment in this country.

My commitment to small business remains deep. Although cutbacks must come in all areas of our budget this year, we need to make sure that we don't take steps that may hurt employment and growth in this country. Before we pass small business legislation this year, Mr. Speaker, I urge this body to look down the road and see just where our actions will take this country.●

DON'T BLAME CIVIL SERVANT

HON. STAN PARRIS

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, before this body begins legislative action on budget recommendations for fiscal year 1986, I want to share with my colleagues an editorial by Mr. Tommy C. Ishee, public relations director for the Virginia Federation of the National Association Retired Federal Employees. This essay, entitled "Don't Blame Civil Servant," eloquently highlights the history of the Federal retirement system and the responsibility Congress has to ensure its solvency.

I urge all my colleagues to read with care this important commentary on the Civil Service pension system before casting your vote on measures affecting compensation and benefits for active and retired Federal workers.

The article follows:

DON'T BLAME CIVIL SERVANT

(By Tommy C. Ishee)

The U.S. Civil Service is, to many people, an undefinable mass of people who cost taxpayers money and produce little but frustration.

Few people stop to consider that the government policies, which are the root of the frustration, are created not by the civil servants, but by the Congress, the president and the courts, who are the real government of the United States. The civil servant is merely a hired hand, paid to enforce the laws and carry out the will and bidding of these lawmakers. More often than not, public frustration results from the policies, but public anger is directed at the person charged with carrying out the policies.

However, federal employees, from astronaut to zoologist, are the best hired hands that can be obtained from their particular jobs, so far as competitive examinations or comparisons of academic or technical training can determine. Civil Service employees are hired on the basis of what they know, and not who they know.

All too many Americans have forgotten that the U.S. Civil Service was created a century ago (1883) when—after President James Garfield was assassinated by the disgruntled job-seeker—public indignation boiled over and forced Congress to put an end to the corrupt and scandal-ridden "spoils system" of selling federal jobs to highest bidders, or handing them out as rewards to political cronies of incoming administrations.

Recently a great deal of attention has been directed toward the retirement benefits received by former civil servants. Allegations have been made that these are excessive and that cutting them would go a long way toward balancing the budget.

Civil Service retirement benefits accrue from a retirement investment fund created in 1920, primarily as a convenience for the government so it could get rid of many very aged employees without firing them outright. Federal employees were compelled, as a condition of employment, to pay 2½ percent of their total salary into this fund. The government contributed nothing. Over the years, this individual assessment of salary has grown to 7 percent. In 1957, the government decided to begin contributing a like amount. Federal retirement benefits are one factor used in setting "comparability" standards for federal salaries.

Over time, the government has borrowed all the reserves in the Retirement Trust Fund, at a comparatively low rate of interest, and used the money for various purposes, such as farm loans, VA and FHA mortgage guarantees, and the like. At the end of 1983, the Retirement Trust Fund reserve totaled more than $109 billion—and 99 percent of this was "on loan" to the U.S. government.

When one compares total contributions to the retirement fund with total disbursements, the following becomes obvious:

For 40 years (from 1920 through 1960), employee payments into the trust fund exceeded disbursements from the fund by $763 million. Cost of federal retirement to the U.S. government: nothing.

For another 14 years (1961 to 1975), employee payments into the fund, plus interest accumulated on fund investments, exceeded federal retirement expenses by more than $1 billion. Again, cost of federal retirement to the U.S. government was nothing.

Between 1975 and 1984, employee contributions, plus interest earned on trust-fund investments, plus government-agency "matching" contributions (which are 7 percent of salary and are really part of the employee's salary) exceeded total retirement-system expenses by more than $7 billion.

So, as a matter of fact, the Civil Service Retirement System is self-sustaining and, in addition, has provided a financial service to the U.S. government.

We should all remember that the civil servant has no voice in the decisions as to what his salary should be; what perquisites (if any) he or she receives, or what interest the government should pay on the money that government borrows from the trust fund. These decisions are made unilaterally by the government. Congress decides what retirement benefits should be, and therefore what percenage of salary an employee must pay into the Retirement Trust Fund to yield such retirement benefits.

A federal employee is sworn to defend and protect the Constitution of the United States. He or she may not strike nor really negotiate for pay, benefits or any condition of employment. Overt political activity is proscribed. If, indeed, the federal employee is a monster, he or she had no part in creating it, and shouldn't be blamed for it.●

THE PRESIDENT AT THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT: A JOB WELL DONE

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this morning, our President gave a masterful address to the European Parliament. His speech was both inspiring and challenging.

In his moving address, the President was eloquent in talking about America's shared struggle with our European allies during the Second World War. He also talked of America's unfailing commitment to a strong political, economic and military partnership with Europe. He pointed to our common heritage with Europe and our aspirations for a future filled with freedom, prosperity, and peace.

The President also pointed out that history has shown that weakness can lead to instability and conflict and that Western weaknesses in past decades have been exploited by the Soviets. In talking about the challenges of keeping the peace with an aggressive Soviet Union, our President offered a series of practical steps for reducing tensions with that country. These procedures include exchanging observers at military exercises, and holding regular high-level contacts between United States and Soviet military leaders. Also proposed was a plan urging that our two countries agree on confidence-building measures and that we establish a military communications link between our two Nations.

I believe that Europeans today are more confident than ever that America is a tested and true friend who will stand by our allies in time of need.

I am certain that my colleagues will join me in saying well done to our President.

With these thoughts in mind, I recommend the following excerpts from the President's speech to my colleagues in the Congress.

TEXT OF THE ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT TO A SPECIAL SESSION OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT, STRASBURG, FRANCE, MAY 8, 1985

We mark today the anniversary of the liberation of Europe from tyrants who had seized this continent and plunged it into a terrible war. Forty years ago today, the guns were stilled and peace began—a peace that has become the longest of this century.

On this day 40 years ago, they swarmed onto the boulevards of Paris, rallied under the Arc de Triomphe, and sang the "Marseillaise" in the free and open air. In Rome, the sound of church bells filled St. Peter's square and echoed through the city. On this day 40 years ago, Winston Churchill walked out onto a balcony in Whitehall and said to the people of Britain, "This is your victory"—and the crowd yelled back, in an unforgettable moment of love and gratitude, "No—it is yours." Londoners tore the blackout curtains from their windows, and put floodlights on the great symbols of English history. And for the first time in nearly 6 years, Big Ben, Buckingham Palace, and St. Paul's Cathedral were illuminated against the sky.

Across the ocean, a half million New Yorkers flooded Times Square and laughed and posed for the cameras. In Washington, our new President, Harry Truman, called reporters into his office and said. "The flags of freedom fly all over Europe."

On that day 40 years ago, I was at my post at an Army Air Corps installation in Culver City, California. Passing a radio I heard the words, "ladies and gentlemen, the war in Europe is over." I felt a chill, as if a bust of cold wind had just swept past, and—even though, for America, there was still a war on the Pacific Front—I realized: I will never forget this moment.

This day can't help but be emotional, for in it we feel the long tug of memory; we are reminded of shared joy and shared pain. A few weeks ago in California an old soldier with tears in his eyes said, "It was such a different world then. It's almost impossible to describe it to someone who wasn't there, but when they finally turned the lights on in the cities again it was like being reborn."

If it is hard to communicate the happiness of those days, it is even harder to communicate, to those who did not share it, the depth of Europe's agony. So much of it lay in ruins. Whole cities had been destroyed. Children played in the rubble and begged for food.

By this day 40 years ago, over 40 million lay dead, and the survivors composed a continent of victims. And to this day, we wonder: how did this happen? How did civilization take such a terrible turn? After all the books and the documentaries, after all the histories, and studies, we still wonder: how?

Hannah Arendt spoke of "the banality of evil"—the banality of the little men who did the terrible deeds. We know they were totalitarians who used the state, which they had elevated to the level of a "God," to inflict war on peaceful nations and genocide on innocent peoples.

We know of the existence of evil in the human heart, and we know that in Nazi Germany that evil was institutionalized—given power and direction by the state and those who did its bidding. And we also know that early attempts to placate the totalitarians did not save us from war. In fact, they guaranteed it. There are lessons to be learned in this and never forgotten.

But there is a lesson too in another thing we saw in those days: perhaps we can call it "the commonness of virtue." The common men and women who somehow dug greatness from within their souls—the people who sang to the children during the blitz, who joined the resistance and said "No" to tyranny, the people who hid the Jews and the dissidents, the people who became, for a moment, the repositories of all the courage of the West—from a child named Anne Frank to a hero named Raoul Wallenberg. These names shine. They give us heart forever. The glow of their memories lit Europe in her darkest days.

Who can forget the hard days after the war? We can't help but look back and think: life was so vivid then. There was the sense of purpose, the joy of shared effort, and, later, the impossible joy of our triumph. Those were the days when the West rolled up its sleeves and repaired the damage that had been done, the days when Europe rose in glory from the ruins. Old enemies were reconciled with the European family. Together, America and Western Europe created and put into place the Marshall Plan to rebuild from the rubble. Together we created an Atlantic Alliance, which proceeded not from transient interests of state but from shared ideals. Together we created the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, a partnership aimed at seeing that the kind of tyrants who had tormented Europe would never torment her again.

NATO was a triumph of organization and effort, but it was also something new, very different. For NATO derived its strength directly from the moral values of the people it represented, from their high ideals, their love of liberty, their commitment to peace.

But perhaps the greatest triumph of all was not in the realm of a sound defense or material achievement. No, the greatest triumph after the war is that in spite of all the chaos, poverty, sickness, and misfortune that plagued this continent, the people of Western Europe resisted the call of new tyrants and the lure of their seductive ideologies. Your nations did not become the breeding ground for new extremist philosophies. You resisted the totalitarian temptation. Your people embraced democracy, the dream the fascists could not kill. They chose freedom.

Today we celebrate the leaders who led the way—Churchill and Monnet, Adenauer and Schuman, De Gasperi and Spaak, Truman and Marshall. And we celebrate, too, the free political parties that contributed their share of greatness: the Liberals and the Christian Democrats, the Social Democrats and Labour and the Conservatives. Together they tugged at the same car, and the great and mighty ship of Europe moved on.

If any doubt their success, let them look at you. In this room are those who fought on opposite sides 40 years ago, and their sons and daughters. Now you work together to lead Europe democratically. You buried animosity and hatred in the rubble. There is no greater testament to reconciliation and to the peaceful unity of Europe than the men and women in this chamber.

In the decades after the war, Europe knew great growth and power, amazing vitality in every area of life, from fine arts to fashion, from manufacturing to science to the world of ideas. Europe was robust and alive, and none of this was an accident. It was the natural result of freedom, the natural fruit of the democratic ideal. We in America looked at Europe and called her what she was: an Economic Miracle.

And we could hardly be surprised. When we Americans think about our European heritage, we tend to think of your cultural influences and the rich ethnic heritage you gave us. But the industrial revolution that transformed the American economy came from Europe. The guiding intellectual lights of our democratic system—Iccke, Montescuieu, and Adam Smith—came from Europe. And the geniuses who ushered in the modern industrial-technological age came from—well, I think you know, but two examples will suffice. Alexander Graham Bell, whose great invention maddens every American parent whose child insists on phoning his European pen pal rather than writing to him—was a Scotsman. And Guglielmo Marconi, who invented the radio—thereby providing a living for a young man from Dixon, Illinois, who later went into politics—I guess I should explain that's me—so blame Marconi. Marconi, as you know, was born in Italy.

Tomorrow will mark the 35th anniversary of the Schuman Plan, which led to the European Coal and Steel Community, the first block in the creation of a united Europe. The purpose was to tie French and German—and European—industrial production so tightly together that war between them "becomes not merely unthinkable but materially impossible." Those are the words of Robert Schumar; the Coal and Steel Community was the child of his genius. And if he were here today I believe he would say: We have only just begun!

I am here to tell you America remains, as she was 40 years ago, dedicated to the unity of Europe. We continue to see a strong and unified Europe not as a rival but as an even stronger partner. Indeed, John F. Kennedy, in his ringing "Declaration of Interdependence" in the freedom bell city of Philadelphia 23 years ago, explicitly made this objective a key tenet of postwar American policy; that policy saw the New World and the Old as twin pillars of a larger democratic community. We Americans still see European unity as a vital force in that historic process. We favor the expansion of the European Community; we welcome the entrance of Spain and Portugal into the Community, for their presence makes for a stronger Europe, and a stronger Europe is a stronger West.

Yet despite Europe's Economic Miracle, which brought so much prosperity to so many, despite the visionary ideas of the European leaders, despite the enlargement of democracy's frontiers within the European community itself, I am told that a more doubting mood is upon Europe today. I hear words like "Europessimism" and "Europaralysis." I am told that Europe seems to have lost the sense of confidence that dominated that postwar era. If there is something of a "lost" quality these days, is it connected to the fact that some, in the past few years, have begun to question the ideals and philosophies that have guided the West for centuries? That some have even come to question the social and intellectual worth of the West?

We in the West have much to be thankful for—peace, prosperity, and freedom. If we are to preserve these for our children, and for theirs, today's leaders must demonstrate the same resolve and sense of vision which inspired Churchill, Adenauer, De Gasperi, and Schuman. Their challenge was to rebuild a democratic Europe under the shadow of Soviet power. Our task, in some ways even more daunting, is to keep the peace with an ever more powerful Soviet Union, to introduce greater stability in our relationship with it, and to live together in a world in which our values can prosper.

The leaders and people of postwar Europe had learned the lessons of their history from the failures of their predecessors. They learned that aggression feeds on appeasement and that weakness itself can be provocative. We, for our part, can learn from the success of our predecessors. We know that both conflict and aggression can be deterred, that democratic nations are capable of the resolve, the sacrifices, and the consistency of policy needed to sustain such deterrence.

From the creation of NATO in 1949 through the early 1970's, Soviet aggression was effectively deterred. The strength of Western economies, the vitality of our societies, the wisdom of our diplomacy, all contributed to Soviet restraint; but certainly the decisive factor must have been the countervailing power—ultimately, military, and, above all, nuclear power—which the West was capable of bringing to bear in the defense of its interests.

It was in the early 1970's that the United States lost that superiority over the Soviet Union in strategic nuclear weapons which had characterized the postwar era. In Europe, the effect of this loss was not quickly perceptible. But seen globally, Soviet conduct changed markedly and dangerously. First in Angola in 1975, then, when the West failed to respond, in Ethiopia, in South Yemen, in Kampuchea, and ultimately in Afghanistan, the Soviet Union began courting more risks, and expanding its influence through the indirect and direct application of military power. Today, we see similar Soviet efforts to profit from and stimulate regional conflicts in Central America.

The ineffectual Western response to Soviet adventurism of the late 1970's had many roots, not least the crisis of self-confidence within the American body politic wrought by the Vietnam experience. But just as Soviet decision-making in the earlier postwar era had taken place against a background of overwhelming American strategic power, so the decisions of the late 1970's were taken in Moscow, as in Washington and throughout Europe, against a background of growing Soviet and stagnating Western nuclear strength.

One might draw the conclusion from these events that the West should reassert that nuclear superiority over the Soviet Union upon which our security and our strategy rested through the postwar era. That is not my view. We cannot and should not seek to build our peace and freedom perpetually upon the basis of expanding nuclear arsenals.

In the short run, we have no alternative but to compete with the Soviet Union in this field, not in the pursuit of superiority, but merely of balance. It is thus essential that the United States maintain a modern and survivable nuclear capability in each leg of the strategic triad—sea, land, and air-based. It is similarly important that France and Britain maintain and modernize their independent strategic capabilities.

One can imagine several possible responses to the continued Soviet build-up of nuclear forces. On the one hard, we can ask the Soviet Union to reduce its offensive systems through equitable, verifiable arms control measures. We are pressing that case in Geneva. Thus far, however, we have heard nothing new from the other side.

A second possibility would be for the West to step up our current modernization effort to keep up with constantly accelerating Soviet deployments, not to regain superiority, but merely to keep up with Soviet deployments. But is this really an acceptable alternative? Even if this course could be sustained by the West, it would produce a less stable strategic balance than the one we have today. Must we accept an endless process of nuclear arms competition? I don't think so. We need a better guarantee of peace than that.

Fortunately, there is a third possibility. It is to offset the continued Soviet offensive build-up in destabilizing weapons by developing defenses against these weapons. In 1982, I launched a new research program—the Strategic Defense Initiative.

The state of modern technology may soon make possible for the first time the ability to use non-nuclear systems to defeat ballistic missiles. The Soviets themselves have long recognized the value of defensive systems and have invested heavily in them. Indeed, they have spent as much on defensive systems as they have on offensive systems for more than 20 years.

This research program will take time. As we proceed with it, we will remain within existing treaty constraints. We will also consult in the closest possible fashion with our Allies. And when the time for decisions on the possible production and deployment of such systems comes, we must and will discuss and negotiate these issues with the Soviet Union.

During the 1970's we went to great lengths to restrain unilaterally our strategic weapons programs out of the conviction that the Soviet Union would adhere to certain rules in its conduct—rules as neither side seeking to gain unilateral advantage at the expense of the other. These efforts of the early 1970's resulted in some improvements in Europe, the Berlin Quadripartite Agreement being the best example. But the hopes for a broader and lasting moderation of the East-West competition foundered in Angola, Ethiopia, Afghanistan, and Nicaragua.

The question before us today is whether we have learned from these mistakes and can undertake a stable and peaceful relationship with the Soviet Union based upon effective deterrence and the reduction of tensions. I believe we can. I believe we have learned that fruitful cooperation with the Soviet Union must be accompanied by successful competition in areas—particularly Third World areas—where the Soviets are not yet prepared to act with restraint.

These are the reflections which have molded our policy toward the Soviet Union. That policy embodies the following basic elements:

While we maintain deterrence to preserve the peace, the United States will make a steady, sustained effort to reduce tensions and solve problems in its relations with the Soviet Union.

The United States is prepared to conclude fair, equitable, verifiable agreements for arms reduction, above all with regard to offensive nuclear weapons.

The United States will insist upon compliance with past agreements both for their own sake and to strengthen confidence in the possibility of future accords.

The United States seeks no unilateral advantages, and, of course, can accept none on the Soviet side.

The United States will proceed in full consultation with its allies, recognizing that our fates are intertwined and we must act in unity.

The United States does not seek to undermine or change the Soviet system nor to impinge upon the security of the Soviet Union. At the same time it will resist attempts by the Soviet Union to use or threaten force against others, or to impose its system on others by force.

I have directed the Secretary of State to engage with the Soviet Union on an extended agenda of problem solving. Yet even as we embark upon new efforts to sustain a productive dialogue with the Soviet Union, we are reminded of the obstacles posed by our so fundamentally different concepts of humanity, of human rights, of the value of a human life. The murder of Major Nicholson by a Soviet soldier in East Germany, and the Soviet Union's refusal to accept responsibility for this act, is only the latest reminder.

If we are to succeed in reducing East-West tensions, we must find means to ensure against the arbitrary use of lethal force in the future—whether against individuals like Major Nicholson, or against groups, such as the passengers on a jumbo jet.

It is for that reason that I would like to outline for you today what I believe would be a useful way to proceed. I propose that the United States and the Soviet Union take four practical steps.

First, that our two countries make a regular practice of exchanging observers at military exercises and locations. We now follow this practice with many other nations, to the equal benefit of all parties.

Second, as I believe it is desirable for the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union to meet and tackle problems, I am also convinced that the military leaders of our nations could benefit from more contact. I therefore propose that we institute regular, high-level contacts between Soviet and American military leaders, to develop better understanding and to prevent potential tragedies from occurring.

Third, I urge that the Conference on Disarmament in Europe act promptly and agree on the concrete confidence-building measures proposed by the NATO countries. The United States is prepared to discuss the Soviet proposal on non-use of force in the context of Soviet agreement to concrete confidence-building measures.

Fourth, I believe a permanent military-to-military communications link could serve a useful purpose in this important area of our relationship. It could be the channel for exchanging notifications and other information regarding routine military activities, thereby reducing the chances of misunderstanding and misinterpretation. Over time, it might evolve into a "risk-reduction" mechanism for rapid communication and exchange of data in times of crisis.

These proposals are not cure-alls for our current problems, and will not compensate for the deaths which have occurred. But as terrible as past events have been, it would be more tragic if we were to make no attempt to prevent even larger tragedies from occurring through lack of contact and communication.

We do not aspire to impose our system on anyone, nor do we have pat answers for all the world's ills. But our ideals of freedom and democracy and our economic systems have proven their ability to meet the needs of our people. Our adversaries can offer their people only economic stagnation and the corrupt hand of a state and party bureaucracy which ultimately satisfy neither material nor spiritual needs.

I want to reaffirm to the people of Europe the constancy of the American purpose. We were at your side through two great wars; we have been at your side through 40 years of a sometimes painful peace. We are at your side today because, like you, we have not veered from the ideals of the West—the ideals of freedom, liberty, and peace. Let no one—no one—doubt our purpose.

The United States is committed not only to the security of Europe—we are committed to the re-creation of a larger and more genuinely European Europe. The United States is committed not only to a partnership with Europe—the United States is committed to an end to the artificial division of Europe.

We do not deny any nation's legitimate interest in security. We share the basic aspirations of all of the peoples of Europe—freedom, prosperity, and peace. But when families are divided, and people are not allowed to maintain normal human and cultural contacts, this creates international tension. Only in a system in which all feel secure, and sovereign, can there be a lasting and secure peace.

For this reason we support and will encourage movement toward the social, humanitarian, and democratic ideals shared in Europe. The issue is not one of state boundaries, but of insuring the right of all nations to conduct their affairs as their peoples desire. The problem of a divided Europe, like others, must be solved by peaceful means. Let us rededicate ourselves to the full implementation of the Helsinki Final Act in all its aspects.

As we seek to encourage democracy, we must remember that each country must struggle for democracy within its own culture; emerging democracies have special problems and require special help. Those nations whose democratic institutions are newly emerged and whose confidence in the process is not yet deeply rooted need our help. They should have an established community of their peers, other democratic countries to whom they can turn for support or just advice.

We in our country have launched a major effort to strengthen and promote democratic ideals and institutions. Following a pattern first started in the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States Congress approved the National Endowment for Democracy. This organization subsequently established institutes of labor, business, and political parties dedicated to programs of cooperation with democratic forces around the world. I hope other democracies will join in this effort and contribute their wisdom and talents to this cause.

I do not believe those who say the people of Europe today are paralyzed and pessimistic. And I would say to those who think this: Europe, beloved Europe, you are greater than you know. You are the treasury of centuries of Western thought and Western culture, you are the father of Western ideals and the mother of Western faith.

Europe, you have been the power and the glory of the West, and you are a moral success. In the horrors after World War II, you rejected totalitarianism, you rejected the lure of new "Superman," and a "New Communist Man." You proved that you were—and are—a moral triumph.

You in the West are a Europe without illusions, a Europe firmly grounded in the ideals and traditions that made her greatness, a Europe unbound and unfettered by a bankrupt ideology. You are, today, a New Europe on the brink of a new century—a democratic community with much to be proud of.

We have much to do. The work ahead is not unlike the building of a great cathedral. The work is slow, complicated, and painstaking. It is passed on with pride from generation to generation. It is the work not only of leaders but of ordinary people. The cathedral evolves as it is created, with each generation adding its own vision—but the initial ideal remains constant, and the faith that drives the vision persists. The results may be slow to see, but our children and their children will trace in the air the emerging arches and spires and know the faith and dedication and love that produced them. My friends, Europe is the Cathedral, and it is illuminated still.

And if you doubt your will, and your spirit, and your strength to stand for something, think of those people 40 years ago—who wept in the rubble, who laughed in the streets, who paraded across Europe, who cheered Churchill with love and devotion, and who sang the "Marseillaise" down the boulevards. Spirit like that does not disappear; it cannot perish; it will not go away. There's too much left unsung within it.●

U.S. SMALL BUSINESS WEEK, 1985

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today I want to recognize National Small Business Week—May 5 through May 11—and honor the Nation's 13 million small businesses.

We are all very aware of the economic rollercoaster which our Nation has been riding in recent years. Especially disturbing are the continuing high unemployment rates. One county in my district reported just last week an unemployment rate of 15 percent, double the national average.

As we continue to strive to reduce these dismal unemployment figures, there is some light at the end of the tunnel. That light is small business. Over the past 5 years, America's small businesses and entrepreneurs have created almost 3 million new corporations, an astonishing rate of some 600,000 per year. More importantly, they have created an estimated 900,000 self-employed persons and numerous other jobs for American workers.

In a time when employment opportunities seem to be diminishing and plants are closing at an alarming rate, America's pioneer spirit and adversity have been demonstrated by the entrepreneurial ability of its inhabitants. Not only have small businesses created hundreds of thousands of new jobs, but they have also made great technological innovations which have served to increase the diversity of our economy.

It is with great honor that I salute the small business community and their many contributions today.●

WHY REQUIRE SEAT BELTS?

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I had the occasion to visit the rehabilitation center on the ninth floor of Norfolk General Hospital, and I can say without hesitation that it was a moving and enlightening experience. The majority of patients undergoing therapy had been victims of automobile accidents, and in each case their severe injuries resulted from a drunken driver, the absence of a seatbelt, or both.

Those who oppose mandatory seatbelts as too confining should visit a rehabilitation center and see what real confinement is. They should see young people who will be in wheelchairs for life, with brain damage, spinal cord injury, or missing legs. I saw one young man, who had had a promising engineering career ahead of him, who had been widowed and blinded as a result of his accident.

The Norfolk Virginian-Pilot on May 4, 1985, carried an editorial entitled "Save Virginia Lives, Too," and I am pleased to commend it to my colleagues, who can replace "Virginia" with the names of their own States. The editorial effectively demolishes the argument that somehow requiring seatbelts is an unwarranted restriction on freedom.

In addition, I would like to take this opportunity to share an article from the May 1985, issue of Psychology Today, written by E. Scott Geller, who is professor of psychology at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University in Blacksburg, VA. Professor Geller offers some valuable argments in support of the use of safety belts, and some excellent suggestions for helping encourage more people to "buckle up." I was struck by his statement that only about 5 percent of the television performers were shown wearing a lap or shoulder belt, and it occurred to me that viewers who feel strongly about the need to encourage this vital safety practice might wish to write to the networks, the producers, and the sponsors of their favorite programs to urge that more shows have the use of seatbelts or shoulder restraints in their scripts.

Mr. Speaker, with graduation time upon us, and the summer tourist season just ahead, it strikes me that these articles are particularly timely and cogent, and I hope that my colleagues will give them consideration and perhaps share them with their constituents.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[From the Virginian-Pilot, May 4, 1985]

SAVE VIRGINIA LIVES, TOO

The Virginia General Assembly, which refuses to mandate the wearing of seat belts in motor vehicles, should ponder the 27 percent drop in traffic deaths of drivers and passengers in New York since a large percentage of New Yorkers began buckling up.

During the first three months of this year, 184 drivers and passengers died in motor-vehicle accidents in New York, compared to 252 during the first three months of 1984. The comparable statistics in Virginia were 199 in 1984, 203 in 1985. A mandatory seat-belt law could save 25–30 lives in Virginia over a three-month period and 100–120 a year—possibly more.

That would be worth doing. But Virginia's lawmakers bought the spurious argument this year that compelling drivers and passengers to wear seat belts constitutes an unwarranted restriction on freedom.

That argument might have merit if society generally were not burdened with the heavy medical, welfare, legal and other expenses imposed by highway carnage. If the families of killed, mangled and maimed individuals who refused to wear seat belts also paid all costs resulting from fatalities and crippling injuries that could have been forestalled by seat-belt usage, society's interest in demanding that drivers and passengers buckle up would be significantly diminished. But the cost is borne generally—as inflated insurance premiums, the proliferation of litigation, rising welfare costs and lost productivity, among other things, eloquently attest.

Besides, everyone licensed to operate a motor vehicle knows that driving is a privilege granted by the state, not a natural right. Retention of that privilege is contingent upon obedience to traffic laws, maintenance of motor-vehicle insurance and periodic demonstrations of competence behind the steering wheel. Buckling up is inconvenient at worst, and Virginia should demand it.

How many Virginians would respond? Compliance in New York state is running about 60 percent, compared to less than 14 percent in the states where wearing seat belts isn't required. As for enforcement, New York police cited 7,000 people for disobeying the law during the first three months; 90 percent of those citations were made when drivers were arrested for other traffic offenses. New York's encouraging experience with buckle-up legislation parallels the experience in foreign lands. Motor vehicle accidents have not decreased in New York; only the deadly consequences of such accidents.

Does buckling up save lives and limbs? Yes. Does the Virginia General Assembly welcome highway carnage? Of course not. So the honorables shouldn't be deterred by half-baked arguments about "freedom" and "choice" from enacting a sensible law to lessen the slaughter.

SEAT BELT PSYCHOLOGY

(By E. Scott Geller)

What single action, if done regularly, would be most likely to save your life? Jogging, eating less, kicking an unhealthy habit? No. The one thing that would do more than any other to increase your longevity and quality of life is to use a safety belt every time you travel in a car.

Vehicle accidents are responsible for more than 30,000 deaths and 500,000 injuries each year. More than half of these deaths and injuries could be avoided by the use of safety belts, but only around 15 percent of U.S. drivers and passengers buckle up.

Many European countries have passed mandatory belt use laws, and the rate of safety-belt wearing in these countries is much higher than in the United States, ranging between 70 percent and 92 percent. New York, New Jersey, Missouri, Michigan and Illinois have recently passed seat-belt laws, and will serve as critical test cases for the efficacy of requiring safety-belt use in the United States.

Mandatory seat-belt laws, however, have not been gracefully accepted in the United States. Newspaper editorials proclaim the infringement of individual freedom caused by a seat-belt law. Many people feel it is their personal right to choose whether or not to buckle up, and believe (incorrectly) that no one would suffer except themselves if they were unbuckled in a vehicle crash. And we hear a variety of excuses for not buckling up: "I'm a safe driver, so I won't be in an accident." "It's safer to be thrown from the vehicle." "I don't want to be trapped if my car is on fire or under water." "Seat belts are too uncomfortable and wrinkle my clothes." "I don't need a safety belt when driving around town." Several educational programs clearly demonstrate that all such excuses for not buckling up are erroneous, but education alone is not sufficient to get people to use safety belts.

From the perspective of behavioral psychology, the low use of safety belts can be explained by examining events that precede or follow the use or nonuse of a safety belt. For example, opportunities to wear a safety belt are rarely preceded by signs or verbal messages that remind us to buckle up. And, since most people who travel without wearing a safety belt usually reach their destination safely, they are, in a sense, rewarded for not buckling up.

Modeling, or behavioral example, is another powerful behaviorial tool that could be used to promote safety-belt use but isn't. Current TV heroes, the role models for children and young adults, for instance, do not buckle up when they ride in their cars, trucks and vans. A recent assessment of safety-belt use by TV stars during prime time "action shows" (conducted by my research students) found that fewer than 5 percent of the actors were shown wearing a lap or shoulder belt. Psychological theory and research suggest that such consistent modeling of the nonuse of safety belts contributes significantly to the low safety-belt use in the United States.

After examining the conditions that influence safety-belt use, the behavioral psychologists approach the problem by manipulating conditions that might increase the wearing of safety belts. This involves attempts to remove conditions that discourage use of safety belts and to add conditions that encourage their use. The first approach is seen in the petition my students and I circulated nationwide to get support for the idea that the consistent nonuse of vehicle safety belts by TV stars is irresponsible broadcasting. However, we have been more successful with the second approach—adding conditions that encourage belt use.

In a series of research projects, we have shown that basic principles of positive reinforcement can be used cost-effectively to increase safety-belt wearing. For example, simply rewarding people when they are buckled up can more than double usage rates.

Our safety-belt rewards were inexpensive (hamburger coupons or lottery tickets, for instance), donated by community merchants (for good-will advertising) and administered conveniently (by police officers and cashiers at the drive-in exchange windows of the banks and fast-food restaurants).

In one campaign every bank customer who was buckled up when driving up to the outdoor exchange window received a number for a community bingo game. Such programs are accepted by everyone involved, and promote a positive attitude toward safety belts because they are not seen as a threat to individual freedom.

Some people may only buckle up to get the reward, but even after the rewards are removed, usage rarely drops as low as the previous levels. So some people actually develop and continue the safety-belt use habit after a few rewards. Furthermore, we have found it useful to reinstate the safety-belt incentive program periodically. This intermittent reinforcement helps maintain increases in seat-belt wearing.

For example, because of the tremendous corporate costs resulting from vehicle accidents involving unbelted employees, corporations have found it cost-beneficial to use intermittent reward programs for safety-belt promotion. This can mean large savings for a company, since it has been estimated that a single employee fatality costs industry an average $120,000 in direct payments (wage compensation, property damage, medical expenses and insurance outlays). And this may be only the tip of the iceberg when you consider the costs of work disruption and decreases in productivity associated with hiring and training replacements.

Two years ago, I wrote an instructional manual that specifies guidelines for rewarding safety-belt wearing in corporations. With actual case examples, the manual illustrates how to apply feedback, group discussions and commitment strategies to increase the long-term impact of a safety-belt reward program. In addition, we have recently produced a 25-minute film that demonstrates the use of psychology in encouraging safety-belt use at various community sites, including churches, banks, schools, fast-food restaurants, corporations and universities.

Our film demonstrates a "flash for life" that can be used by anyone to encourage others to buckle up. This involves holding up a large flash card in the window of your vehicle so that people in other cars can read the message: "Please buckle up—I care." If viewer buckles up, the "flasher" flips over the card to reveal: "Thank you for buckling up." A surprisingly large number of nonusers buckle up on the spot (22 percent of 893 people in a recent study).

The simply "flash for life" incorporates several principles derived from psychological research, including behavioral modeling (the flash-card holder is buckled up) and effective "stimulus control" (the flash-card holder gives a specific message in nondemanding language at a time when the person viewing the flash card can act on the request). A beneficial side effect of this procedure is that the flash-card holders (whether child or adult) increase their commitment to safety belts.

Our recent successes in prompting and reward strategies in corporate and community settings suggest that it is possible to increase safety-belt use while maintaining public acceptance and positive attitudes and illustrate the importance of psychological theory and research when designing buckle-up campaigns.●

LIBERTY CITY GROWING FROM ASHES OF RIOTS

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, there has been much discussion in media lately about reconciliation, dealing with past horrors and rebuilding a society destroyed by conflict. These references were to the victims of World War II and the rebuilding that took place after the war.

There is another story, however, smaller in scope but similar in some ways, right here in Dade County, FL.

Following the civil disturbances in 1980, Liberty City was devastated as a community. However, the resourceful and determined people who live there were not willing to give up, and what they have been able to achieve is remarkable. I would like to share with my colleagues an article written by Neal R. Pierce which details one of these achievements. Perhaps other communities in other parts of the country will learn and be motivated from their example.

LIBERTY CITY GROWING FROM ASHES OF RIOTS

(By Neal R. Pierce)

MIAMI.—On a dazzling late March Saturday morning in Liberty City, a neighborhood devastated by bitter race riots in 1980, families dressed in their Sunday best stood in line for an experience commonplace for most Americans—shopping at a well-stocked supermarket.

Inside the spanking new Winn-Dixie store in Edison Plaza, beaming, courteous teenagers—the boys in white shirts and black ties, girls in blue uniforms—ran cash registers, stocked shelves, and helped customers with their first quality grocery purchases in five years.

The nation's last glimpse of this block was quite different: a national guardsman in riot gear, armed with an automatic rifle, holding four black teen-agers at bay. The old grocery store was a gutted shell. Food bins, beer cans and broken bottles floated in a sea of water left by firefighters. Food displays hung eerily from the ceiling, advertising yesterday's specials. For private investment, the site—like most of Liberty City—seemed jinxed, seen as another riot waiting to happen.

Why then has Winn-Dixie, a leading Southern supermarket chain, risked entering Liberty City? The answer: a mix of players and investments no city could have assembled in 1990.

First, the owner-manager of the site is a new-generation local economic development corporation. Its director, a savvy ex-cop and Liberty City native named Otis Pitts, is getting premier business counsel. The Tacolcy Economic Development Corporation's nine directors each has at least five years' business ownership and management experience.

Second, active support came not just from the Ford Foundation, but from the recently organized LISC—the Local Initiatives Support Corporation LISC helped recruit Pitts for the job, exposed him to successful community economic development projects in Boston and the South Bronx, sent a Harvard MBA team in to assist, and then invested $250,000 of its own funds in the project.

Third, Miami Mayor Maurice Ferre did what few mayors of the city contemplated before the '80s: He invested big chunks of his own time, and $650,000 of the city's money, to make the project work. Dade County threw in $260,000. Some big federal bucks were given—$800,000 from the Economic Development Administration. But the Liberty City revival is not your old-style federal initiative. The Carter administration, in the wake of the '80 riots, pumped $10 million into Liberty City—most of it frittered away without result. Now the feds are responding to local initiative.

Finally, city business leaders are involved. They loaned $250,000. But the commitment didn't come without heavy selling by Ferre and company. The biggest investment of all is Winn-Dixie's own—about $2 million.

No one can say that Liberty City, even with this massive investment, is on a sure comeback trail. There's still crushing joblessness, an excruciating crime rate, and lingering fear that another chain of racially charged events—the acquittal of four white police officers in the beating death of a black motorcyclist after a high-speed chase—could spark another conflagration.

But hope, not fear, filled the air as Edison Plaza opened in late March. There were political speeches, colorful ballons, all the fanfare usually reserved for a major civic occasion Despite Miami's sometimes bitter "triethnic" politics (Hispanic, black, white), politicians of every stripe showed up.

Soon a dry-cleaning shop, drugstore and shoe store will join Winn-Dixie in the white stucco and red brick plaza. In offices behind the stores, a law firm is open for business and a dentist is waiting to move in. McDonald's has opened across the way; the "New Beginning" shopping center nearby has 10 small shops. There's a stunning contrast between these neat, ordered new developments and the "old" Liberty City that lingers on around them—Simon's Tailor Shop with so many security bars you'd think it was a prison, the greasy-spoon "Meal a Minute" restaurant, and a pawnshop whose sign screams: We buy gold and silver.

"There is a sense of pride in what has happened here on the part of people," says Otis Pitts. "It's not like people are just coming to shop in a store. It's like they're coming to something that is a vital part of their community."

"We don't only look good, we are good," says Robert Pitts (no relation), owner of People's Barber Shop, around the corner from Edison Plaza, as he cuts a customer's hair while three others wait in turn. "I have no doubt in my mind that this is a start to do other things now. As a race of people in this area we've learned and are looking at things more intelligently. We're going to help ourselves out."

Pitts, whose barber shop has been in Liberty City for 17 years and like many black businesses survived 1980 undamaged, says neither he nor fellow merchants have plans to leave the neighborhood: "Everybody is committed to staying. Why leave now? We sweated out the worst. There ain't nothing to do but look forward now."

The attitude is what Ferre has been hoping for. Neighborhoods, he notes, need some kind of an economic break to pick themselves up—"an inducement based on a perspective that something is going to happen."

The stake for Liberty City people gets a lot farther than the convenience of a supermarket. All ghettoes suffer from "expenditure leakages"—money flowing to outside stores and failing to circulate and create jobs locally. "If we're going to be financially independent, then those dollars need to turn over 6, 8, 10 times before they leave the neighborhood," Athalie Range, Miami's first black city commissioner, told by associate Robert Guskind.

Trevino Bostic, a stock boy at the new store, never heard of "expenditure leakages." But he knows what it means for him: "I need a job. I want to save money so I can go to college and get a good education. I want to come back and maybe be a manager."●

HON. JOE BARTON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is truly a privilege for me to speak on the 50th anniversary of the Rural Electrification Administration. Of all the Government programs which have been enacted in the last 50 years, the REA may have done the most to help the rural people of this Nation. The REA truly represents the highest good which Government programs can attain.

Though it is really not long ago that the REA started its work, it is easy to forget how the REA changed the lives of America's farmers. My grandfather, Linus P. Barton, did not receive electricity on his farm in Bosque county, Texas until 1949, the year I was born. Even today, my mother talks about the dramatic impact that electricity and the REA had on their life. My mother's father ran a cotton gin in McLennan County, Texas in the small community of Speegleville, which was made possible by the electricity provided by the REA.

I would like to specifically commend the following REA co-ops in my district, for their vital work in improving the lives of the people in Texas: Hill County Electric, Limestone County Electric, Navarro County Electric, Johnson County Electric, Houston County Electric, Tri-County Electric, Sam Houston Electric, San Bernard Electric, Mid-South Electric, Robertson Electric, Brazos Electric, and Tex-La Electric.

I salute the great accomplishments of the REA on its golden anniversary. As we look to the future, I hope to see the REA continue its great work in rural America. The REA will plan a vital role in the continuing prosperity of America's agricultural sector. If we can achieve the same high level of success in the next half century as we have achieved in the last one, we can look forward to very happy times indeed for those that live in rural America.●

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF WILLIAM J. BURKHOLDER, SUPERINTENDENT OF FAIRFAX COUNTY PUBLIC SCHOOLS

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the accomplishments of Mr. William J. Burkholder, superintendent of the Fairfax County public schools, on the occasion of his forthcoming retirement on June 30, 1985. His career spans some 34 years in public education in the Commonwealth of Virginia, 29 of which were spent in Fairfax County. During that period, he has served education as a school bus driver, classroom teacher, school principal, instructional supervisor, personnel director, labor negotiator, and deputy superintendent—a broad range of experiences which qualified him for the superintendency of the 10th largest school system in our great Nation, an organization of more than 13,000 employees engaged in educating 124,000 students in 159 schools and 19 special services centers, serving the educational needs of a population close to 650,000 people in an area covering more than 400 square miles.

In this highly complex situation, Mr. Burkholder has displayed the characteristics of a fine educational leader: courage, sensitivity, a strong sense of educational priorities, a keen awareness of community values and dynamics, an ability to move toward the future without sacrificing the strengths of the past and present, and a belief in children as this Nation's most important resource.

Among his many achievements are just three which I will mention here. His comprehensive program to address the problems of substance abuse is a national model, recognized by Mrs. Reagan at a White House ceremony. His determination to improve the academic performance of minority students has resulted in a major effort involving every school and supported by community leaders. Finally, he has guided the opening of a high school for science and technology, and encouraged the active involvement of the business community through his business/industry advisory council. These selected accomplishments are symbolic of his dedication to the resolution of current problems and his recognition of future needs.

The life of a superintendent of schools is not easy. Dealing with 80-hour workweeks, hundreds of public and private meetings, the depth of community emotions surrounding highly controversial issues, the balancing of competing special interests, and, above all, the need to focus the attention of the body politic on the child in the classroom, require skills and characteristics which are almost superhuman. Mr. Burkholder has met all of these challenges with imperturbable calmness and acumen, perceptiveness, and sensitivity.

As the representative of Virginia's 10th Congressional District, I take great pride in Mr. Burkholder's career and I join my colleagues and the citizens of Fairfax County in wishing him much happiness in the years to come.●

WALLOP-BREAUX RESOLUTION

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution, for myself and 136 of my colleagues, which would call on the administration to properly implement the Boating Safety and Sport Fish Enhancement Act, commonly known as the Wallop-Breaux Act. Passed in 1984 as part of the Deficit Reduction Act, this legislation was the result of a long effort on the part of the sport fishermen and boaters of this country to raise additional funds to improve their sport and to continue a 50-year tradition of user fee programs to support conservation of natural resources.

The Wallop-Breaux program is an expansion and continuation of the Federal Aid in Fish Restoration Program, passed by the Congress in 1950, which was funded by an excise tax on certain articles of sport fishing tackle. The Boating Safety and Sport Fish Restoration Act expanded the number of fishing tackle items subject to this excise tax. In addition, the legislation recognized that recreational boaters pay another user fee for which they previously received only limited benefits—the 9 cents per gallon tax on fuels purchased for recreational boats. Prior to passage of the Wallop-Breaux legislation, the money attributable to the motorboat fuels tax was authorized to be spent on boating safety programs, but very little was ever appropriated. The Wallop-Breaux legislation dedicated the motorboat fuels tax to boating safety and sport fish restoration programs, along with import duties on fishing tackle and pleasure craft. All of these funds were placed in a special Aquatic Resources Trust Fund.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation was a bipartisan effort, strongly supported by the fishing and boating public, the Congress, and the administration. Yet, the administration's budget proposal for fiscal year 1986 proposes to repeal the existing automatic appropriation for the Federal Aid in Fish Restoration Act and to withhold new funds from this program. My colleagues and I believe that the administration's attack on this program threatens to undermine the user fee concept which has served this program and others so well. Sportsmen have willingly supported user fees in the past because they believe in conserving these natural resources and because Congress has never broken faith with them. I strongly urge your support for this resolution that calls on the administration to honor its commitment to the more than 50 million American boaters and fishermen and to implement the provisions of the Boating Safety and Sport Fish Restoration Act as approved by the Congress and the administration less than 1 year ago.●

"DOC" GARCELON ELECTED NRA PRESIDENT

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that a distinguished citizen from the First District of Maine has risen to the highest position in The National Rifle Association of America [NRA]. Dr. Alonzo H. Garcelon, DDS, was unanimousy elected president of the 3-million-member NRA by its board of directors on April 22 at the association's 14th annual meeting in Seattle.

This prestigious position could not have been entrusted to a more qualified individual. Dr. Garcelon, an outstanding marksman and progun activist from Augusta, ME, has a broad background in professional and civic activities. In addition to serving on the board of directors of the NRA before his election to presidency, he has held positions in many other organizations, including chairman of the advisory council of the Maine Department of Inland Fisheries and Game, chairman of the Maine Governor's Committee on Hunting Safety, and chairman of the Council for Sensible Game Management, as well as heading other hunting and rifle associations. Dr. Garcelon is honorary president for life of the Sportman's Alliance of Maine, an organization that he founded in 1975. As a public and private health dentist, he is at the top of his profession, having served as president of the State Dental Association Dr. Garcelon has an abiding interest in education as well. He serves as a trustee of three different educational institutions.

I praise my friend and fellow Mainer, "Doc" Garcelon, for his many achievements and invite my colleagues to join me in congratulating him and wishing him luck as he looks toward this new challenge at the NRA.

I would like to share with my colleagues the text of Dr. Garcelon's acceptace speech at the Seattle NRA Convention:

Ladies and gentleman of the board: Thank you for electing me president of this great organization—The National Rifle Association of America. You know, I'd rather be president of the NRA than Governor of Massachusetts, which doesn't say much, I suppose. But I'd rather be president of NRA than Governor of Maine and that says much!

Where else in America could a small town dentist from Maine be honored by his peers through election as president of the 3 million-plus member National Rifle Association.

The fight for leadership of NRA is over. Ray Arnett is our elected executive vice president for the next five years. I want to congratulate Ray, but I also want to congratulate the NRA. We are so fortunate to find another great American to carry on where Harlon Carter left off. In our great American democracy, people argue, contest, and cast their ballots. I want to remind you that an equally important tradition is accepting the outcome of elections hard fought and fairly contested.

As the one common link between the membership as a whole and the board of directors—both of whom share responsibility for governing this great organization—the office of president can and must be one of leadership!

I pledge to this organization that I will vigorously pursue my role of healer, unifier, and catalyst for promoting the goals and objectives as well as the dreams of this organization and all that it stands for.

In addition to this traditional role, permit me to sketch a few other areas which I hope to address as your new president. These include: (1) fair coverage by the media, (2) recruitment of millions of hunters as members, (3) educating new generations to the responsibilities of gun ownership and hunting, and (4) reaching the group which number over 50% of all voters—the women of America!

With regard to the first issue, we want to judiciously use our economic power and clout to bring fairness to the print and electronic media. They, who represent no one but themselves, have for so long distorted the values, activities, and integrity of NRA members and millions of other hunters and gun owners.

By entering the market place, perhaps we could help bring about a climate in which the media covers events and organizations with fairness, objectivity, and honesty. In the near future, I will appoint a special committee which will explore these possibilities.

As an avid hunter and lifelong gun owner, I know that we can enlist many more members to this important group. While many may not yet have heard our message, it seems pretty simple to an old country boy like me that you can't hunt if you can't own or use a gun. Our challenge is to reach and recruit the 20 million hunters who are not yet among us.

We have made a good beginning with our youth programs. The youth of America are our future. We must expand our efforts in this direction. There must be millions of our youth like Jared Goegeline, whom we honored Friday as the 50,000th junior member.

Our young people are the leaders and voters of tomorrow. They are also the hunters and gun owners of the next generations, for without their interest and involvement, there will be no gun ownership or hunting.

Another segment of our population which needs more emphasis is women. We can easily double or triple our ranks by enlisting women who can or will share our interests.

This so-called minority, as well as the real minorities in our society, represent great potential for increasing our ranks.

Thus far, I've not said anything about the NRA's most important responsibility—opposing gun control of all kinds and in all political jurisdictions! Lest there be any misunderstanding by friend and foe alike, these areas I've discussed, and given new priority, will provide the needed and additional strength, numbers, and resources for the battles that lie ahead. NRA has, and will always be, the "cutting edge" and in the first rank among any who defend the second amendment. Preserving our rights to keep and bear arms is, after all, our primary challenge and greatest obligation. So said our membership by over 95%, according to the recent DMI poll.

You'll be hearing more about these subjects in the President's Column and through other appropriate means.

In the meantime, I respectfully request that when we leave this board meeting, and this annual meeting, that we become a family once again, with all of the traditions that make a family great. If there is any group that can do it, we, the NRA, can!

Thank you and God bless you all.●

VOTING RECORD

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it has become my practice from time to time to list my votes in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I strongly believe that the people of the Second Congressional District of Arizona have a right to know where I stand on the issues decided by this body, and I have found that printing my record here is the best way to provide that information.

This is not an all inclusive list. I have omitted noncontroversial votes such as quorum calls, motions to resolve into the Committee of the Whole House, and motions to approve the Journal of the previous day.

The descriptions are necessarily somewhat short, and I am sure that some of my constituents will have additional questions about the issues described here. So I invite them to write me for more specifics.

The votes are described as follows:

KEY

1. Rollcall number;
2. Number of the bill or resolution;
3. Title of the bill or resolution;
4. A description of the vote;
5. The outcome of the vote;
6. The vote total;
7. My vote, in the form Y=yes, N=no, and NV=not voting;
8. The vote totals of the Arizona delegation (yes-no-not voting);
9. The date.

151. H.R. 4170. Deficit Reduction Act. Vander Jagt, R-Mich., motion to instruct House conferees on the deficit-reduction bill not to agree to the Senate amendment to lengthen the depreciation period for real estate and to reduce tax credits available for the rehabilitation of old buildings. Motion agreed to 397-24: Y(5-0-0), May 23, 1984.

152. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Gore, D-Tenn., amendment to the Brown, D-Calif., amendment, to provide that no funds may be used to test the anti-satellite missile (ASAT) against a target in space unless the Soviet Union conducts a test of its ASAT after enactment of the bill. Adopted 238-181: Y(2-3-0), May 23, 1984.

153. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Stratton, D-N.Y., amendment to the Brown, D-Calif., amendment, to provide that the anti-satellite missile (ASAT) may be tested against an object in space as many times as the Soviet ASAT has been tested against an object in space. Rejected 178-236: N(3-2-0), May 23, 1984.

154. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Byron, D-Md., amendment to the McCurdy, D-Okla., substitute to the Brown, D-Calif., amendment, to provide that the anti-satellite missile (ASAT) may be tested against an object in space as many times as the Soviet ASAT has been tested against an object in space. Rejected 181-229: N(3-2-0), May 23, 1984.

155. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. McCurdy, D-Okla., substitute to the Brown, D-Calif., amendment, to bar testing of the anti-satellite missile (ASAT) against an object in space through March 31, 1985, and allowing tests thereafter only if the president certifies that he has invited the Soviet Union to resume negotiations to limit ASATs. Rejected 186-228: N(3-2-0), May 23, 1984. (The Brown amendment, as amended, which provided that no funds may be used to test the anti-satellite missile (ASAT) against a target in space unless the Soviet Union conducts a test of its ASAT after enactment of the bill, subsequently was adopted by voice vote.)

156. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Foley, D-Wash., amendment to bar the use of authorized funds to introduce combat troops into El Salvador and Nicaragua, except in certain circumstances. Adopted 341-64: Y(2-3-0), May 23, 1984.

157. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Hartnett, R-S.C., amendment to bar the use of authorized funds to introduce combat troops into Western Europe, the Middle East or Korea, except in certain circumstances. Rejected 27-379: N(0-5-0), May 23, 1984.

159. H.R. 5692. Debt Limit. Passage of the bill to increase temporarily the debt ceiling by $30 billion, from $1.49 trillion to $1.52 trillion, through June 22, 1984. Passed 211-198: Y(3-2-0), May 24, 1984.

160. H.J. Res. 492. Department of Agriculture, Fiscal 1984 Urgent Supplemental Appropriations. Adoption of the conference report on the bill to appropriate $1,061,894,000 in fiscal 1984 for the Department of Agriculture and other agencies. Adopted 376-36: Y(4-1-0), May 24, 1984.

161. H.J. Res. 492. Department of Agriculture, Fiscal 1984 Urgent Supplemental Appropriations. Long, D-Md., motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment providing $61.75 million in military aid to El Salvador. Motion agreed to 267-154: Y(4-1-0), May 24, 1984.

162. H.J. Res. 492. Department of Agriculture, Fiscal 1984 Urgent Supplemental Appropriations. Boland, D-Mass., motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate Amendment providing $21 million in covert aid to Nicaraguan rebels, with an amendment providing no funds for Nicaraguan rebels. Motion agreed to 241-177: Y(2-3-0), May 24, 1984.

163. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Hunter, R-Calif., amendment to bar the use of authorized funds to introduce combat troops into El Salvador or Nicaragua unless the president determines that a communist threat to the region exists. Rejected 99-288: N(3-2-0), May 24, 1984.

164. H.R. 2174. Bankruptcy Court Extension. Rodino, D-N.J., motion to agree with the Senate amendments to the bill to extend from May 25, 1984, until June 20, 1984, a period of transition to a new bankruptcy court system established under the 1978 Bankruptcy Reform Act (PL 95-598). Motion agreed to 349-27: Y(4-0-1), May 24, 1984.

166. H.R. 5713. Department of Housing and Urban Development Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Adoption of the rule (H. Res. 511) providing for House floor consideration of the bill to appropriate funds for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and 17 independent agencies for fiscal 1985. Adopted 296-56: Y(2-1-2), May 30, 1984.

167. H.R. 5713. Department of Housing and Urban Development Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Walker, R-Pa., amendment to authorize the president to cut any item in the bill by up to 10 percent. Rejected 133-258: N(3-2-0), May 30, 1984.

168. H.R. 5713. Department of Housing and Urban Development Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Passage of the bill to appropriate $58,436,496,500 for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and 17 independent agencies in fiscal 1985. Passed 282-110: Y(3-2-0), May 30, 1984.

169. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Bedell, D-Iowa, amendment to the Nichols, D-Ala., amendment to bar the Pentagon from limiting competitive bidding only to persons on a list of qualified bidders. Adopted 324-75: Y(2-3-0), May 30, 1984.

170. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Nichols, D-Ala., amendment to require contractors to identify the manufacturer of parts sold to the Pentagon. Adopted 396-0: Y(5-0-0), May 30, 1984.

171. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Ottinger, D-N.Y., amendment to bar the use of funds for civil defense intended to prepare for or respond to a nuclear war. Rejected 87-301: N(0-5-0), May 30, 1984.

172. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Biaggi, D-N.Y., amendment to allow up to two non-U.S.-built cruise ships to be used in trade between U.S. ports. Adopted 237-159: N(1-4-0), May 30, 1984.

174. H.R. 5112. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Ottinger, D-N.Y., amendment to delete $31.3 million for the National Endowment for Democracy, created in 1983 to encouraged understanding of U.S.-style democracy in foreign countries through the private sector. Adopted N(4-1-0), May 31, 1984.

175. H.R. 5112. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Miller, R-Ohio, motion to recommit the bill to the Appropriations Committee with instructions to trim 4 percent in discretionary funding for fiscal 1985. Motion agreed to 208-194: N(3-2-0), May 31, 1984.

176. H.R. 5112. Commerce, Justice, State and the Judiciary Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Passage of the bill to provide $10,749,649,000 in fiscal 1985 for the Commerce, Justice and State departments, 17 related agencies and the federal judiciary. Passed 303-98: Y(3-2-0), May 31, 1984.

177. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Price, D-III., amendment to the Dickinson, R-Ala., Amendment, to authorize the production for 15 MX missiles subject to certain conditions. Adopted 203-182: N(4-1-0), May 31, 1984.

178. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Bennett, D-Fla., amendment to the Dickinson, R-Ala., amendment to prohibit the obligation of funds appropriated for production of MX missiles unless Congress has given its approval by passing a joint resolution after April 1, 1985. Adopted 199-197: Y(2-3-0), May 31, 1984.

179. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Dickinson, R-Ala., amendment, as amended, to authorize the production of 15 MX missiles but prohibit the obligation of funds appropriated for the purpose unless Congress had given its approval by passing a joint resolution after April 1, 1985. Adopted 198-197: NV(1-3-1), May 31, 1984.

180. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Price, D-Ill., motion that all debate on the bill and the amendments thereto be completed in one hour (by 10:10 p.m.). Motion agreed to 213-174: Y(3-2-0), May 31, 1984.

181. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Hiler, R-Ind., motion that all debate on the Dellums, D-Calif., amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes. Motion rejected 55-321: N(2-3-0), May 31, 1984.

182. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Dellums, D-Calif., amendment to prohibit, during fiscal 1985, further deployment in Europe of Pershing II or ground-launched cruise missiles unless the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) notified the United States that there was a NATO consensus that further deployments should be made. Rejected 104-291: N(0-5-0), May 31, 1984.

183. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Dickinson, R-Ala., amendment, as amended, to authorize the production of 15 MX missiles but prohibit the obligation of funds appropriated for that purpose unless Congress have given its approval by passing a joint resolution after April 1, 1985. Adopted 199-196: Y(2-3-0), May 31, 1984.

184. H.R. 5167. Department of Defense Authorization. Passage of the bill to authorize $207 billion for research and development, weapons procurement, and operations and maintenance in the Department of Defense. Passed 298-98: Y(4-1-0), May 31, 1984.

185. H.R. 5743. Agriculture Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Dannemeyer, R-Calif., amendment to reduce certain programs by $24 million, on the assumption that the Agriculture Department could administratively implement money-saving policy changes recommended by a presidential commission (the Grace commission). Rejected 153-232: N(3-2-0), June 6, 1984.

186. H.R. 5743. Agriculture Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Obey, D-Wis., substitute for the Walker, R-Pa., amendment, to reduce appropriations for non-entitlement farm and food programs in fiscal 1985 by 64 percent. Rejected 6-388: N(0-5-0), June 6, 1984.

187. H.R. 5743. Agriculture Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Walker, R-Pa., amendment to reduce appropriations from farm and food programs in fiscal 1985 by 1 percent. Adopted 232-164: Y(5-0-0), June 6, 1984.

188. H.R. 5753. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Frenzel, R-Minn., amendment to reduce funds for House of Representatives operations by approximately $13 million. Rejected 191-201: N(3-2-0), June 6, 1984.

189. H.R. 5753. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Brown, R-Colo., amendment to bar hiring individuals to operate elevators in House office buildings and reduce funds in the bill earmarked for elevator operators' salaries by $88,354. Rejected 176-205: N(3-2-0), June 6, 1984.

190. H.R. 5753. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Frenzel, R-Minn., amendment to make a 2 percent across-the-board cut in the bill's funding level. Adopted 201-175: N(2-2-1), June 6, 1984.

191. H.R. 5753. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Fazio, D-Calif., motion that the Committee of the Whole rise and report the bill back to the House. Motion agreed to 234-147: Y(2-3-0), June 6, 1984. (By voting to rise the House refused to consider a pending Lewis, R-Calif., amendment to bar the use of funds for House television coverage unless cameras pan the chamber uniformly from gavel to gavel.)

192. H.R. 5753. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Frenzel, R-Minn., amendment to make a 2 percent across-the-board cut in the bill's funding level. Adopted 193-190: N(3-2-0), June 6, 1984. (This amendment previously had been adopted in the Committee of the Whole.)

193. H.R. 5753. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1985. Passage of the bill to provide $1,247,450,820 in fiscal 1985 for House of Representatives operations and legislative branch agencies. Passed 247-138: Y(4-1-0), June 6, 1984.

194. H.R. 1149. Oregon Wilderness. Seiberling, D-Ohio, motion to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendment to the bill to designate as federal wilderness and protect from development 945,000 acres in national forests in Oregon. Motion agreed to (thus clearing the bill for the president) 281-99: Y(2-2-1), June 6, 1984.

196. H.R. 5145. Human Services Amendments. Perkins, D-Ky., motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill to reauthorize Head Start, Community Services Block Grants, and other social services programs through fiscal 1989. Motion rejected 261-156: Y(2-3-0), June 7, 1984.

197. H.R. 5504. Surface Transportation Act. McNulty, D-Ariz., amendment to strike the provision in the bill changing the formula for allocating to the states funds for highway resurfacing, restoration, rehabilitation and reconstruction. Rejected 93-315: Y(5-0-0), June 7, 1984.

198. H.R. 5504. Surface Transportation Act. Passage of the bill to approve Interstate highway and Interstate substitute cost estimates, and to provide relocation assistance. Passed 297-73: Y(3-2-0), June 7, 1984.

199. H.R. 5525. Semiconductor Chip Protection. Kastenmeier, D-Wis., motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill to provide a new form of 10-year copyright protection for semiconductor chips. Motion agreed to 388-0: Y(5-0-0), June 11, 1984.

200. H.R. 4772. Vietnam Veterans of America Charter. Sam B. Hall Jr., D-Texas, motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill to grant a federal charter to the Vietnam Veterans of America. Motion agreed to 295-96: Y(3-1-1), June 11, 1984.●

REMOVAL JURISDICTION ACT OF 1985

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce legislation to correct a problem with the Judicial Code of the United States relating to removal jurisdiction and the ability of Federal district courts to hear certain cases removed by defendants from State courts. This legislation will eliminate unnecessary and unproductive work in the Federal court system and remove another obstacle hindering litigants in their quest for justice.

Conceptually, the problem this legislation addresses is simple. A State court defendant may remove to the Federal court for the district in which the State court sits an action founded on a claim or right arising under the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States. Congress provided for such removal in 1875 in order to enable a defendant sued on a Federal question to avoid litigating a Federal issue in a State court of the plaintiff's choice, as well as to empower the Federal bench to hear all cases involving Federal questions.

Removal works as Congress intended—provided Federal jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action is concurrent with the State courts. In other words, removal operates effectively if either the State courts or the Federal courts could hear the action and render a valid judgment on the merits. If, however, jurisdiction over the particular subject matter is reserved by law to the Federal courts exclusively, then a problem arises. Upon removal, the Federal court must dismiss the action, even though the Federal court is the only tribunal authorized to hear the action and even though the plaintiff can refile the suit there immediately.

This results from the 1922 Supreme Court decision in Lambert Run Coal Co v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 258 U.S. 377. There, the Supreme Court held that removal jurisdiction is "derivative," and ruled that a Federal court cannot derive subject matter jurisdiction over an action from a State court which had no such jurisdiction. This means a lawsuit filed in State court and removed by the defendant to Federal court for further proceedings must be dismissed because the Federal court does not acquire jurisdiction over the subject matter.

Mr. Speaker, this rule makes no practical sense whatsoever. The rule requires litigants already in court to start over in Federal court from the point of filing rather than continuing from the point of removal. Because only the defendant can remove a suit from State to Federal court, obviously this rule penalizes a defendant who wants to expedite an action rather than delay it; a defendant not wanting to proceed will seek dismissal in the State court for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The rule therefore adds to the expenses of both parties and the court system by creating unnecessary paperwork and delaying actions which could otherwise proceed to judgment. The rule promotes no cognizable Federal policy in return.

The rule is also illogical. To require the action be dismissed and refiled in the same Federal court defeats the very purpose of removal jurisdiction. The Federal court is where the action should have been filed in the first place, and is indeed the only court which can hear it and render a valid judgment. The rule also penalizes plaintiffs whose attorneys mistakenly file their claims in the wrong courts when the defendant is willing to remove the action to the proper forum.

Mr. Speaker, my legislation would amend section 1441 of title 28, United States Code by adding a new subsection to correct this problem. The intent of my legislation is clear: To overrule the doctrine of Lambert Run Coal Company to permit Federal courts to hear cases removed from State courts which lack jurisdiction over the subject matter of the actions. This bill will make our court system more efficient for the courts themselves and for litigants.

This legislation does not expand the substantive rights of litigants. The bill provides only that a Federal court to which an action is removed by defendant is not precluded from hearing the suit and rendering judgment on the merits because the State court from which the action is removed lacked jurisdiction over the subject matter. Under current law, only defendants may remove actions from State to Federal court, and defendants not wishing to remove need only move to dismiss actions below if they prefer, forcing plantiff to refile in a proper forum. Should defendant, however, choose to remove an action to the proper Federal forum in the interest of expediting the litigation, he or she may do so under this legislation, provided the other requirements for removal are satisfied, and the Federal court may proceed.

Mr. Speaker, one of my former law professors, George Fraser of the University of Oklahoma Law Center, brought this problem to my attention. Professor Fraser is a long-time student of the Federal court system and a recognized authority on issues of Federal jurisdiction and civil procedure. Professor Fraser and other commentators including Wright and Miller, Hart and Wechsler and the American Law Institute have urged the courts and Congress to abandon this unjustified and unproductive rule. I am grateful to Professor Fraser for bringing this matter to my attention, and I thank him for his kind and diligent assistance in drafting this important and long overdue legislation.●

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, May 8, 1985 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

As if high interest rates and low prices were not enough, farmers now have a third reason to be concerned over the health of their industry: for the second time in a month, the Department of Agriculture has lowered its estimate of U.S. exports for 1985, dropping it some $1 billion. According to USDA officials, the U.S. will sell $34.5 billion worth of farm goods abroad this year. That is down more than 20% from 1981, when agricultural exports peaked at almost $44 billion. Not only have export earnings dropped, the U.S. share of world agricultural trade has fallen from 46% to 38%.

Exports are of paramount importance to U.S. farmers. 1 out of every 3 acres is producing solely for export. Agricultural exports constitute one-fifth of farm income as well as one-fifth of U.S. total export earnings. It is clear that our farmers' income and the well-being of agriculture have become heavily dependent upon exports. Once a relatively isolated sector, U.S. farming is now heavily "internationalized". Since Indiana ranks eighth in our nation's total agricultural exports (fourth in soybean and feed grains), Hoosiers have a big stake in the world market.

Yet this reliance on world markets can be a two-edged sword. Our farmers are now extremely vulnerable to events which take place thousands of miles from home, such as changes in agricultural and economic policies of foreign countries, the vagaries of weather conditions worldwide, and the international monetary situation and exchange rates.

In the 1970's, farm exports were booming, due largely to increased purchasing power of countries that were good markets for our products, as well as a more competitive U.S. dollar. Overall, the value of U.S. farm exports increased 460 percent, from less than $8 billion in 1971 to almost $44 billion in 1981. Yet in recent years, exports have been slumping. There are several reasons for this, including the strong value of the dollar, the lingering world recession, huge third-world debts, increased agricultural production worldwide, aggressive competition, and high U.S. farm support levels pricing us out of some markets.

Productivity gains and increased efficiency in several countries have complicated this export problem and have recently challenged American producers. For example, market incentives introduced in China in 1982 produced a 15 percent expansion in corn production, 20 percent in rice, and 40 percent in wheat. Increased yields with the use of new varieties coupled with government incentives made the United Kingdom a net exporter of wheat and barley in little more than four years. In Latin America, agricultural production had increased by 35 percent over the last decade. Brazilian soybean and corn yields often compete with our own, Argentine wheat prices undercut ours, and both countries have significant land for farm expansion.

Diagnoses of the causes of agriculture's ills are numerous, but most of the proposed remedies rely upon the same old medicine. It is critical that we seek innovative ways to maintain and, if possible, expand our exports, and thereby help assure the American farmer a fair return on his investment. Given the complexity of the problem, there is no single, simple solution.

The increase in the value of the dollar in recent years had been the primary factor in the downturn in farm exports, and the major culprit behind our overvalued dollar is the huge federal deficit. The overvalued dollar makes American products some 40 percent more expensive to overseas customers. The biggest single step we can take to help the farmer is to reduce the federal deficit.

Unfortunately, reducing the deficit will take time, and many farmers need help now. We must take immediate steps to improve our export picture. The newly-formed National Commission on Agricultural Trade and Export Policy, composed of 35 government and farm-sector leaders, recently released a preliminary report to assist Congress in its rewrite of the 4-year Farm Bill this year. The report proposes several steps, which I support, for improving U.S. agriculture exports:

First, because farm exports suffer from the inconsistent actions of the many U.S. government agencies involved in policy formulation, we should designate one government agency to be responsible for coordinating agricultural trade policy. All agencies should be required to report the impact their policies and programs would have on farm exports. Second, we should require the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to implement an improved system for monitoring and responding to unfair trade practices. We must counter unfair trade practices by every apropriate means. Third, we should continue to negotiate a general reduction of trade barriers, as dictated by our national commitment to fair trade. Variable import restrictions could be used to reward nations cooperating in efforts to lower trade barriers and to punish nations which continue to employ predatory or unfair trade practices. Fourth, we must expand and improve our export credit programs, including direct credits, credit guarantees, and blended-credit programs. I favor the selective and focused use of export subsidies when they are necessary to discourage foreign subsidies and maintain U.S. markets. Fifth, the long-term potential of U.S. agriculture depends upon a strong commitment to foreign market development. That includes credit programs for importing countries to improve their import and marketing facilities, as well as improved use of food aid programs for foreign market development. Sixth, the U.S. must re-establish its reputation as a reliable supplier of agricultural products, by strengthening existing law generally prohibiting the use of embargoes and by ensuring contract sanctity. Seventh, cargo preference laws designed to help the U.S. maritime industry have increased the cost of shipping our farm products overseas. We should exempt agricultural programs from cargo preference requirements. Finally, we must make sure that our domestic farm programs are not hindering the competitiveness of U.S. agricultural products in world markets.●

SALUTE TO HARRY CRANDELL, A DEFENDER OF WILDLIFE AND WILDERNESS

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, May 1 marked the retirement of Mr. Harry Crandell as chief of staff of the Interior Committee's Subcommittee on Public Lands, after a distinguished 35-year career of service as a defender of our Nation's wildlife and wildlands. As chairman of the subcommittee, I would like to take this occasion to pay tribute to his tireless efforts on behalf of the environment. The late Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas once observed that the trees, animals, plants, fish, and landscapes of our Nation, because they cannot speak in their own defense, are all too often left without a voice in modern society. For over 35 years, Harry Crandell has been, like Justice Douglas himself, an ardent defender of those interests. But more than that, through his tremendous knowledge and wise counsel, he has been an invaluable asset to our subcommittee and, indeed, to the entire conservation movement in the United States.

While I have known Harry only for the past 10 years, in 8 of which he served as staff director of my Subcommittees on Alaska Lands and Public Lands, his formal conservation career extends back to 1951, when he began a 10-year stint as a wildlife refuge manager with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. During that period, Harry was assigned to various wildlife refuges in Arizona, Oklahoma, and Wyoming, and his duties included personnel supervision, public relations, preparation of biological studies and research in public use management and wildlife issues. From conversations with him over the years I am certain that many of his great personal strengths, such as his friendly, self-effacing manner and his ability as a firm but congenial negotiator, were developed or honed during those 10 years in the field.

In 1959, Harry moved to Albuquerque, NM, where he was put in charge of the Fish and Wildlife Service's land acquisition program for an eight State region—Arizona, Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming. In that capacity he was instrumental in the establishment of 16 new units of the National Wildlife Refuge System and in assisting States and Indian tribes in the development and implementation of fish and wildlife management programs. He also represented the agency at numerous public meetings, hearings, and negotiating sessions—activities which prepared him extraordinarily well for his legislative responsibilities beginning some 10 years later on Capitol Hill.

In 1964, Harry's career brought him to Washington, DC, where he became the Fish and Wildlife Service's planning officer with responsibility for supervising planning functions for recreation, interpretive wildlife management and wilderness activities. After the passage of the Wilderness Act in 1964. the Fish and Wildlife Service was directed to review roadless areas of the National Wildlife Refuge System, with a view toward recommending suitable areas for wilderness. It was Harry's job to head up that review process. Thus began Harry's formal involvement in the wilderness "movement." However, I am sure that his real involvement began in his boyhood years in the mountains of Colorado, where his parents, Ben and Mildred Crandell, instilled in him a love for the outdoors and respect for nature. Harry's leadership, often in the face of stiff resistance from more "management" oriented colleagues who did not as fully appreciate the values of unmanaged wildlands, resulted in the ultimate recommendation of some 3.5 million acres of wildlife refuge lands in the lower 48 States and tens of millions of acres in Alaska for inclusion in the newly created Wilderness System. Many of those areas have since been designated as wilderness by act of Congress, thanks in no small degree to Harry's diligent efforts in developing the proposals and later working directly with Congress to secure their formal designation.

In that regard, it should be noted that Harry drafted the Interior Department regulations which interpreted the language of Wilderness Act to include a requirement that roadless "ecological islands" of less than 5,000 acres in size be inventoried and studied for their wilderness potential. As a result of that review, several such "ecological islands," including the Great Swamp in New Jersey, Moosehorn in Maine and Chase Lake in North Dakota, were judged by the Fish and Wildlife Service to merit wilderness designation and have since been so designated by act of Congress. These units, though relatively small in size, provide important diversity in the Wilderness System and incorporate therein lands and ecosystems that afford especially valuable opportunities for wildlife protection, scientific study, and education.

During his tenure as the Fish and Wildlife Service's planning officer, Harry also became increasingly involved in the agency's planning efforts in Alaska. Frequent trips to that State convinced him that Alaska represented our Nation's last real chance to set aside parks, refuges and wildernesses on a scale large enough to preserve entire ecosystems, so that present and future generations of Americans would have the thrill of seeing some of the world's most magnificent wildlands free of the marks and works of man, reflecting only the majestic handwork of the Creator.

After some 20 years with the Fish and Wildlife Service, Harry's deepening commitment to the Nation's wildlands prompted him to leave Federal service for a 5-year stint as director of wilderness reviews for the Wilderness Society. The 5 years—1970-75—of Harry's service with the society not surprisingly coincided with some of that organization's more highly publicized and effective public education and legislative campaigns. These included: enactment of the landmark Eastern Wilderness Act of 1975; the Alaska oil pipeline struggle—in which the Wilderness Society played a major role in ensuring that the pipeline proposal was modified and improved to protect environmental values; the designation of a dozen new national wildlife refuge wildernesses; and the rejection of the U.S. Forest Service's RARE I proposal.

Harry also spearheaded the Wilderness Society's citizen education efforts and did a marvelous job in recruiting, stimulating and educating young environmental activists. Many of his proteges have gone on to become consummate grassroots organizers and leaders of the environmental community today. Harry also often drew the unenviable task of being the society's lobbyist assigned to particular Members of Congress who were not known for their enthusiastic support of the goals and proposals of the Wilderness Society. In that capacity, Harry's friendly nature and expert knowledge of the facts undoubtedly persuaded more than one Member of Congress to go from opposition to neutrality and often to support of wilderness proposals.

With an exceptionally diverse background in wildlife and wildlands management, administration, planning, education, grassroots activism and lobbying, it is perhaps only natural that Harry's career finally led him to Capitol Hill, where in August 1975 he became a consultant to the Subcommittee on Public Lands, then chaired by Congressman—now Senator—JOHN MELCHER of Montana. During the year and a half he served with JOHN MELCHER's subcommittee, Harry played a key role in the working out of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 [FLPMA]. Among other things, he was primary draftsman of section 603, the key section pertaining to the Bureau of Land Management's Wilderness Study Program.

During Harry's years in the field with the Fish and Wildlife Service he had toured numerous BLM lands and had grown to realize that the lands nobody wanted actually contain some of the most scenic and beautiful areas in the Nation. Only now, nearly 10 years after the enactment of FLPMA, are more and more Americans beginning to learn of the spectacular red rock canyons, badlands, river gorges, native grasslands and desert ecosystems that comprise many BLM roadless lands. That these lands are still enjoyable in their natural, unspoiled state can be attributed to the foresight of Harry and others who initially helped formalize the BLM wilderness study process.

The year 1976 also saw the enactment of legislation designating several new wildernesses in the Refuge System and a statute removing BLM as joint administrator, with Fish and Wildlife Service, of three of the Nation's finest national wildlife refuges, the Charles M. Russell Refuge in Montana, the Charles Sheldon Antelope Range in Nevada and the Kofa Game Range in Arizona. The act gave the Fish and Wildlife Service sole jurisdiction and full management authority for all parts of the refuge system in the lower 48 States. Once again, much of the credit can be traced back to Harry's superb lobbying efforts and grassroots organizing skills immediately prior to his moving to the Hill.

Upon organization of the 95th Congress in 1977, Harry became the staff director of the newly formed Subcommittee on General Oversight and Alaska Lands, on which I served as chairman. Thus began his 8 years of service with me as an administrator, innovator, legislative strategist, confidant, and above all, prime adviser and point man on the monumental Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1980 [ANILCA]. Together we sat through hundreds of hours of hearings, meetings, drafting sessions, markups, floor debates and stragegy discussions that finally culminated in the House passage of a bill in 1978, repassage in 1979, and ultimate enactment into law in 1980.

Throughout the entire Alaska process, and in the years that have followed, Interior Committee Chairman MO UDALL, and I and others members of the committee were repeatedly amazed by Harry's intimate knowledge of the State of Alaska, his devotion to the land, and his personal attachment to each park, refuge, wilderness and other conservation proposals—almost as if each and every proposal were a spiritual or blood relative. Harry's comprehensive understanding of the nuances and legal intricacies of alternative park, refuge, wilderness, and other proposals, his sense of the appropriateness of a potential designation for each particular tract of land, and is scholarly and professional presentation of the issues and facts involved made him invaluable to all who worked on this monumental conservation legislation.

Although the final version of ANILCA was not as strong as the House-passed version, many of the tremendous achievements and positive features of the 1980 act are attributable to Harry's superb work on Alaska over his years at the Fish and Wildlife Service, the Wilderness Society and as staff director of the Subcommittees on Alaska Lands, and later, Public Lands.

Of course, Harry's years as staff director were not spent solely working on Alaska Lands. Indeed, perhaps of equal significance in the long term were his efforts to ensure that the National Wilderness Preservation System in the lower 48 States contain quality units in as many States as possible and be truly representative of the broad range of ecosystems and wildlands that originally covered most of the Nation's landscape. From 1979-84, the subcommittee produced legislation designating some 12 million acres of new national forest and BLM wilderness in the lower 48 States. Although the specifics of such designations were sometimes left to others, Harry's expertise as a wilderness historian and institutional memory on wilderness management and philosophy issues were invaluable to a whole host of staff colleagues, conservationists and Members of Congress. Harry's involvement, in one way or another, in practically every wilderness designation battle since the enactment of the Wilderness Act in 1964, helped provide Members and staff with a sense of history by which to evaluate various management options and legislative proposals.

We were often reminded by Harry that the Wilderness System was just that—a system—and that we should resist demands to modify the basic tenets of that system, lest the end product become a mere assortment of specialized management areas, each governed by a different set of rules, regulations and management standards. In short, Harry was a true guardian of the integrity of the Wilderness System and perhaps Congress' primewatchdog against the frequent logical sounding but potentially debilitating proposals to allow special exceptions for certain uses in wilderness areas. I believe hindsight will indicate that these efforts were among Harry's most important contributions as a defender of wilderness.

Given such a long career devoted to wilderness and wildlife issues, Harry's retirement from Federal service will surely not spell the end of his involvement in the conservation arena. Indeed, I am confident that we will continue to benefit from his wisdom and input for many years to come. Harry claims that he is not sure where his interests will lead him and his charming wife, Olga, to locate next, but I would not be surprised to see him move back to enjoy the wildlands of Colorado, where his life began some 61 years ago. Wherever he goes, he will enrich the lives of those around him and undoubtedly play a forceful role in conservation issues.

We will miss Harry Crandell terribly on Capitol Hill, not only for his profound knowledge and professional demeanor, but for his unassuming and good-natured manner, his friendly disposition and his ability to laugh. His departure leaves a void that cannot be filled, but the inspiration he gave to those succeeding him should help lessen the impact of his leaving. We wish him well in his future endeavors.●

A TRUE SERVANT OF THE PEOPLE RETIRES

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I would take just a moment to praise an exceptional public servant in my district who, for health reasons, retired in December of the year just past.

He is Sheriff Manly Lancaster, who served 34 years in the Forsyth County Sheriff's Department, the last 14 of them as the elected head of the department. His is an unusual story about a very special person.

Sheriff Lancaster served as a glider pilot in World War II and participated in the D-day landings in France. After the war, he earned a degree in journalism at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and landed a job as a sportswriter for the Winston-Salem Journal. His career was cut short, however, when he found that he was required to work Sundays. Mr. Lancaster said he didn't believe in doing that, so he quit.

Left at somewhat loose ends, he took a $30-a-week job making hotdogs and was slinging mustard in 1950 when he was offered a job as a deputy in the sheriff's department. Neither his life nor the sheriff's department were ever the same again, for there he came under the tutelege of Sheriff Ernie Shore, renowned both as a legendary sheriff and, as a New York Yankee pitcher, the roommate of Babe Ruth.

When Sheriff Shore retired in 1970, he pitched his support Lancaster's way, and Lancaster carried every precinct in the populous county. Shore's advice to his successor was that above all else, a sheriff must be honest.

Lancaster was that, but he was much, much more. In succeeding years, his popularity grew. That popularity was not based on personality, or movie star good looks, or wrongheaded but popular approaches to tough problems. He was popular because he was always fair, always decent, always dedicated to service to the people. This, Mr. Speaker, is in the finest traditions of American public service.

Sheriff Lancaster also was very efficient and innovative. He inherited a horse and buggy department, and during his tenure turned it into one of the best local law enforcement agencies in the Nation.

Long before it was popular—or even acceptable—to do so, he hired minorities and women and paid them the same scale as their white male counterparts. He beefed up the patrol fleet and organized a community crime watch—the first east of the Mississippi River. He hired a training officer, and also sent deputies away to training schools all over the Southeast. He added a juvenile division, and an identification division. He stressed crime prevention, and was so successful with it that he was picked as the first chairman of the State's crime prevention council. He was admired and respected by his peers, who elected him president of the N.C. Sheriffs Association.

During his last year in office, Forsyth County had 1,800 crimes on the FBI index list. Two other North Carolina counties of comparable size—Guilford and Wake—had 2,500 and 2,800, respectively. Forsyth officers solved 35 percent of their cases; Guilford and Wake solved 19 and 11 percent, respectively.

A sheriff or a deputy with a college degree was rare when Lancaster gained that distinction, but it was commonplace in his department when he retired. He left a staff that included two holders of master's degrees, 24 with 4-year college degrees, and 40 with 2 years of college study in police science. Its 24 minority members ranked from captain on down.

But Sheriff Lancaster left much more than that. He left a legacy of professionalism, dedication, and trustworthiness that will tax his successors to equal. Indeed, he may be the yardstick by which Forsyth sheriffs are measured for generations to come.

Although he describes his illness as incurable, Sheriff Lancaster told a reporter that he "did not come home to die, but to live." That living, he said, will include more church work, a little more golf, and perhaps more volunteer work at one of the community's several hospitals.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a glimpse of a quite remarkable man, Manly Lancaster, who dedicated his life to public service, and even now is spending his last days serving people. He has been an inspiration to me, as he well might be to us all.●

HANDICAPPED DEPENDENT TRUSTS

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, we have a great deal to be proud of in the gains that have been made through Federal laws in ensuring that handicapped children will be provided equal education and employment opportunities. Considering where we were 10 years ago, this progress is remarkable. We have taught handicapped children to function independently and to learn alongside their nonhandicapped peers. We have provided them with the vocational skills necessary to lead fulfilling, productive lives as adults. And we have begun to recognize the importance of transitional services for handicapped young men and women who no longer come under the protections of Public Law 94-142, but who need to maintain the sense of dignity and self-worth that such programs provide.

One of the concerns that continues to plague parents of the handicapped, however, is how to provide for their children's future financial security. There is currently no affordable option for moderate income families who wish to set money aside to ensure that their handicapped children will continue to receive the medical care and other services that will be required as they grow older.

I am introducing today legislation which provides a solution to this problem. My bill will allow for the establishment of privately endowed lifetime assistance to disabled individuals, with little or no expense to the Federal Government. Under this legislation, a taxpayer would be able to establish a life insurance contract the exclusive beneficiary of which would be a trust set up on behalf of a disabled child or other disabled member of the taxpayer's family. Tax deductions would be allowed equaling the aggregate life insurance premiums paid by the taxpayer during each taxable year.

It is time to build on the progress that has already been made in promoting independence for the handicapped. This legislation is a logical and important step in surmounting the obstacles that exist in achieving our goals.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. ZBIGNIEW HLADKI

HON. NANCY L. JOHNSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, recently, Mr. Zbigniew Hladki of New Britain, CT, was honored as the 2,500th person placed in a job by the New England Association of Business, Industry, and Rehabilitation, through a program sponsored by the New Britain Constructive Workshop. I congratulate Mr. Hladki for successfully completing the intensive preparation which assisted him in overcoming the sometimes overwhelming physical and emotional barriers of being disabled.

Mr. Hladki's achievement also affords the opportunity to give some well-deserved recognition to the good work of the constructive workshop and NEABIR, which is part of the U.S. Department of Education's Projects with Industry Program.

The constructive workshop, located in my hometown of New Britain, CT, is a privately financed organization created to place as many disabled people as possible in industry-related jobs. To do this, the organization has prospective employees participate in a series of NEABIR-sponsored workshops, seminars that are held in rehabilitation facilities throughout Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Maine. This course is designed both to prepare the individual for interviews and, more importantly, to give him or her the confidence needed to succeed in a job. Oftentimes, the anguish caused by a disability proves to be the prime stumbling block for people. By encouraging people like Mr. Hladki to feel comfortable discussing their disabilities in an interview, these seminars attack this problem head on. This approach has clearly helped the program achieve its amazing placement rate, which in turn has been a boon to local industry since the program's inception 6 years ago.

The private sector has been a strong partner in this project: over 3,000 businesses have worked with NEABIR since 1979. It is encouraging to see so many firms recognize that physical limitations do not keep one from being a productive employee. One cannot help but feel optimistic about our future when cooperation, concern, and effective communications create new opportunities for individuals and industry.

In conclusion, I wish Zbigniew Hladki all the best in his work as a data acquisition analyst for Focus Research Systems of West Hartford. His meticulous preparation, the caring atmosphere of the constructive workshop, the work of NEABIR, and the foresight of his new employer have laid the foundation for Mr. Hladki to succeed and for others as well to fulfill their dreams of employment, productivity, and independence.●

TRADE EMBARGO ON NICARAGUA

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues a statement by my colleague and friend from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], who is the ranking Republican member on the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs. On Tuesday, May 7, the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee jointly with the International Economic Policy and Trade Subcommittee held a hearing to review the administration's decision to impose economic sanctions and a trade embargo on Nicaragua. From the opening statements of the two subcommittee chairmen and the press release announcing the hearing, it seemed as though the hearing was intended to serve more as an opportunity to criticize the President and the administration that an occasion to explore more fully the justification for imposing such economic sanctions. My colleague from California took issue with the criticism of the administration, and I urge you to read his statement.

REMARKS OF HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

Mr. Chairman, I must take this opportunity to deplore the unrelenting effort by the majority party in this House to make U.S. policy toward Nicaragua a partisan political issue.

Any objective political scholar who has followed the debate of this issue in the House since the Sandinista takeover in 1979 must feel the same consternation as I do to see the twists of logic used by the majority party in its approach to this issue.

In the first years, aid to the Sandinista regime was debated and approved in spite of the clear indications that Sandinista ties with Cuba and the Soviet Union were direct and strong. A tremendous military buildup—aided and abetted by the Soviet bloc—began almost immediately after the Sandinistas came to power in 1979. Yet, many of my colleagues on the other side, in debate against aid to the Contras, which only began in 1982, claimed this would push the Sandinistas into the Soviet and Cuban camp.

In the early years of the Sandinista regime, many of my colleagues on the other side questioned whether the Sandinistas posed a threat to the security of the United States or even to their immediate neighbors.

Finally, during the debate two weeks ago on aid to the Contras, virtually everyone on the majority side agreed that something had to be done to force the Sandinistas to moderate their behavior, the only question being how to do it. Now, two weeks later, we hear questions raised as to whether the Sandinistas really are a threat to the United States. I know of nothing that's happened in the last two weeks that has made the Sandinistas any less of a threat than they were during the Contra aid debate.

And now we come to the issue of trade sanctions against Nicaragua. The economic situation in Nicaragua is a disaster, with the Sandinista regime facing a $4.6 billion external debt and a state-controlled economy incapable of providing for the needs of its citizens. On the eve of the vote on Contra aid, Nicaraguan President Ortega announced his intention to go to Moscow to seek additional economic assistance. Following that, and I emphasize it was after Ortega went to Moscow, the administration announced trade sanctions against Nicaragua. Incredibly, some on the majority side criticize the sanctions because they will drive the Sandinistas into further dependence on the Soviets and give them an excuse for the economic Chaos in their country, when in fact, that is the situation before the sanctions.

One of the criticisms of the administration I most often hear from many of the Democrats is that "the White House isn't listening to the Congress." Well, I can assure you, the White House was listening to what the Democrats had to say before the Contra aid vote and during the debate on the Contra aid, and this is some of what they heard:

Congressman OBEY. "Economic pressure is the greatest leverage we have in forcing internal change, in forcing divisions among the leaders of the Sandinistas. Economic pressure is what will cause the population to raise questions about Nicaragua[n] economic and social policies. Hamilton has it. . . ." referring to the Hamilton-Barnes resolution.

Congressman GEJDENSON. "If we examine the options that are put before us by the committee, they take account of realistic alternatives. They give the Congress and the President an opportunity to attempt to utilize economic pressures, economic pressures that have a far greater opportunity to be successful than the present failed policy."

Congressman LEVIN. "They [opponents of the Hamilton resolution] do not refer to the fact that this Congress would consider the imposition of trade sanctions. Are we serious about considering such actions? The answer is yes." And finally;

Chairman BARNES. "Why is it that the United States is Nicaragua's leading trading partner if the Sandinistas are so bad?"

The Barnes-Hamilton resolution states that if Nicaragua does not address the concerns described earlier, "the United States—(c) should consider the imposition of trade sanctions." The resolution is worded in such a way that does not make trade sanctions contingent either on multilateral support for these measures or on other measures to be implemented in concert with trade sanctions despite arguments to the contrary.

Not only did Nicaragua not address the concerns described in the Hamilton-Barnes resolution, the Sandinistas publicly flaunted their disdain for that conciliatory effort. The most obvious slap in the face was President Ortega's visit to Moscow where new ties between Nicaragua and the Soviet Union were announced by Tass. Other developments revealed in the past week are equally disturbing:

Capture of seven agents of the Nicaraguan State Security Service in Honduras who admitted they were there to help Honduran guerrillas;

A Costa Rican combat group, organized by an extreme left-wing group with close ties to Nicaragua, preparing for possible military operations in Costa Rica;

Delivery two weeks ago by the Soviet Union of additional MI-8/17 helicopters;

Delivery two weeks ago by East Germany of a large shipment of military transportation equipment;

Rejection by Nicaraguan leaders of any possible church-mediated dialogue with the democratic opposition of Nicaragua; and Break-up of the May Day march by independent labor unions in Nicaragua.

Whatever questions you may raise about the process of imposing sanctions, and whether there was adequate consultation, there can be no mistaking the fact that the message sent from Congress to the administration was that trade sanctions should be considered. Well, the administration considered them, and agreed to impose them. Calling these hearings to bash the President once more on his policy toward Nicaragua must be seen as a purely political exercise.●

A TRIBUTE TO VICTORIA SOKOLOFF

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. DioGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise before the House today to present tribute to Victoria Sokoloff, for many years a resident of the city of Mount Vernon, NY, in my congressional district.

Victoria, who recently left us, had a life epitomizing the spirit of volunteerism so much a part of the American tradition.

Even in death, Victoria has the ability to humble those of us who knew her personally, or knew her through years of dedication as a veteran's hospital volunteer.

Her life was spotlighted on the occasion of her 80th birthday, just prior to her death. She was asked how, at her age, she could manage an active career as a veteran's hospital volunteer. In response, she said, "My dear, that has been my life."

Victoria's involvement in veteran's affairs started at age 17. At that tender age, she watched her brother, as well as other young men, march off to war in Europe, to risk, and often, to give, their lives in defense of the cause of freedom that we all share.

The need to give of herself to help those who gave so much of themselves for the cause, led her to start a career of more than 60 years of service to those who served America so admirably.

Victoria was assertive, without being aggressive; powerful, without being overpowering; small in stature, but bigger than life. Her need to become involved, to give something back to the veteran who had given so much to America, became the cause that dominated her life.

In the absence of the salute that we give our departed veterans, let us hail her memory. Victoria's record of service to hospitalized veterans is truly magnificent. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

LESSONS FROM VIETNAM

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, journalist and Vietnam veteran Al Santoli, author of "Everything We Had" and "To Bear Any Burden" shared some of his insights on the Vietnam experience and lessons that the United States should learn from our involvement there in a May 1, 1985, interview in the Washington Times and in a recent guest column in USA Today, I have found value in them and would like to share them with you.

CONG STRATEGY SET UP KILLINGS OF CIVILIANS

(Journalist Al Santoli discussed his book, "To Bear any Burden," with Lou Marano of The Washington Times. The book is an oral history of the Vietnam War and its aftermath in the words of Americans and Southeast Asians.)

Q: You were sergeant in an Army infantry unit, and then you worked in a very special kind of unit. Tell us about both?

A: I think my experience in the regular infantry before and after [the 1968] Tet [Offensive] probably wasn't very different from that of many other infantrymen. We were involved in a fair amount of fighting. Some of it was in the jungle along the Cambodian border, some was in the rice paddies and some of it was in towns.

Q: What unit were you in?

A: The 25th Division, just northwest of Saigon. The thing that was the most upsetting, and upset me even more after I got home is that when we did have to fight in town and around civilians, it was because the North Vietnamese or the Viet Cong—there weren't a whole lot of Viet Cong left at that time, because we had pretty much wiped them out during Tet—had chosen to use villages as battlegrounds.

They used civilians as shields in a very brutral and cowardly way, which created chaos and confusion. They also did it for propaganda reasons. By forcing Americans to hurt civilians or do damage, we then looked like the bad guys internationally. They could also tell the people, "Look, the Americans have come here to hurt you, and destroy your homes."

It was a very smart move on their part, and unfortunately our people fell for it—our people being the media, the politicians and international opinion in the Western democracies. Instead of condemning the people who chose to create chaos in civilian populations, we were the ones who were condemned.

If you look at what's happened after 1975, not only the ultimate tragedy in Cambodia but also the quiet strangulation of Vietnamese society and culture, they're still operating in the same kind of brutal and tyrannical way.

Q: Some former Viet Cong in your book attest to this, don't they?

A: Yes, two or three, and one former ARVN [Army of the Republic of Vietnam]. They talk of the communist plan to hide among the people like trees in the forest. They were training children. One of the people in "To Bear Any Burden," Troung Mealy, was recruited and trained to be a Viet Cong agent when he was 10 years old.

Kids were trained to be terrorists to throw hand grenades or to become human bombs. The communists were very explicit about the fact that they did this because they know what effect it would have on the GIs who would have to kill the kids. They knew the psychology of Americans. They could see how GIs liked to make a fuss over the Vietnamese children and give them candy, etc.

[Gen.] Lu Mong Lan, another person in the book, has been in the Viet Minh against the French and then later fought for South Vietnam against the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong. He says that this was a tactic used to disorient visiting soldiers and to create negative propaganda, both for internal and international reasons.

During the '68 Tet Offensive, there never was an uprising. As one of the Vietnamese in the book says, when the communists attacked, the people got angry. It was during their holiday, and a two-week truce had been called. What a brutal and cowardly act that was. Why didn't our media report that?

When Eddie Adams took the picture of the police chief shooting the Viet Cong, Eddie didn't know that the Viet Cong had just killed the police chief's best friend, his wife and their six children.

A: That particular individual man. Instead that terrorist murderer became a martyr and a saint according to the anti-war opposition. And that picture changed the minds of many people who had supported the war, causing them to think. "What a horrible thing we're involved in." It was completely the opposite. Those were the kind of frustrations those of us who served in Vietnam and really knew what was going on had to face.

Q: I remember when Gen. Westmoreland criticized the Viet Cong for attacking during Tet, he was mocked by some Americans who called attention to the fact that Gen. Washington attacked the Hessians at Trenton at Christmas of 1776.

A: Gen. Washington attacked an army. The North Vietnamese and Viet Cong attacked civilian populations. They massacred more than 3,000 people at Hue—buried people alive. This is something Hilter would have done and they became viewed as agrarian-reform liberators.

The ultimate mockery was that so many people here in the anti-war movement believed the Viet Cong were going to give people private ownership of land that there was going to be all these great reforms. One, of the people in the book, Mrs. Le Thi Anh, who was in the anti-war movement here in the United States returned to Vietnam and saw that the country was much better off in 1971-72 than she ever remembered it. What the communists did [after 1975] was to expropriate the peasants' land our Land-to-the-Tiller program had underwritten Our program had promoted decentralization and local autonomy.

Vietnam was much better off in the early '70s than it's ever been since. Instead of giving the people land and helping them to develop themselves, the economy and their way of life, the communists have collectivized the land. Some of the problems they've had with agriculture and industry in Vietnam has come from passive resistance.

I've talked to hundreds and hundreds of boat people, and the one thing that's unanimous is that they said: "We had no hope. We fled knowing that we might die at sea. * * * But we had to try, because there was no future in our country."

And then people say we shouldn't take any more refugees because they're economic migrants. In a Marxist-Leninist system you cannot separate the economics from the politics. If anybody goes against the political economy of Leninism, they're persecuted. So they are political refugees, and people using this argument are trying to make us forget that an average of 2,000 people a month per country are still escaping from Vietnam, from Laos and from Cambodia. Ten years later the situation is still getting worse.

When I lived out in the villages with a small unit—half American, half Vietnamese—we knew the people didn't want to be communists. They didn't want war, but they also didn't want to be communists.

And it was very apparent that they didn't want to be overseen by the Northerners. Of course, they would get angry at the Americans if we did something stupid or insensitive. But, by the same token, they did not turn against us at Tet, when they had a good chance to strike out at us. And people ran from the communists in 1975, they didn't greet them.

"To Bear Any Burden" points out that there were many American mistakes made on all levels. But between the years 1965—when the Americans first landed—until 1972, we had basically won the war, and now the Viet Cong admit it.

Then, when the Americans pulled out, and there was a possibility of success, Henry Kissinger negotiated an agreement that allowed 145,000 North Vietnamese troops to remain on the Vietnam Cambodia border. The communists had the ability to proselytize in South Vietnamese government areas, but the South Vietnamese did not have the right to give their point of view in the communist areas or in North Vietnam.

We tried to play by the Marquis of Queensbury rules, but for the communists, it was a total war. It was a war of terrorism.* * * As Mr. Troung Nhu Tang, the former Viet Cong justice minister confirms, they had a specific department whose job was to work with international opinion to drive it against the Americans.

Q. Do you think the war could have been won?

A. The war could have ended successfully in '68-'69 after Tet. Our South Vietnamese allies were successful in '72-'73. After the Easter offensive, the North Vietnamese were beaten.

There's a new book out called "The Tunnels of Cu Chi," in which former Viet Cong admit they could not stay in South Vietnam after 1970 because they were beaten. They could not go into the villages because of the Cords program [Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development, a pacification program stressing self-help and local autonomy]. So the combination of American military efforts which was, in fact, effective, with the land reform programs and the economic development we were doing, which did give people a better life, we basically had achieved a very great success.

But there was one great problem, the myth that Laos and Cambodia were neutral countries. After Tet, Westmoreland asked for 206,000 more troops to cut the Ho Chi Minh trail. That would have won the war. Westmoreland was condemned as a warmonger, but it was the people who opposed him who prolonged it.

Q: What did you mean when you wrote, "the ill-conceived military tactics and callous irresponsibility in some of our senior officers cause needless American and Vietnamese casualties"?

A: Tactics such as certain search and destroy operations. We should have worked with small units going into an area to locate the enemy, having good reconnaissance people, good special operatives that knew how to pinpoint the enemy. Then bring in your air strikes or artillery or whatever, use the infantry to clean up. Chuck Allen [a Special Forces adviser] talks about this in the book.

The enemy could choose to fight or not to fight according o their estimation of how U.S. casualty levels would affect American domestic politics. Because they could jump back and forth across the Cambodian or Laotian borders, they could pick and choose the time they wanted to fight. It was callous and irresponsible for the American command to follow this unmilitary pattern year after year.

It also turned the American people against the war. At Hamburger Hill and elsewhere, Americans had to fight more than one battle at the same spot, taking heavy casualties each time. Hamburger Hill became kind of a metaphor for the "futility" of the war, but if Westmoreland had been allowed to cut the Ho Chi Minh trail, it would have been a completely different picture.

Q: Your first book, "Everything We Had," was an oral history of servicemen who had served in Vietnam. What made you decide to write "To Bear Any Burden?"

A: I felt that too much attention was being given what to I feel is oversentimentality about the American soldier. Let's all feel sorry for the American veterans. They were foolish people who didn't know they were being used for an unjust cause.

Although the war ended in a way that makes me very sad. I very much believe in why I was there. I lived and bled with those people, and for a very short time, I shared their aspirations for peace and freedom, which they don't have now. I felt the best way of getting that across was by letting some of them speak as well as Americans.

I don't like it when people say, "Separate the warrior from the war. Feel sorry for the veterans but detest the cause." My feeling is, don't separate me from the war; I was very much a part of it.

VETS KNOW WHAT FREEDOM MEANS

(By Al Santoli, guest columnist)

NEW YORK.—I returned from Vietnam in March 1969.

As a 19-year/old infantry sergeant, I had seen substantial combat in jungles and rice paddies on the Cambodian border.

I had witnessed the terror that North Vietnamese and Viet Cong forces had imposed on innocent villagers.

By living and working with South Vietnamese farmers and soliders, I understood their desire to be free of war and tyranny of any political color.

I had lost friends, both U.S. and Vietnamese, whose courage will always live within me.

I was committed to give my life to help bring freedom to the Vietnamese. But, like many soldiers, I became confused and angered by the political decisions not to let us end the war by driving the North Vietnamese army, that we had defeated during Tet, out of its sanctuaries in Cambodia. We were stunned when President Johnson stopped the bombing of their supply lines, which created more U.S. casualties.

The feeling of betrayal by our leaders numbed me. But to come home to a popular antiwar movement that, in part, advocated victory by Ho Chi Minh's communist forces, nearly destroyed me.

My whole world was turned upside down. For 10 years I tried carrying on with my life, trying not to think about Vietnam. But it was always there, in dreams, in sounds I would hear on the street, and in the faces of lost friends who I could not help but remember.

In 1978, I began interviewing hundreds of fellow veterans and Southeast Asian refugees for what have become two oral histories of the war. I have found that Vietnam was many different wars, depending where one was stationed and the time of one's involvement.

But there is a shared sense of strength: We survived both the war and the difficult homecoming. And we have become more caring people because of our survival.

Rather than a liability, most Vietnam veterans and Southeast Asia refugees are proving to be valuable contributors to our communities. We have paid a high price to partake in the freedom and opportunities that our country has to offer. And we appreciate the blessing of liberty that many people take for granted.

The legacy of the Vietnam war—the Soviet warships now based in Cam Rahn Bay, the reeducation camps and boat people of Vietnam, the slaughter of Pmong and other hill tribes in Laos, the ongoing war and holocaust in Cambodia—remind us of the reasons for our veterans' sacrifices as today the struggle for freedom continues in Southeast Asia and other parts of the world.●

CONFLICTS OF INTEREST IN DEFENSE PROCUREMENT

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, Congressman NICHOLS and I have introduced H.R. 2356, which follows these brief remarks. This legislation addresses the "revolving door" situation in which Federal employees and some military have handled contract matters across the table from contractors, by whom they are shortly thereafter employed. The cosponsorship of all Members of the House will be welcomed.

H.R. 2356

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Department of Defense Conflict of Interest Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST IN DEFENSE PROCUREMENT.

(a) LIMITATIONS ON FORMER ACQUISITION OFFICERS.—(1) An individual who is a former officer or employee of the Department of Defense or former retired member of the uniformed services who, during the two years preceding the individual's separation from Government service, had significant responsibilities for a procurement function with respect to a Government contractor may not accept compensation from that contractor for a period of two years following the individual's separation from Government service.

(2) Whoever knowingly violates paragraph (1) shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both

(3) Whoever knowingly offers, tenders, or grants any compensation to any individual in violation of paragraph (1) shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

(b) LIMITATIONS ON CONTRACTORS.—(1) Each contract for procurement of goods or services entered into by the Department of Defense shall include a provision under which the contractor agrees not to provide compensation, during the period described in paragraph (2), to an individual who is a former officer or employee of the Department of Defense or a former or retired member of the uniformed services who, during the two-year period preceding the individual's separation from Government service, had significant responsibilities for a procurement function with respect to that contractor.

(2) The period referred to in paragraph (1) is the two-year period beginning on the last day of the individual's employment with the Department of Defense or two years following the individual's retirement from the uniformed services.

(3) A contractor who knowingly violates a contract provision required by paragraph (1) shall forfeit to the United States, as liquidated damages under the contract, an amount equal to the greater of $100,000 or three times the compensation paid by the contractor to the individual in violation of such contract provision.

(c) REPORTS.—(1)(A) Each contractor subject to a contract term described in subsection (b) shall issue an annual report listing the name of each individual (together with other information adequate for the Government to identify the individual) who is a former Government officer or employee, or a former or retired member of the uniformed services who—

(i) had significant responsibilities for a procurement function;

(ii) left Government service within the previous two years; and

(iii) was compensated by that contractor after leaving Government service.

(B) Each such listing shall—

(i) show the agency by which the individual was last employed or on active duty;

(ii) show the individual's job titles; and

(iii) contain a full and complete description of the duties of the individual during the last two years of his employment and a description of the duties that the individual is performing on behalf of the contractor.

(C) A copy of each such report shall be sent to the Inspector General of the Department of Defense.

(2) The Inspector General of the Department of Defense shall review each report under paragraph (1) to assess the report for accuracy and completeness and for the purpose of identifying possible violations of subsection (a) or (b) or paragraph (1). The Inspector General shall report any such possible violations to the Attorney General for prosecution.

(3) Whoever fails to file a report required by paragraph (1) shall be liable to the United States in the amount of $10,000.

(d) REVIEW BY DIRECTOR OF OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS.—The Director of the Office of Government Ethics shall have access to the reports submitted under subsection (c)(1) and shall conduct an annual random survey of the reports to check for violations of subsections (a), (b), and (c)(1). The Director shall submit an annual report to Congress on the operation of this section, including the findings of the Director under such reports.

(e) EXCLUSION.—This section does not apply to a contract for an amount less than $100,000.

(f) COVERED PROCUREMENT FUNCTIONS.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense—

(1) shall delineate the procurement functions covered by this section consistent with the definition provided; and

(2) shall provide a list of such functions to Congress.

(g) ADVISORY OPINIONS FROM OFFICE OF GOVERNMENT ETHICS.—(1) An individual who is offered compensation that might place the individual in violation of subsection (a) may, before acceptance of such compensation, apply to the Director of the Office of Government Ethics for advice on the applicability of this section to such compensation. Any such application shall be made jointly by the individual and the contractor who proposes to provide the compensation.

(2) An application under paragraph (1) shall contain—

(A) a full and complete description of the duties of the applicant during the last two years of his service in the Government;

(B) any official responsibility the applicant exercised with regard to any procurement contract in which an interest is or was retained by the contractor who proposes to provide such compensation; and

(C) a description by contractor of any prospective services that the applicant will perform on behalf of the contractor.

(3) Promptly upon receipt of an application under paragraph (1), the Director of the Office of Government Ethics shall publish notice of the application in the Federal Register.

(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section:

(1) The term "compensation" includes any payment, gift, benefit, reward, favor, gratuity, or employment valued in excess of $100 at prevailing market price, provided directly, indirectly, or through a third party.

(2) The term "contractor" means any person, partnership, corporation, or agency thereof (other than the Federal Government, the independent agencies thereof, or the District of Columbia) that offers, negotiates, agrees, or otherwise contracts to supply the Federal Government with goods, services, or supplies. Such term includes any parent, subsidiary, or affiliate thereof.

(3) The term "procurement function", with respect to a contract, means any acquisition action relating to the contract, including negotiating, awarding, administering, approving contract changes, costs analysis, quality assurance, operation and developmental testing, technical advice or recommendation, approval of payment, contractor selection, budgeting, auditing under the contract, or management of the procurement program.

(i) SEPARATION OF MEMBERS OF UNIFORMED SERVICES.—A member of former member of the uniformed services shall be considered to have been separated from Government service upon such member's discharge or release from active duty.

(j) TRANSITION.—This section does not—

(1) preclude the continuation of employment that began before the effective date of this section or the receipt of compensation for such employment; or

(2) apply to any officer or employee whose service with the Department of Defense terminated before the effective date of this section.

(k) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This section shall take effect on January 1, 1986.●

THE TRUE NATURE OF THE "FREEDOM FIGHTERS"

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post carries on its front page today a devastating article, based on an interview with a Contra field commander who has just returned to Nicaragua under its offer of amnesty without reprisals to the Contras.

I urge my colleagues to read the words of the former National Guard sergeant, who rose in the Contras to the rank of task force commander, but left in disgust over the refusal of the former Guard officers at the top of the military command to halt the murder, kidnaping, and rape of civilians as a routine Contra strategy.

I urge my colleagues to reexamine the FDN's claim that the military command is not dominated by former Guards. The FDN provided its own list of military commanders and their background to some Members of Congress during the recent debate: This Contra leader was described on that list as a former peasant, with no prior Guard service, yet he admits to having been a sergeant. In addition, that list conspicuously excluded the General Staff of the FDN, which even the State Department now admits is 90 percent former National Guards.

As we move toward consideration of foreign aid for El Salvador and Honduras, read what this former Contra leader says about the massive diversion of military equipment from those Governments to the Contras. Congress has banned aid to the Contras, but they're getting it anyway.

This article shows that more than ever the Contras are the wrong horse to ride in Central America. Let's stay off that horse, for good.

A DEFECTING NICARAGUAN CONTRA'S TALE

FORMER FIELD COMMANDER CHARGES WIDESPREAD ABUSES

(By Robert J. McCartney)

MEXICO CITY, May 7.—Ever since 1980, when he was among the first Nicaraguans to join the anti-Sandinista resistance, Jose Efren Martinez Mondragon had appeared to follow the typical career of the dedicated contra, or counterrevolutionary, guerrilla leader.

Formerly a sergeant in the National Guard of deposed dictator Anastasio Somoza, Martinez Mondragon worked his way up in the resistance movement from commander of a guerrilla training unit in Honduras to become a task force commander who regularly led missions inside Nicaragua. Just six months ago, he was commanding 180 contras on a patrol in Esteli province, deep inside territory normally controlled by the Sandinistas.

Today, however, Martinez Mondragon did something that no contra commander ever had done before: he flew home to Managua to be welcomed by his former foes as a defector. He will take advantage of a Nicaraguan amnesty law approved earlier this year that provides for a pardon for rebels who lay down their arms. Eight weeks ago, Martinez Mondragon and nine other persons, including two other guerrillas, sought political asylum in the Mexican Embassy in Tegucigalpa, Honduras. Initially the Honduran government refused to let him leave the country, although the others were permitted to depart for Nicaragua almost immediately, and his fate was uncertain until a week ago when the Honduran authorities finally let him fly to Mexico City.

The defection ended what Martinez Mondragon described as a prolonged personal ordeal of several years as he grappled with his own doubts about the guerrillas' cause and, even more, about their behavior in the field. In a four-hour interview here last night, he said he left the contras in disgust with what he said were their routine practices of murder, kidnaping and rape of Nicaraguan civilians.

"They are kidnaping and killing people who just want to work," the 26-year-old defector said. "This wasn't a struggle. It was banditry."

While there have been news reports of individual incidents of alleged killings and abductions by the contras of Nicaraguan civilians who were, or were believed to be, Sandinista synpathizers, Reagan administration officials in the past have denied the validity of claims that such practices were routine and characterized the claims as propaganda.

In another assertion that was likely to be controversial, Martinez Mondragon said that the Honduran, Salvadoran and Guatemalan armies have supplied the contras with the bulk of their ammunition and other military supplies since the CIA stopped funding them a year ago.

Spokesman in Miami and Honduras for the rebel group Martinez Mondragon belonged to were unavailable today for comment on his specific allegations.

Because of the severity of his charges and the unprecedented nature of his defection, Martinez Mondragon's change of heart could contribute to the political debate that extends from Managua to the U.S. Congress. The guerrillas previously have drawn criticism for human rights abuses from some unofficial U.S. monitoring groups. This has become a factor in the U.S. debate over whether Washington should resume financial backing for them.

Several former Sandinista leaders, such as Arturo Cruz and Eden Pastora, and many synpathizers of the Sandinistas have broken with Managua's government and are allied with the rebels. Martinez Mondragon, a middle-level contra field commander, is the first to go the other way.

The defection already has triggered a flurry of activity by several of the players involved, either to control the damage or maximize it.

The Nicaraguan Democratic Force, the largest of the rebel groups and the one to which Martinez Mondragon belonged, already has suggested that the defector had lost some of his mental faculties because of a motor vehicle accident. The force, known by its Spanish initials FDN, also has charged that Martinez Mondragon's lover was a Sandinista spy who may have encouraged the defection.

For its part, the Nicaraguan government wasted no time making the defector available to the media, presenting him both at the interview last night and at a news conference upon his arrival in Managua this morning.

In the interview, Martinez Mondragon alleged that the contras have regularly killed Nicaraguans who refused to join the rebel cause after crossing the border into Honduras or after being abducted and brought there by the guerrillas. He said that there were several clandestine cemeteries for such victims along the Nicaraguan-Honduran border, including one near a hamlet called San Judas in Honduras' Choluteca province, and another at La Lodoza in El Paraiso province.

"If you won't fight, then they think you are a [Sandinista] infiltrator and kill you," he said.

He said the armed forces of Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala currently are providing the FDN with the bulk of its ammunition, uniforms and boots. He said he had seen Honduran military trucks and helicopters deliver ammunition and other supplies to contra camps, and that he had learned from friends who handled the rebels' supplies that these three countries' armies were the principal source of materiel.

The FDN's base camps are inside Honduras just across the border from Nicaragua, and the defector said that Honduran Army officers control all deliveries of military supplies to the contras.

Since Congress stopped the CIA from funding the guerrillas a year ago, the source of the rebels' military supplies has been something of a mystery. The rebels say they have continued their fight with the aid of private donations, but several reports have surfaced that the Honduran, Salvadoran and Guatemalan governments were playing an important role.

Martinez Mondragon said that other contra commanders had told him that "the CIA advisers arranged for the Salvadoran, Guatemalan and Honduran armies to provide materiel" to the FDN. He did not say when the CIA supposedly had done this, however.

He said guerrillas frequently had raped civilian women in Nicaragua and abducted them for sexual use.

During a patrol in Nicaragua's Jinotega province last August, the defector said, he came across a group of 40 families near Wina who said that they had been abducted by another patrol from the San Jacinto regional command. This patrol had abducted and raped eight young women from the group, and had killed eight young men who refused to join the rebels, he said.

At that time, Martinez Mondragon said, he radioed FDN military leader Enrique Bermudez to complain about the treatment of the civilians. Bermudez told him "to stop interfering in business that does't affect you," the defector said. This was only one of several times that Martinez Mondragon complained to FDN leaders about abuses by the rebels and received unsatisfactory responses, he said.

The interview was conducted in a sitting room at the Nicaraguan ambassador's residence in Mexico City, but the defector said that he had not been pressured to grant the interview and had not been briefed beforehand by Sandinista officials, Nicaraguan Embassy officers wandered through the room from time to time during the talk, but their presence did not seem to affect Martinez Mondragon.

The defector acknowledged that he was seriously hurt in the vehicle accident, when he struck his head hard and was unconscious for a week. He spoke slowly, occasionally lost his train of thought and said that his head still hurt "deep inside" from time to time.

While the FDN has suggested that he cannot be trusted because of brain damage, the FDN did entrust him to command several missions inside Nicaragua after the accident had taken place.

Martinez Mondragon expressed fears that the FDN would take reprisals against his friends or family. He said he believed the FDN's leadership was responsible for the deaths of his brother and two of his cousins.●

CUBA, NICARAGUA ARE THE REAL DANGERS

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent commentary by John Norton Moore, professor of international law at the University of Virginia. Professor Moore puts into proper perspective what is at stake in Central America in terms of the rule of law. As Professor Moore correctly states:

> The real threat is the serious and sustained armed attack directed by Cuba and Nicaragua against El Salvador and neighboring states, in violation of the United Nations and the Organization of American States Charters.

Critics of U.S. policy in Central America have turned the issue on its head by falling into the Sandinista trap of claiming U.S. policy is aggression. We must not confuse defense with aggression. Moreover, it is essential that we carry out our commitments to "take effective action against aggressive use of force intended to deprive nations in this hemisphere of their right to self-determination," as Professor Moore states.

I urge my colleagues to give serious thought to Professor Moore's analysis, which originally appeared in the April 22 edition of the Los Angeles Times.

CUBA, NICARAGUA ARE THE REAL DANGERS

(By John Norton Moore)

A principal argument of those opposed to U.S. funding of the counterrevolutionaries in Nicaragua is that it would be illegal under accepted norms of international law. The rule of law is at stake in Central America. But the real threat is the serious and sustained armed attack directed by Cuba and Nicaragua against El Salvador and neighboring states, in violation of the United Nations and Organization of American States charters.

To focus on the issue of funding, rather than on the Cuban-Nicaraguan attack, is to accept the childhood plea, "It all started when he hit me back." More dangerously, it is to confuse the defense with aggression, and thus to undermine the single most important normative restraint against the use of force. Moreover, the goals of deterrence and stability are at risk if we ignore the commitment made repeatedly by our country; that we will take effective action against aggressive use of force intended to deprive nations in this hemisphere of their right to self-determination. This commitment is found in the Monroe Doctrine and the hemispheric Rio Defense Treaty, and in the congressional Cuban resolution of 1962 and the 1965 House resolution on communist subversion in the hemisphere.

Since seizing power in 1959, Fidel Castro has directed insurgencies against 17 Latin American nations. Until the attack against El Salvador, the most serious of these was a sustained insurgency against Venezuela, condemned in 1964 by the OAS. The success of the Sandinistas—with substantial Cuban support—two decades after Castro's takeover in Cuba provided new ideological fervor and opportunity for what is now a joint Cuban-Nicaraguan policy of "revolution without frontiers."

Both the bipartisan Kissinger Commission and the House Select Committee on Intelligence have concluded that Cuba and Nicaragua are engaged in efforts to overthrow the governments of neighboring states, particularly El Salvador. These efforts include meetings held in Cuba in December, 1979, and May, 1980, to forge a united Salvadoran insurgency under Cuban and Nicaraguan influence and assistance, including arms supply, training, financing, command and control, and political and technical support.

The resulting insurgency now fields well-trained armed forces one-fifth the size of the Salvadoran army, and operates 67 offices in 35 countries in political support of the continuing attack. As defectors' reports and weapon serial numbers demonstrate, the preponderance of the insurgents' weapons continues to be supplied externally. In fact, they had American M-16 rifles and M-60 machine guns (from stocks in Vietnam and Ethiopia) even before the Salvadoran army had those weapons.

Congress itself found, in the Intelligence Authorization Act of 1983, that the "actions of the government of Cuba and Nicaragua threaten the independence of El Salvador and threaten to destabilize the entire Central America region, and the governments of Cuba and Nicaragua refuse to cease those activities.

These Cuban-Nicaraguan activities violate the United Nations Charter, the Charter of the Organization of American States, the Rio Defense Treaty, the United Nations definition of aggression, the 1965 U.N. General Assembly declaration on intervention, the 1970 General Assembly "friendly relations" declaration, the 1972 basic principles agreement, the 1975 Helsinki principles and even the Soviet draft definition of aggression.

This pattern of ongoing aggression constitutes an armed attack justifying the use of force in collective defense under Article 51 of the U.N. Charter and Article 3 of the Rio Treaty. Indeed, Article 27 of the OAS Charter declares that such an attack is "an act of aggression against . . . (all) the American states," and Article 3 of the Rio Treaty creates a legal obligation on the United States to assist in meeting the armed attack. This obligation is parallel to that owed by the United States to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (under Article 5 of the NATO Treaty) in the event of an attack on a NATO member.

A response in defense may lawfully be overt, covert or both, as has been the case in virtually every conflict in which America has fought in this century. In World War II no one suggested that Allied support for partisan forces or covert operations in Germany were illegal in responding to Axis aggression.

Certainly responses in defense must be proportional. But how is it disproportionate for the United States to respond against a covert Cuban-Nicaraguan armed attack aimed at overthrowing the democratically elected government of El Salvador by not ruling out that same objective against a totalitarian Sandinista military junta?

One of the most serious contemporary threats to world order is the aggressive covert political-military attack by an externally instigated and supported guerrilla insurgency. Such an attack from Cuba and Nicaragua is the world threat in Central America. Congress must decide whether it meant what it said in the 1962 Cuban resolution, when it pledged "that the United States is determined to prevent by whatever means may be necessary, including the use of arms, the Marxist-Leninist regime in Cuba from extending, by force or the threat of force, its aggressive or subversive activities to any part of this hemisphere."

He has served as counsel to the United States in the Nicaragua case before the International Court of Justice. The views expressed are his own.) ●

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE CAPITAL PUNISHMENT FOR FEDERAL PRISONERS WHO COMMIT MURDER WHILE ALREADY SERVING A LIFE SENTENCE

HON. THOMAS E. PETRI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, the people of Wisconsin were shocked last year by the brutal and senseless murder of a prison guard at the Oxford, WI, Federal correctional facility. Sadly, the question we must ask about the killing is not "Why did it happen?" but rather "How is it that it hasn't happened more often?"

Prison guards are vulnerable victims in a jail. They must walk unarmed among the prisoners in our overcrowded correctional facilities for fear that a pistol or a shotgun could be taken from them in the course of an escape attempt or prison protest. For the same reason, guards are often locked in the cellblocks without a key while performing their duties.

Unlike the guards, however, some of the prisoners are armed, having secretly fashioned homemade knives which they keep hidden, and sometimes even having access to firearms surreptitiously brought into the prison.

What deterrence is there for prisoners already in jail for life not to kill prison guards, or for that matter, other prisoners? I have always opposed the death penalty except in the most extreme of cases. Unfortunately, this has to be of one of those cases. This is why yesterday I reintroduced legislation providing capital punishment for Federal prisoners serving life sentences who commit first-degree murder.

My bill, H.R. 2398, addresses the deterrence need while providing careful safeguards to ensure its fair application. It sets out specific guidelines for courts and juries to follow, outlining what particular factors should be considered in determining the appropriateness of the penalty to the given case and spelling out procedural rules designed to protect the defendant's constitutional rights. In substance and form, the bill addresses the concerns for fairness and clarity which the courts have expressed in reviewing death penalty laws.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill can help protect our prison guards and the whole Federal prison population and submit it here in its totality for the record.

H.R. 2398

A bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to provide capital punishment for first degree murders committed by prisoners serving a life sentence

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CHAPTER 51 AMENDMENT.

Chapter 51 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"§ 1118. Murder by Federal prisoners

"(a) OFFENSE.—Whoever, while confined in a Federal correctional institution under sentence for a term of life imprisonment, commits first degree murder (as defined in section 1111 of this title) shall be punished by death or by life imprisonment without the possibility of parole.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of subsection (a)—

"(1) the term 'Federal correctional institution' means any Federal prison, Federal correctional facility, Federal community program center, or Federal halfway house; and

"(2) the term 'term of life imprisonment' means a sentence for the term of natural life, a sentence commuted to natural life, an indeterminate term of a minimum of at least fifteen years and a maximum of life, or an unexecuted sentence of death.

"(c) HEARING REQUIRED.—A person shall be subjected to the penalty of death under this section only if a hearing is held in accordance with this section.

"(d) NOTICE BY GOVERNMENT.—(1) Whenever the Government intends to seek the death penalty under this section, the attorney for the Government, a reasonable time before trial or acceptance by the court of a plea of guilty, shall sign and file with the court, and serve upon the defendant, a notice—

"(A) indicating that the Government in the event of conviction will seek the sentence of death; and

"(B) setting forth the aggravating factors which the Government will seek to prove as the basis for the death penalty.

"(2) The court may permit the attorney for the Government to amend such notice for good cause shown.

"(e) SENTENCING HEARING.—(1) When the attorney for the Government has filed a notice under subsection (d) of this section and the defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to an offense under this section, the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered, or any other judge if the judge who presided at the trial or before whom the guilty plea was entered is unavailable, shall conduct a separate sentencing hearing to determine the punishment to be imposed.

"(2) The hearing shall be conducted—

"(A) before the jury which determined the defendant's guilt;

"(B) before a jury impaneled for the purpose of the hearing if—

"(i) the defendant was convicted upon a plea of guilty;

"(ii) the defendant was convicted after a trial before the court sitting without a jury;

"(iii) the jury which determined the defendant's guilt has been discharged for good cause; or

"(iv) after initial imposition of a sentence under this section, redetermination of the sentence under this section is necessary; or

"(C) before the court alone, upon the motion of the defendant and with the consent of the Government.

"(3) A jury impaneled pursuant to paragraph (2)(B) shall consist of 12 members, unless, at any time before the conclusion of the hearing, the parties stipulate with the approval of the court that it shall consist of any number less than 12.

"(f) INFORMATION WHICH MAY BE PRESENTED.—(1) Notwithstanding the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or any other provision of law, if a defendant is found guilty of or pleads guilty to an offense under this section, no presentence report shall be prepared.

"(2) In the sentencing hearing, information may be presented as to any matter relevant to the sentence and shall include matters relating to any of the mitigating or aggravating factors set forth in subsection (i) or (j) or any other mitigating factor.

"(3) In such hearing, information presented may include the trial transcript and exhibits if the hearing is held before a jury or judge not present during the trial.

"(4) Any other information relevant to such mitigating or aggravating factors may be presented in such hearing by either the Government or the defendant, regardless of its admissibility under the rules governing admission of evidence at criminal trials, except that information may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury.

"(5) The Government and the defendant shall be permitted to rebut any information received at the hearing and shall be given fair opportunity to present argument as to the adequacy of the information to establish the existence of any of the aggravating or mitigating factors, and as to the appropriateness in that case of imposing a sentence of death. The Government shall open the argument. The defendant shall be permitted to reply. The Government shall then be permitted to reply in rebuttal.

"(6) The burden of establishing the existence of any aggravating factor is on the Government, and is not satisfied unless such existence is established beyond a reasonable doubt. The burden of establishing the existence of any mitigating factor is on the defendant, and is not satisfied unless such existence is established by a preponderance of the information.

"(g) SPECIAL FINDINGS.—(1) The jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall consider all the information received during the hearing. It shall return special findings identifying any mitigating factors, whether or not set forth in subsection (i), and any aggravating factors set forth in subsection (j) of this section found to exist.

"(2) If—

"(A) an aggravating factor set forth in subsection (j)(1) is not found to exist; or

"(B) an aggravating factor set forth in subsection (j)(1) is found to exist but no other aggravating factor set forth in subsection (j) is found to exist; the court shall impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law.

"(3)(A) If an aggravating factor set forth in subsection (j)(1) and one or more of the other aggravating factors set forth in subsection (j) are found to exist, the jury, or if there is no jury, the court, shall then consider whether the aggravating factors found to exist sufficiently outweigh any mitigating factor or factors found to exist, or in the absence of mitigating factors, whether the aggravating factors are themselves sufficient to justify a sentence of death.

"(B) Based upon this consideration, the jury by unanimous vote, or if there is no jury, the court, shall return a finding as to whether a sentence of death is justified.

"(h) IMPOSITION OF SENTENCE.—Upon such a finding that a sentence of death is justified, the court shall sentence the defendant to death. Otherwise the court shall impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law.

"(i) MITIGATING FACTORS.—In determining whether a sentence of death is to be imposed on a defendant, the following mitigating factors shall be considered but are not exclusive:

"(1) The defendant was less than 18 years of age at the time of the crime.

"(2) The defendant's capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense to the charge.

"(3) The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such duress as constitutes a defense to the charge.

"(4) The defendant is punishable as a principal (as defined in section 2(a) of this title) in the offense, which was committed by another, but the defendant's participation was relatively minor, although not so minor as to constitute a defense to the charge.

"(5) The defendant could not reasonably have foreseen that the defendant's conduct in the course of the commission of murder, or other offense resulting in death for which the defendant was convicted, would cause, or would create a grave risk of causing, death to any person.

"(j) AGGRAVATING FACTORS.—The following aggravating factors shall be considered:

"(1) The defendant—

"(A) intentionally killed the victim;

"(B) intentionally inflicted serious bodily injury which resulted in the death of the victim; or

"(C) intentionally participated in an act which he knew or reasonably should have known would create a grave risk of death to a person, other than one of the participants in the offense, and the victim did die as a direct result of the act.

"(2) The defendant committed the offense during the course of seizing, confining, inveigling, decoying, kidnaping, abducting, carrying away, holding hostage, or holding for ransom or otherwise, any person.

"(3) The defendant committed the offense during the course of perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate a sexual assault on any person.

"(4) The defendant committed the offense during the course of, on account of, or as a result of, any transaction concerning or distribution of any controlled substance as set forth in schedule I, II, III, IV, or V in the Controlled Substances Act.

"(5) The defendant committed the offense while armed with, or having readily available, a firearm, as defined in section 921 of this title.

"(6) The death or injury resulting in death occurred during the commission or attempted commission of, or during the immediate flight from the commission or attempted commission of, an offense under section 751 (prisoners in custody of institution or officer), section 844(f) (destruction of Government property by explosives), or section 1201 (kidnaping).

"(7) The defendant has been convicted of another Federal offense, or a State offense resulting in the death of a person, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or a sentence of death was authorized by law.

"(8) The defendant has previously been convicted of two or more State or Federal offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the infliction of, or attempted infliction of, serious bodily injury upon another person.

"(9) In the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to one or more persons in addition to the victim of the offense.

"(10) The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner.

"(11) The defendant procured the commission of the offense by payment, or promise of payment, of anything of pecuniary value.

"(12) The defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in the expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value.

"(13) The defendant committed the offense after substantial planning and premeditation to cause the death of a person.

"(14)(A) The defendant committed the offense against a Federal law-enforcement officer or an employee of a United States penal or correctional institution while such officer or employee was performing that officer's or employee's official duties or because of that officer's or employee's status as a public servant.

"(B) For the purpose of this paragraph, the term 'law-enforcement officer' means a public servant authorized by law or by a Government agency or Congress to conduct or engage in the prevention, investigation, or prosecution of an offense.

"(k) ANTIDISCRIMINATION INSTRUCTIONS.—In any hearing held before a jury under this section, the court shall instruct the jury that in its consideration of whether the sentence of death is justified it shall not consider the race, color, national origin, creed, sexual preference, or sex of defendant or of the victim or victims. The jury shall return to the court a certificate signed by each juror that consideration of race, color, national origin, creed, sexual preference, or sex of the defendant or of the victim or victims was not involved in reaching such juror's individual decision.

"(l) REVIEW.—(1) In any case in which the sentence of death is imposed under this section, the sentence of death shall be subject to review by the court of appeals upon appeal by the defendant, if the defendant files notice of such appeal within the time limits prescribed for notice of appeal of judgment in section 2107 of title 28.

"(2) On review of the sentence, the court of appeals shall consider the record, the evidence submitted during the trial, the information submitted during the sentencing hearing, the procedures employed in the sentencing hearing, and the special findings returned under this section.

"(3) The court shall affirm the sentence if it determines that—

"(A) the sentence of death was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor; and

"(B) the information supports the special finding of the existence of any aggravating factors, or the failure to find any mitigating factors as set forth or allowed in this section.

"(4) In all other cases the court shall remand the case for reconsideration under this section.

"(5) The court of appeals shall state in writing the reasons for its disposition of the review of the sentence.

"(m) IMPLEMENTATION OF SENTENCE.—(1) A person who has been sentenced to death pursuant to this section shall be committed to the custody of the Attorney General until exhaustion of the procedures for appeal of the judgment of conviction and for review of the sentence. When the sentence is to be implemented, the Attorney General shall release the person sentenced to death to the custody of a United States marshal, who shall supervise implementation of the sentence in the manner prescribed by the law of the State in which the sentence is imposed. If the law of such State does not provide for implementation of a sentence of death, the court shall designate another State, the law of which does so provide, and the sentence shall be implemented in the latter State in the manner prescribed by such law.

"(2) A sentence of death shall not be carried out upon a woman while she is pregnant.

"(3) A United States marshal charged with supervising the implementation of a sentence of death may use appropriate State or local facilities for the purpose, may use the services of an appropriate State or local official or of a person such an official employs for the purpose, and shall pay the costs thereof in an approved by the Attorney General.".

SEC. 2. CLERICAL AMENDMENT.

The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 51 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following:

"1118. Murder by Federal prisoners.".●

TRIBUTE TO MILTON EISENHOWER

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to a wonderful and talented educator, author, and adviser to eight Presidents: Milton Stover Eisenhower. Dr. Eisenhower died in Baltimore on May 2, 1985. He will be missed immensely. I believe that Mike Bowler of the Baltimore Sun best summarized the enormous accomplishments and contributions of Dr. Eisenhower:

MILTON EISENHOWER, ADVISER TO EIGHT PRESIDENTS, DIES

(By Mike Bowler)

Born in Abilene, KS, the last of six brothers, Dr. Eisenhower left an indelible mark as public servant and educator. He was an adviser to presidents from Calvin Coolidge to Richard M. Nixon and a trouble-shooter in labor disputes, foreign crises and other matters, foreign and domestic.

He was instrumental in shaping U.S. policy in Latin America in the 1950s and later helped lay the foundation for the Alliance for Progress, the vast Latin American economic and social development program of the Kennedy administration.

As the only man to lead the Johns Hopkins University twice, he tripled income and doubled endowment, raising faculty salaries to fourth-highest in the nation. He was known as a thoughtful, reasoned administrator who did not interfere in faculty affairs, and he became an expert on the U.S. presidency and the nomination process for presidential candidates.

In an active retirement, Dr. Eisenhower raised money to fight violence in America, led a drive for a six-year U.S. presidential term and continued a love affair with the Baltimore Orioles. At a Memorial Stadium party on his 75th birthday, the Orioles presented Dr. Eisenhower with a $1-a-year "contract" as a right-handed reliever and asked him to throw out the first ball.

He wrote two books, including "The President is Calling" in 1974. The book was a close-range assessment of the eight presidents he had come to know intimately and an evaluation of the Constitution and laws and traditions affecting the presidency.

A man of medium height, clear blue eyes, trim build, erect carriage and crisp, direct but amiable manner, he kept up an enormous range of activities in his professional and private life.

Close friends and admirers mourned the loss of Dr. Eisenhower. "He was a man of great good sense and great good humor who did great good in the world," said Stephen E. Ambrose, historian at the University of New Orleans and biographer of both Milton and Dwight D. Eisenhower. "He was one of the most intelligent men I ever met, and the kindest.

George S. Wills, a Baltimore public relations man who had known Dr. Eisenhower for 30 years, said, "One of his greatest contributions was providing a wonderful example of how to grow old. He displayed courage and grace under very difficult circumstances, particularly the last three years.

Steven Muller, president of Johns Hopkins, had served as provost under Dr. Eisenhower and then had succeeded him as head of the university. "Working with him and for him was one of the really great experiences in my life," Dr. Muller said. "He was a totally admirable person. He had a lively, very practical mind. He possessed a wealth of information . . . There wasn't a mean bone in his body.

"Whenever I felt I needed to talk, he was always ready to tell me what he thought, what he knew," said Dr. Muller. "Long before I came to this university, he had restored it to solvency, and he knew everything about it. But he never interfered, never tried to impose his will."

Maryland Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., one of a close group of friends who met regularly with Dr. Eisenhower to discuss world affairs, said, "He represented the epitome of citizenship. He knew a citizen's duty: be informed, be involved. As a result, his advice was always current and important."

Senator Paul S. Sarbanes of Maryland said Dr. Eisenhower's counsel "was especially sought by those of us who valued his wisdom."

Born in Abilene September 15, 1899, Milton Eisenhower was the youngest of six brothers: Arthur, banker in Kansas City, Mo.; Edgar, corporation lawyer in Tacoma, Wash.; Dwight, commander of Allied Forces in World War II and president from 1952 to 1960; Roy, pharmacist in Junction City, Kans., and Earl, electrical engineer and newspaper owner.

Majoring in journalism at Kansas State Agricultural College (now Kansas State University of Agriculture and Applied Science), he interrupted his studies for two years to earn expenses as city editor of the Abilene Daily Reflector. After having received his bachelor of science degree from the college, he joined its faculty as assistant professor of journalism, leaving in 1924 when appointed to the diplomatic service.

The next two years were spent as vice consul in Edinburgh, Scotland, and as a part-time graduate student at the University of Edinburgh.

Then Dr. Eisenhower moved from diplomacy to the Department of Agriculture, where he held a number of posts during the next 16 years, starting as assistant to the secretary and becoming director of information and coordinator of the land-use program.

The outbreak of World War II brought new responsibilities.

Appointed director of the War Relocation Authority by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Dr. Eisenhower supervised the Japanese evacuation camps in California but later criticized the authority for its work. "He ran [the camps] with as much fairness as was humanly possible," said Dr. Ambrose, his biographer.

Dr. Eisenhower's specialty on the international scene was Latin America, but he had missions in other nations during World War II, and he played a prominent role in the beginnings of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

In June, 1942, President Roosevelt named him associate director of war information, and in December, after the Allied invasion of North Africa led by his brother, he was sent to Algeria and Morocco. His mission was to resolve problems of refugee relief and relocation and to establish an organization for psychological warfare in Europe.

Next he began a new career, and for a quarter-century he was to serve three universities as president, beginning with Kansas State, in 1943. Seven years later he assumed the top position at Pennsylvania State University, and in 1956 he arrived in Baltimore to head Johns Hopkins.

In 1953—he was then president of Penn State—he made the first of several fact-finding tours to South America as President Eisenhower's special ambassador. During the period from 1953 to 1961, Dr Eisenhower helped reshape U.S. policy in Latin America. In 1963, he wrote a book about U.S.-Latin American relations, "The Wine is Bitter."

In the book, Dr. Eisenhower wrote in italics that "revolution in Latin America is inevitable. Only the form it takes is uncertain."

Dr. Ambrose said Dr. Eisenhower was "the real father of the Alliance for Progress, although Kennedy got the credit."

President Eisenhower used to say that Milton "was always the bright one in the family."

When a congressman expressed regret that Milton did not have an official post in the administration, the president replied, "If it weren't for his name, he would have a very high governmental position."

In fact, as noted by Neil A Grauer, a Baltimore author and a friend of Dr. Eisenhower who interviewed him last fall, Dwight's brother "was a savvy veteran of the capital's bureaucracy long before his brother came to Washington."

"He had deep affection for his brother," said Mr. Wills. "He probably had more quiet influence on Dwight than any of the more publicly known figures we know through the history books. Milton wasn't on the government payroll, but during the Eisenhower years he was usually at the White House on weekends."

Dr. Ambrose said Dr. Eisenhower strongly influenced his brother's presidency. "Ike trusted him completely and leaned on him heavily," he said. "Indeed, Ike could not have carried the terrible burden of eight years in the White House without Milton's support."

In 1967, believing that he was bringing his formal academic responsibilities to a close. Dr. Eisenhower retired from the Hopkins presidency—in his final commencement, the trustees announced they had named the new library on the Homewood campus in his honor—and promptly began another career, becoming a director of 13 corporations.

These included the Chessie System, insurance System, insurance companies, financial institutions in California and others in this country and in England. He also became a governor of the New York Stock Board of Trade.

Dr. Eisenhower served President Lyndon B. Johnson almost as extensively as he had his brother. He advised the president of the Dominican crisis and, after the assassinations of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Robert F. Kennedy, chaired the Presidential Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence.

"The commission may not have brought about sweeping changes," said Dr. Ambrose, "but all of its practical recommendations got done—things like updating police departments."

Dr. Eisenhower returned to Hopkins a second time as president in 1971 following the forced resignation of Lincoln Gordon. The resumption of his university duties did not leave him time to keep up with his directorships, and he resigned many of them.

As for his way of life in retirement the second time in 1972, Dr. Eisenhower described many interests.

"I like to swim. I paint watercolors, mostly landscapes. I read everything, all the way from novels to the most serious books. I keep up constantly with the monthly reports by economists like Walter Heller and Milton Friedman."

Dr. Eisenhower became cochairman of the National Committee for a Six-Year Presidential Term, a group of about 250 business and civil leaders and former government officials.

Thirty-three American and six foreign universities conferred honorary degrees on Dr. Eisenhower.

Dr. Eisenhower was married in 1927 to Helen Eakin, of Washington. Mrs. Eisenhower died at Penn State in 1954, and Dr. Eisenhower never remarried.

The Eisenhowers had a son, Milton, Jr., now director of a division of International Business Machines, and a daughter, Ruth Eisenhower Snider, a voluntary worker in numerous community activities and the wife of a Baltimore radiologist. She died last year. There are three grandsons and one granddaughter.●

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to pay tribute to the men and women who are the economic stability of our Nation. The efforts of the small business men and women are to be commended. There are many small businesses within my district. These small businesses provide consumers with reasonable prices and availability. Small businesses also improve the community's economic situation by providing job and investing back into the community.

In order to keep our communities stable, we must support small businesses. Low interest loans and Government aid programs should be maintained to encourage the growth of small businesses. By encouraging the growth of small businesses communities are improved, unemployment is reduced, and the Nation's economic situation is improved. To support the small business men and women of our Nation is to support the Nation.

Chairman PARREN MITCHELL is to be commended for designating the week of May 5 through May 11, 1985, as "Small Business Week." In his role as chairman of the Committee on Small Business, Chairman MITCHELL's efforts have provided thousands of otherwise unavailable business opportunities for small minority businesses throughout the United States.

Finally, I would like to commend the small and minority business entrepreneurs who are being honored here this week.●

POLISH AMERICAN CONGRESS PROTESTS PRESIDENT'S BITBURG VISIT

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, much has been said in recent days about the President's trip to the German military cemetery in Bitburg, West Germany. His decision to honor German war dead, in a spirit of "reconciliation" was sharply criticized by people of all faiths and political backgrounds.

This action, coming no more than 100 feet from the graves of some of Hitler's elite killing soldiers, the Waffen SS, caused enormous pain and suffering to survivors of the Nazi death camps, who have seen firsthand the brutal murders perpetrated by these troops.

In addition to the 6 million Jews who were murdered in death camps, other populations also suffered horrible losses, all of which can be blamed on the brutal Nazi war machine.

I would like to include in the record a telegram sent by the Polish American Congress to President Reagan concerning the anguish that Polish Americans felt because of the President's decision to honor German war dead.

Polish Americans regret your plans to honor the Nazi dead.

Nowhere else did the Hitlerites unleash the insane fury of their bestial rage and hatred as in Poland. They drenched Polish soil with the blood of innocent people.

We mourn the death of 6 million Polish citizens, most of whom were mercilessly butchered by the type of primitive barbarians who lie in the graves of the German cemetery you will visit. Their goal was to forever destroy everything Polish, be it Christian or Jewish. In the genocide of Europe's Jews, at least half were Poles.

Measured by numbers who died, Polish Jews and Polish Christians perished almost equally. Measured by percentage, Poland lost more of Her population to the Nazis than any other country.

As Christians, we feel compelled to forgive them. As their victims, we find it inconceivable to honor them.

MICHAEL PREISLER,
President, Polish American Congress, Downstate New York Division.●

SENATOR SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 6, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the late Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. I would like to thank the dean of the North Carolina delegation, Mr. BROYHILL, for arranging this special order and allowing us this opportunity to reflect on "Senator Sam" and his lifetime of public service.

Clearly the one single undertaking that most of my colleagues associate with Sam Ervin, was his work as chairman of the Senate Select Committee to Investigate Campaign Practices—or the "Watergate Committee." As a newly elected Member of Congress during that difficult and troubling time, I found Sam Ervin's unwavering dedication, to both the Constitution and the people it was written to serve, a pillar of reason upon which the foundation of trust in our political institutions and our leaders was reinforced. Indeed if Sam Ervin leaves us with a legacy, it was when he demonstrated, for the world to see, the strength and integrity of the democratic process as practiced through the Constitution of the United States.

Sam Ervin was born in Morganton, NC which he called home for his entire life. He completed his undergraduate work at the University of North Carolina. After serving in France during World War I and being decorated with the Distinguished Service Cross, the Silver Star, and two Purple Hearts, Sam Ervin attended Harvard Law School. Upon graduation in 1922, Ervin returned home to Morganton to begin a law practice. Sam Ervin began his political career in the North Carolina State Assembly where he served three terms. However, his first trip to Washington as an elected official, was when he filled the vacancy in the House of Representatives created when his brother died. Ervin served one term in the House before returning to North Carolina where he served on the State supreme court from 1948 to 1954. In 1954 Senator Ervin was elected to the U.S. Senate where he served ably and diligently for 20 years. Following his retirement in 1975 Senator Ervin returned to his hometown of Morganton, N.C. where he continued practicing "a little law" until his death on April 23.

I join my colleagues in extending our sympathies to Sam Ervin's wife of 61 years, Margaret Bruce Bell, his son, Sam J. Ervin III, and his two daughters, Leslie and Laura. May they find comfort from their loss in the fact that Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., will be remembered as one of the greatest statesman to have walked the Halls of Congress.●

SMALL BUSINESS FUELS ECONOMY

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, Small Business Week gives us an opportunity to reflect on the important contributions of small businesses to our country. Ninety-seven percent of all businesses in the United States are small, according to the definition of the Small Business Administration.

Small firms are the major driving force in job creation. A study by the SBA shows that the very smallest businesses—those employing up to 19 persons—led the way in generating new jobs during the 1976–82 period. They generated a higher percentage of jobs not only on a national basis, but also in every region of the country. In the New England Bureau of Census region, which includes my State of Maine, firms with up to 19 workers increased job totals 25.5 percent during those 6 years. In Maine, 89 percent of all businesses employ less than 20 persons.

According to the most recent annual report of the President, small businesses employ nearly 48 percent of the private nonfarm work force, contribute 42 percent of sales, and generate about 38 percent of the gross national product.

This week, I am proud to take part in honoring the creative and dedicated individuals who run our Nation's small businesses. America's entrepreneurial spirit is exemplified in the State small business persons of the year who are gathered in Washington to be recognized for their achievements.

The first boatbuilder to be named an SBA small business person of the year is 1985 Maine winner Roger D. Hewson, president of Sabre Yachts in South Casco. He started his company in 1971 with three employees and one model of a sailboat. Today, the company has 150 employees and six models marketed by dealers across the country.

Mr. Hewson and the other State winners give evidence of the many ways in which small businesses have fueled our economy. We, as a Congress, have a responsibility to help provide the best possible economic climate so that small businesses will have the opportunity to grow and keep "America at Work."●

SPEECH OF

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as the week of May 5–11, 1985, has been designated "National Small Business Week," I would like to take this opportunity to talk about the importance of small business to our economy.

It is the enterprising determination to work and prosper, embodied in more than 14 million small businesses, that provides the technology to keep our economy growing, the manufacturing and marketing skills to keep our Nation competitive, and the innovation to guide us into a better future. It is this enterprising genius that has helped small business create most of our new jobs and provide economic opportunities unsurpassed by any nation in the world.

Ninety-nine point seven percent of the 14.3 million nonfarm businesses in the United States are considered small businesses. Together, these firms provide 55 percent of all private sector jobs, furnish two out of three workers with their first job, create over half of all industrial innovations and inventions, and account for approximately 38 percent of the Gross National Product.

The President's March 1984 report to Congress on the "State of Small Business" drew attention to the role small business continues to play in creating jobs. According to the report, between 1980 and 1982, small businesses generated all of the 984,000 net new jobs in the United States. Small business produced 2,650,000 new jobs, more than offsetting the 1,664,000 jobs lost by larger businesses.

It is not an exaggeration to say that small business must prosper if the rest of the Nation is to succeed economically. We all benefit from the contribution of small businesses and those who create them.

I urge my colleagues to join me in saluting the small business men and women of our Nation during "National Small Business Week."●

THE FAIR SHARE MINIMUM TAX

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, we have all heard stories about profitable corporations and wealthy individuals who avoid paying their fair share of taxes. Because the Tax Code is riddled with so many loopholes, many wealthy individuals as well as corporations earning billions of dollars in profits pay no taxes and, to add insult to injury, receive rebates for taxes they paid in earlier years.

Is it unfair to insist that profitable corporations like General Dynamics and General Electric pay some taxes? And is it unfair to insist that millionaires pay the same tax rate as someone earning $18,200? We don't think so and we are proposing a bill to do something about it.

Because the rich are abusing the Tax Code, the burden on the middle class has been getting heavier and heavier. Consider these statistics: In 1960, income tax payments from corporations and the wealthiest 1.8 percent of individuals accounted for 43 percent of all Federal revenues. By 1983, taxes from these same sources were providing only 17 percent of Federal revenues.

Without decisive action, the United States faces deficits in excess of $200 billion for the rest of this decade. The President explains that we can no longer afford programs like student aid, family farm assistance, the Small Business Administration, and revenue sharing. But he fails to point out that what we really cannot afford is the billions of dollars of welfare funneled through the Tax Code to profitable businesses and wealthy individuals.

This corporate welfare and aid to the wealthy increases the deficit just like spending on defense or domestic programs, even though it never appears as a line item on the budget. At a time when we are told that we can no longer afford assistance for people who need it, we certainly should not spend billions of dollars on welfare for corporations and people who are much better off.

With this in mind, the Honorable MARTY RUSSO and I, along with 53 of our colleagues, are introducing a far tighter minimum tax on wealthy individuals and profitable corporations. The fair share minimum tax is based on a very simple proposition: Every individual and corporation earning at least $150,000 per year ought to pay taxes equal to at least 25 percent of their income. Since the middle class pays this much in taxes, it certainly is not asking too much to insist that corporations and the rich also pay the same amount.

Under the terms of this bill, taxpayers would pay either their current tax liability computed with all existing deductions, exclusions, credits, and adjustments or the alternative minimum tax, whichever is greater. This will ensure that wealthy taxpayers cannot use loopholes to avoid paying any taxes. With this proposal, they will not be able to pay less than the middle class.

The fair share minimum tax has at least four advantages:

It represents genuine tax reform. If Democrats are going to regain the political initiative, we need an approach to tax policy that strengthens the middle class. The fair share minimum tax fits this description.

It will be supported by the middle class. Most Democrats believe that the Mondale candidacy proves that even talking about tax increases is political suicide. But Mondale's plan would have raised taxes on families earning as little as $25,000. The fair share minimum tax is different. It totally exempts the middle class from paying more than it does now.

It doesn't lock in the regressive tax policies of the Reagan administration. Under the President's tax proposals, the corporate income tax has shrunk dramatically as a source of Federal revenues. In addition, with the rapid increase in Social Security taxes, the poor and the average income taxpayer have been bearing a heavier and heavier tax burden. This proposal won't undo all the damage that has been done to our progressive tax structure, but it is a dramatic step in the right direction.

It is a significant step toward tax reform, but it doesn't destroy any socially desirable tax preferences. This tax proposal will not repeal any progrowth tax incentives. Investors will still be able to use these tax incentives, they simply won't be able to avoid paying their fair share of taxes.

If this tax proposal were enacted, wealthy taxpayers, both individuals and corporations, would be able to use tax preferences to reduce their effective tax rate to 25 percent, but no lower. This is a lower effective tax rate than the Treasury proposal and the same rate proposed in Kemp-Kasten. It offers significant incentives for investment and growth. It cuts tax rates virtually in half, from 50 percent for individuals and 46 percent for corporations, to 25 percent for all wealthy taxpayers. But at the same time, it guarantees that profitable corporations and wealthy individuals will pay their fair share of taxes.

For several reasons, the fair share minimum tax is different from all the other minimum tax proposals now being discussed.

The fair share minimum tax sets a 25 percent rate on alternative taxable income above $150,000. Most of the other minimum tax proposals establish a much lower rate, generally only 15 percent. This makes a tremendous difference in the amount of revenues that would be generated. According to very preliminary estimates, the fair share minimum tax will raise at least $22 billion immediately and significantly greater amounts in later years. Some of the other proposals raise no more than $6 billion in 1 year, and most raise less.

A 25 percent rate is fairer than a 15 percent rate. Why shouldn't wealthy individuals and profitable corporations pay 25 percent, which is the same marginal rate as a single individual earning only $18,200 per year?

The fair share minimum tax covers both individuals and corporations. Most of the other proposals are only calling for a corporate minimum tax. If it is wrong for profitable corporations to avoid paying their fair share of taxes, isn't it equally wrong for wealthy individuals to avoid paying their fair share? Estimates are that only between 300,000 and 700,000 wealthy individuals would be affected by the individual minimum tax. Our constituents get just as upset when they hear about millionaires who don't pay taxes as they do when they hear about profitable corporations that escape paying their fair share.

The fair share minimum tax is much more comprehensive than alternative proposals, and virtually loophole free. Right now, for example, there are corporate and personal minimum taxes, and yet we are all familiar with stories about profitable corporations and wealthy individuals who still manage to avoid paying taxes. Clearly, the current minimum taxes aren't doing the job, and there is no guaranteee that several of the other minimum tax proposals will be significantly better. The fair share minimum tax, however, will ensure that no profitable corporation or wealthy individuals earning more than $150,000 will escape their fair share of taxes.

By injecting two overriding principles into the Democratic Party's discussion of tax reform, we believe that the fair share minimum tax can serve as the basis for comprehensive, progressive tax reform.

The first principle is that no wealthy individual or profitable corporation should be able to use the Tax Code to avoid paying their fair share of taxes. This principle should apply to any Tax Code—the current system, Bradley-Gephardt, Treasury, or Kemp-Kasten.

Unfortunately, the current Tax Code and Kemp-Kasten are sieves. They allow large numbers of profitable corporations and wealthy individuals to avoid paying their fair share of taxes. In fact, under Kemp-Kasten, the ranks of large corporations paying no taxes is destined to grow, primarily because of that bill's generous depreciation schedule.

Tax reform that allows tax avoidance is a sham and Democrats should not be reluctant to oppose this type of reform.

The second point is that for 25 years, the Tax Code has been getting more regressive. In 1960, income tax payments from corporations and the wealthiest 1.8 percent of individuals accounted for 43 percent of all Federal revenues. By 1983, taxes from these same sources were providing only 17 percent of Federal revenues. In other words, because wealthy idividuals and profitable corporations have been paying less, the middle class has been paying more.

51-059 O-86-40 (Pt. 8)

Each of the other major tax reform proposals locks in this regressivity. None moves the system's progressivity back to where it was at the beginning of the Kennedy administration.

Tax reform that makes no effort to lift the burden on the middle class is not in keeping with the Democratic Party's traditional concern for social justice and equity—precisely the concerns that earned the party the loyalty of the middle class for the past half century and precisely the concerns we need to reaffirm if we are to regain the allegiance of the middle class.

With these principles in mind, we believe that a comprehensive, airtight, minimum tax is an integral feature of, and a worthy basis for, comprehensive tax reform. The fair share minimum tax should be viewed as a safety net, or a backstop in the event that certain tax preferences are not eliminated by tax reform.

Simply put, it may be unrealistic to assume that the final version of tax reform will completely eliminate every tax preference. Some will be retained for good reasons, and others might be retained for less good reasons. But no matter how many are retained, and no matter why they are retained, the fair share minimum tax is designed to ensure that nobody will be able to use these preferences to avoid paying their fair share of taxes. In this respect, the fair share minimum tax will help tax reformers accomplish their goal—ensuring that no taxpayer can use the complexity of the tax system to escape paying their fair share of taxes.

The following is a section by section analysis of the major provisions of the fair share minimum tax bill:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF FAIR SHARE MINIMUM TAX BILL

Section 2(a): This section declares that the personal minimum tax will be fully phased in at $100,000. It establishes lower tax rates for the $70,000 to $100,000 phase in period. For the corporate minimum tax, it establishes a phase in period starting at $70,000 and rising to $150,000, at which point the full 25 percent minimum tax rate will apply.

Section 2(b): This section states that the five allowable personal deductions—state and local taxes, medical deductions, interest on the mortgage for a principal residence, casualty losses, and charitable contributions—will be phased out between incomes of $100,000 and $150,000.

Section 2(c): States that interest deductions will only pertain to new loans for purchasing and rehabilitating a principal residence. Also provides a deduction for state and local income and property taxes. Sales taxes are not an allowable state and local deduction.

Charitable contributions, casualty losses, interest to the extent of investment income, and medical expenses are already in the minimum tax code as allowable deductions, so they are not explicitly enumerated in this bill.

PREFERENCES THAT PERTAIN TO ALL TAXPAYERS

Section 3(a)(1)(A): States that all depreciable property will be considered a preference item, irrespective or whether or not it is leased. Current law says that only leased property is a preference item.

Section 3(a)(1)(B): States that for minimum tax purposes, depreciation cannot be calculated using ACRS recovery periods. Instead, the taxpayer must use the actual or useful life, known as the "present class life." These are depreciation schedules published by the Treasury for various classes of assets. Where there is no proposed class life, such as for buildings, the depreciation schedule is set at 40 years.

These are the same recovery periods as the ones used in the 1984 tax bill for property leased to tax exempt entities.

This section only pertains to property placed in service after the date of enactment.

Section 3(a)(2): Under present law, intangible drilling costs are a preference if they exceed one half of net income and are expensed, rather than amortized over 10 years. The FSMT defines the intangible drilling cost preference as the difference between 10 year amortization and expensing, with no net income offset. This section would only pertain to intangible drilling costs incurred after the date of enactment.

Section 3(a)(3): Adds the following new preferences—

Interest from newly issued tax exempt securities. This interest will now be considered to be a preference item. Under present minimum tax law, it is not a preference item.

Installment sales method of accounting. Under present law, a taxpayer using the installment sales method of accounting can defer capital gains taxes due on the sale of property. Under this method, a seller who also provides the financing only has to declare the gains from the sale as the purchaser makes installment payments. Since in many cases, the seller discounts the note or sells it on the secondary market soon after the sale of the property is consummated, the seller actually realizes the total gain immediately, even though for tax purposes, the gain does not have to be declared immediately.

Therefore, this section also states that the gain from a sale has to be declared immediately, rather than declared as installment payments are received.

Inside buildup on life insurance policies. This section states that the inside buildup, or the increase in the cash value, of whole life insurance, annuity, or endowment contracts is now considered to be a preference item for minimum tax purposes. It is not a preference under current minimum tax law.

PREFERENCES THAT PERTAIN ONLY TO CORPORATIONS

Section 3(b)(1): Under current law, there are several tax preferences that apply only to personal holding companies. The FSMT declares that these preferences shall apply to the minimum tax levied on all corporations, not just personal holding companies.

The list of preferences that now pertain to all corporations are:

a. accelerated depreciation on leased property

b. the difference between expensing of mining exploration and development costs and 10 year amortization.

c. the difference between expensing magazine circulation costs and 3 year amortization of those costs.

d. the difference between expensing intangible drilling costs and 10 year amortization with no net income offset.

e. for research and experimentation costs, the difference between expensing and 5 year amortization.

Section 3(b)(2): Declares that the following preferences shall apply only to corporations—

Bad debt reserves. For all banks, the FSMT declares that a preference exists if the bank's addition to its loan loss reserves exceeds the reserve that would be computed using the experience method. This provision is already in current law.

Cost of carrying tax exempt securities. For all banks, the FSMT declares that a preference exists if a bank deducts its interest expenses for carrying newly-acquired tax exempt obligations. In other words, a bank cannot claim a business deduction for its interest costs when it borrows money in order to purchase tax exempt obligations.

Foreign Sales Corporations: Under current law, export earnings are exempt from taxation if a corporation sets up a foreign sales corporation and funnels its exports through this dummy corporation. The FSMT states that exempt earnings from Foreign Sales Corporations will be declared to be a preference item for purposes of the corporate minimum tax.

Deferred Shipping Income. Under current law, shipping income can be deferred from taxation if that income is deposited in a capital construction fund. If the money is withdrawn to build a new ship, the withdrawals are also exempt from taxation, although if they are withdrawn for other purposes, the withdrawn amount is taxable.

The FSMT says that all new deposits, and all withdrawals of old deposits shall be considered to be a preference item for purposes of the corporate minimum tax.

Completed Contract Accounting. Under current law, a corporation might receive periodic progress payments over the life of a multiyear contract, but the corporation doesn't have to declare the income until the contract is completed. This technique is used by defense contractors who receive periodic payments but who don't include those payments as part of each year's taxable income. As a result of this technique, contractors defer taxes for several years, and they minimize their total taxes by determining the timing of their claims for deductions and taxable income.

The FSMT declares that contractors must declare income as periodic payments are received.

PREFERENCES RELATING ONLY TO TAXPAYERS OTHER THAN CORPORATIONS

Section 3(c): Declares that the following preferences shall apply only to taxpayers other than corporations.

Untaxed portion of social security benefits. This section defines as a preference the difference between social security benefits and all payroll tax contributions plus interest earned in that taxpayer's account. The preference only includes that portion of social security benefits currently exempt from taxation.

Earned income of citizens and residents living abroad. Under current law, an individual living abroad can deduct up to $80,000 of his overseas income from U.S. taxable income. The FSMT says that this $80,000 exclusion will be considered to be a preference item for purposes of the individual minimum tax.

Increase in nonforfeitable pension benefits. If you have a nonforfeitable right to a pension, the increase in the account during the tax year will be considered to be a preference item for purposes of the individual minimum tax. This section only pertains to vested pension benefits.

Deduction for two earner married couples. This section repeals the deduction for 2-earner married couples. Because the minimum tax is levied at a flat 25 percent rate, there is no bracket creep associated with adding two incomes together. Consequently, there is no marriage penalty, so the deduction designed to reduce the marriage penalty should not pertain to the minimum tax.

Health related benefits excluded from gross income. Under current law, an employer's payments for medical insurance and for medical care are not included in the employee's gross income. This section makes these payments subject to the individual minimum tax.

Group-term life insurance. Under current law, an employer's premium payments for the first $50,000 of group term life insurance are not included in the employee's gross income. This section says that all employer contributions for group term life insurance must be included in gross income for purposes of the individual minimum tax.●

THE ONLY FAIR DECISION

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, regarding the question of how the majority leadership handled the seating of the Representative for the Eighth District of Indiana, I would like to submit for the information of my colleagues an editorial entitled "Democrats Make a Mistake," from the May 3, 1985, St. Petersburg Times.

The editorial follows:

DEMOCRATS MAKE A MISTAKE

The strongest reason for sending the decision on who should represent them in the U.S. House back to the voters of Indiana's 8th District is the impossibility of reaching a fair decision on the results of the Nov. 6 vote. That is why House Democrats erred Wednesday when they seated Democrat Frank McCloskey.

Two days after the polls closed last November McCloskey was the apparent winner by 72 votes. But when it was discovered that the votes in two precincts had been counted twice, Republican Richard D. McIntyre appeared to win by 34 votes. On that tally, the Indiana secretary of state, a Republican, certified McIntyre as the winner.

When the state completed its recount, McIntyre's lead was increased to 418 votes, but 4,808 ballots were thrown out for technical reasons. Under the traditional rule that the House is the final judge of its own members, the House Administration Committee was asked to recount the ballots and settle the issue. It created a three-member task force of two Democrats and one Republican to do that job. They hired auditors from the General Accounting Office actually to count the ballots. The controversy centered on absentee ballots and late-arriving military absentee ballots, according to Congressional Quarterly.

Indiana law requires that absentee ballots be notarized and signed. The task force decided to count the absentee ballots that earlier had been thrown out by the state, provided the voter's intent was clear. There were 62 such ballots that had not been properly notarized or signed, but that county clerks mistakenly had sent to precincts for counting. The task force counted those ballots on grounds that they were inseparable from other ballots. But there were 32 other such ballots, which county clerks had not sent to the precincts, that were not counted. The Republican member of the task force also lost a bid to count 11 absentee military ballots that had been postmarked before the election but had arrived as late as a week after the election.

After those decisions, the task force declared McCloskey the winner by a count of 116,645 to 116,641.

We defy anyone to reach a just and acceptable judgment in those circumstances. The only fair decision would be to return the decision to the voters of the district, which House Democrats refused to do.

The House and the nation will pay a price for that error. It appeared Wednesday when House Republicans demonstrated their partisan animosity in words and deeds by dramatically walking out of the chamber. Lack of civility has been a problem in the House all this year, and this decision by the Democrats can only make it worse.

CONCORD MINUTEMEN BAND VISITS NATION'S CAPITOL

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, last week students from the Concord High School Minutemen Band visited Washington, DC. These students are from Concord, CA, which is included in the Seventh Congressional District, which I represent.

The Minutemen were visiting Washington while participating in the Apple Blossom Festival in Winchester, VA. I was delighted to meet them and the band's director, Eric Hammer, at the U.S. Capitol.

This is an outstanding band of 87 students who have spent many hours practicing their music and their marching. Their performance in the Apple Blossom Festival was a great credit to their skill and their hard work.

I know that all Members of the House of Representatives will want to join me in congratulating the Minutemen Band on their performance at the festival.

The members of the band are:

CONCORD MARCHING BAND

Jeanie Abraham, Kathy Alcorn, Cathy Allred, Eric Anderson, Kim Blackburn, Brian Blackburn, Terri Botto, Wendy Brown, Christie Bureckner, Jeff Brueckner, David Busing, Chris Cabral, Denise Cabral, Debbie Case, Jeff Chan, Mike Chavez, and Debbie Cherbonnier.

Cyndie Clark, Dina Cotter, Danielle Cutler, Amy Cutt, Jon Davenport, D'arcy Dornan, Brent Coryell, Lorraine Converse, Merrie Converse, Jennifer Dutton, Diana Edamura, Mike Emanuel, Kelly Emerton, Carol Fabian, Karie Freeman, Kristie Freeman, and Matt Goodshaw.

John Griffin, Ken Griffiths, Gina Guadagnini, Marianne Hoeft, Anissa Hudson, Eric Humphrey, Darnelle Huus, Asha Jirge, Dayton Johnson, Holly Jones, Paula Kapfenstein, Keiko Kobayashi, Kevin Leveroni, Sunny Love, Robin Mangum, and Lisa Manzon.

Paul Manzon, Danny McAninch, Janet Morones, Jenni Nedrow, Jeff Nedrow, Janet Neumann, Debbie Nichols, Shari Nonemaker, Marian Mikares, Lainie Odegaard, Lynette Odegaard, Karla Oliver, Kristen Oliver, Stephanie O'Steen, Jennifer Pickrell, Barbara Pollard, Brian Rewerts, and Jill Robinson.

Michelle Sanchez, Marcial Santolaya, David Scharper, Sandra Schlink, Scott Shern, Neil Straghalis, Allan Tangaan, Rich Thall, Denise Vedovelli, Judy Venturino, Joanne Viscia, Marya Walford, Kim Watkins, Val Webb, Julie Weimar, Melissa Wright, Rikki Wyman, and Shannon Yonge.●

AFFIRMATIVE RETREAT

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's Justice Department continues its assaults on the Nation's civil rights laws. The latest attack is its asking 50 cities and counties to modify voluntarily previous consent decrees relating to affirmative action agreements in public jobs.

The following New York Times editorial calls is a design to dismantle Federal civil rights enforcement long before the Nation has overcome past discrimination.

[From the New York Times, May 5, 1985]

AFFIRMATIVE RETREAT

Not content with agitating against affirmative action, the Reagan Administration has sued Indianapolis for honoring commitments to desegregate its police and fire departments. The action fits a design to dismantle Federal civil rights enforcement long before the nation has overcome past discrimination.

The Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, William Bradford Reynolds, contends that the Constitution and Federal law prohibit using numerical goals in employment. He says there can be no such remedy, no matter how blatant the past bias and no matter how mild the impact on white male job seekers favored in the past.

Mr. Reynolds is once again misreading the law. He is diverting precious resources from unfinished civil rights business and threatening to burden the courts with retrial of settled cases.

Fortunately, every court that has heard his theories has ruled against them. Indianapolis and other cities that have long since made their peace with fair hiring requirements want no more interference with orderly desegregation. Congress should call off this new assault on the law.

When the Justice Department, under different management, sued Indianapolis in 1978, only 11 percent of its police officers and 8 percent of its firefighters were black. Under a consent decree the city agreed to enroll blacks in a quarter of its training classes and to appoint one woman police officer for every four new hires. Blacks now hold 14 and 13 percent of the police and fire positions—gains that city officials hope to enlarge if left alone.

Mr. Reynolds has now sent intimidating letters to 56 governmental employers, warning that the Supreme Court's decision in a Memphis case last year outlaws numerical targets, whether voluntary, court ordered, or negotiated in consent decrees. He refers to a ruling that Memphis, in making budget-induced layoffs, could not ignore the seniority rights of white firefighters in order to retain more recently hired blacks.

But that case involved layoffs, not hiring and promotions, and it ran afoul of an explicit protection of seniority systems that organized labor demanded for supporting the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Mr. Reynolds may want the affirmative action ruled unlawful, but the Court has not done so.

For these and similar attacks on civil rights, Mr. Reynolds is slated for promotion to Associate Attorney General. The Senate need not acquiesce. Congress can also withhold appropriations for Mr. Reynolds' brand of litigation. The path to a colorblind society is forward through accommodation, not back through the turmoil of the past.●

VIETNAM VETS WELCOMED HOME

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in New York City a long overdue "welcome home" was finally given to the Vietnam veterans of this Nation. Nearly 25,000 veterans of that longest war in our history were received in a historical, emotional, ticker-tape parade through Lower Manhattan.

Mr. Speaker, many of those who marched yesterday in New York were New Jersey residents. As a member of the House Veterans Affairs Committee I have had the chance to meet and talk with these men and women throughout our State at various veteran events and meetings. I can tell you that what happened yesterday in New York will accomplish much in the way of healing the wounds which we unfortunately may have allowed to develop in the past 10 years. I am grateful to Mayor Edward Koch of New York for all of his efforts in making yesterday a reality. I am sure that we will all look back at May 7, 1985, as one of the landmark events in the long and emotional road of Vietnam.

Mr. Speaker, I include an article from today's Philadelphia Inquirer newspaper which more fully describes the events of yesterday. I would like to include this piece in the RECORD.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer]

N.Y. HONORS VIETNAM VETS WITH A PARADE

(By Andrew Maykuth)

NEW YORK.—Thousands of Vietnam veterans marched across the Brooklyn Bridge—under a banner that said "Welcome Home"—and through the concrete chasm of lower Manhattan yesterday, showered by shredded paper and adulation. It was the ticker-tape parade they had never had.

"It's way overdue," said David Hewitt, a Marine veteran who lives in Tuckerton, N.J. "This makes things better. We're not hiding it anymore."

Nor were the people who lined the sidewalks. They cheered. They waved flags. They yelled, "You're No. 1—we love you."

The spectacle, a decade after the fall of Saigon, was an outpouring of patriotic fervor that equaled New York's last ticker-tape parade honoring the 1984 Olympic champions.

"USA! USA!" a crowd on Broadway chanted, led by a group of marchers who stopped to bask in the cascade of paper. Then the veterans resumed their march, singing the "Marine's Hymn."

"Here we are," shouted one of the marchers, raising his face and arms to office workers in windows high above Broadway. Like many marchers, he was dressed informally in remnants of his uniform. He wore jeans and a Marine fatigue hat. A brown T-shirt covered his paunch.

"We love youse," he shouted, as his group of friends laughed. "We're home."

"Thank you," read the signs. "We are so proud," read a banner near the City Hall reviewing stand, which was dominated by military officers, most in proper uniform.

One who wore civilian clothes was Gen. William C. Westmoreland, the commander during the height of the Vietnam War. To cheers from the crowd, he climbed down from the stand to march with his soldiers.

The marchers were led by Mayor Edward I. Koch, who pushed John Behan in a wheelchair. Behan, 40, a Republican state assemblyman from Long Island who lost both legs in Vietnam, was one of a score of Medal of Honor winners in the parade.

The New York Veterans Memorial Commission organized the parade to cap a three-day celebration, which included a display of fireworks Monday night over the East River. Koch dedicated a memorial to those who fought in the war.

Organizers of the parade estimated that 25,000 veterans marched—less than half the number of Americans who died in the war. Police estimated the crowd at a million, although some sites along the 2.5-mile route were nearly empty.

It was a ticker-tape parade that probably would not have been possible 10 years ago, when the remaining U.S. contingent in South Vietnam was evacuated from Saigon's rooftops and returned to the scorn of a nation weary of war.

Amid the cheers yesterday—the loudest came for the limping and the legless—there were bittersweet feelings.

"I do kind of feel it's too little, too late" said Bob Sullivan, a Marine veteran from Bricktown, N.J. "I almost didn't come. I'm looking around for familiar faces."

Sullivan, along with Hewitt, came to revel and, to an extent, to protest. Their group, Agent Orange Victims of New Jersey, has been trying to force the government to compensate veterans suffering ill effects from the defoliant used in Southeast Asia. Some of the group wore orange T-shirts that read, "Sprayed and betrayed."

Jim Kennedy, a former Army Airborne member who lives near Williamsport, Pa., represented a group that also suffers the lingering effects of the war—the post-traumatic stress unit of the Veterans Administration Medical Center in Lyon, N.J.

The veterans' cold reception when they returned from Vietnam, Kennedy said, compounded the psychological battle scars they already had. "It would be nice if everything—everybody's feelings—could be erased from today on," he said. "It could be changed, but not erased."

"There was a lot of bad feeling between the vets and the general populace," he said. "When I came home, I came home on a stretcher to Valley Forge. That was in '68. I was wounded in Khe Sanh. We were driving along the turnpike in this Army ambulance and somebody pulled up alongside us and gave us the finger. You know, the fickle finger of fate. That was my welcome home."

William Starkey, a member of the United Vietnam Veterans Organization in Cherry Hill, said he received a similar reception when he returned from Vietnam in 1968.

"Like an idiot, I spent a couple of days on the West Coast," he said. "I walked around on the Berkeley campus with a damn uniform on and felt as threatened as I was during the Tet offensive."

"Among other things, this parade is the right thing to do," said Starkey. "It's long overdue. Frankly, a lot of us don't like the image that we lost the war."

It was a diverse group flowing along Broadway to Battery Park—a score of Medal of Honor winners, hundreds of New York city employees and thousands of veterans, who wore fatigues or their unofficial campaign jackets, bearing such words as "When I die I'll go to heaven because I've spent my time in hell."

Earlier, as several units waited to push off, there came the distant sound of rotor blades. The mass of veterans looked up.

Swinging into view from behind a stack of skyscrapers was a covey of helicopter gunships flying in tight formation. They were led by a C-130 Hercules transport, the huge military plane that was used to transport troops and bring home the bodies.

The mass of veterans in the streets began applauding wildly, cheering and pumping raised fists into the air, shouting "Go Baby!" and "Glad to see you."

Among the camouflage jackets in the crowd was Bob Danis, formerly of the Air Force, now an accounts manager for Citibank. He took a couple of hours off work, pinned the medals he won in 1969 to his gray suit, and joined the crowd.

"It's kind of weird," he said, standing aside at the end of the parade route near Battery Park. "I don't know—after 15 years, it's probably going to be good, in that it will heal the wounds. I think there is a lot of bitterness."

He paused to look at a lot of men in jungle fatigues, who seemed intoxicated on the confetti, cheers and beers. They were shouting, "USA! All the way!"

"In a lot of ways," said Danis, "It brings back bad memories. A lot of these guys have had a hard time adapting."

J. FRANK WARMATH HONORED

HON. ED JONES

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. J. Frank Warmath of Humboldt, TN, a strong civic leader, lawyer, newspaper publisher, businessman, and my friend. Mr. Warmath has worked diligently for many years on behalf of his home community. He served the community as a member of Tennessee's General Assembly. He has worked hard on a number of projects that improved the community.

This Friday, May 10, Mr. Warmath will be honored for the many years of service he has rendered to another local civic project, the West Tennessee Strawberry Festival which is an annual festival. The strawberry festival will honor Mr. Warmath for the many services he has rendered it throughout the years. He has served actively in the festival beginning in 1937 and has held many of its leadership posts.

Frank Warmath has meant much to his community and has worked hard on its behalf. I am proud to count him among my friends and join with Humboldt, TN in paying him tribute. I would request that an article recently carried by the Humboldt Courier Chronicle regarding Mr. Warmath's service be included in the RECORD.

FESTIVAL DEDICATED TO CHRONICLE PUBLISHER

(By Genie Alsobrook)

Saying 'It was a lot of fun,' J. Frank Warmath summarized his years of work for the West Tennessee Strawberry Festival.

He will be honored on J. Frank Warmath Day Friday, May 10, at both the parade and Governor's Luncheon.

Warmath, is a native of Humboldt, son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Clint Warmath. He attended school here until the 10th grade when he left to attend Barnhan and Hughes Military Academy. Upon graduation, he attended Vanderbilt University and received his AB degree in 1932. At Vanderbilt Mr. Warmath was president of his Senior class. In June of 1934 he received his Doctorate of Jurisprudence from Cumberland University.

Between his graduation from Vanderbilt and his attending Cumberland University, Mr. Warmath returned to Humboldt to work. During this period he ran a service station which was located downtown on the site of the old police station. After this enterprise, he traveled for a local shoe company as a salesman. Neither of these lasted very long.

After Mr. Warmath's graduation from Cumberland in 1934, he started a law practice here. His career as an attorney did not last many years due to a 46% loss of hearing which was caused by a mastoiditis operation. The strain of not being able to hear was physically exhausting, and Mr. Warmath did not feel he could give full justice to his clients if he could not hear witnesses in a trial situation.

Once Mr. Warmath was unable to practice law, he began to branch out." His first "branch" was WIRJ, the local radio station. He then acquired the Courier Chronicle newspaper. Mr. Warmaths' "branches" went out in many directions in Humboldt and in the surrounding area

J. Frank Warmath's association with the West Tennessee Strawberry Festival began in 1937 and continued throughout the 1960's. His first role with the festival was Chairman of the Queen's Ball. In those days, this was a lavish affair complete with big name bands, which he arranged for.

From that role, Warmath has held many, many positions in the Festival, including General Chairman in 1941 and 1945, and President in 1949. He worked with the budget and finance committee for many years and Chairman of the Governor's Luncheon for many years. Mr. Warmath recalls that during the 1940's, when he was general chairman, the local chamber of commerce was not involved in the festival organization as they are now. The responsibility for all the planning and organizing of the festival lay with the General Chairman.

In 1941, he actually closed his law office and with the help of a few others, ran the entire festival from there. They wrote all the letters, attended the area beauty revues and made bus trips, devoting two and a half months to making sure the festival was a success.

Mr. Warmath became involved in politics in 1945 when he was elected to the Tennessee Legislature. He later served on the staffs of Governors Ellington and Clement and also on the Aeronautics Commission.

Warmath was instrumental in having the four-lane built on Hwy. 45 which leads from Humboldt toward Trenton. As a member of the Aeronautics Commission, he was involved in bringing an airport to Humboldt.

Humboldt's Cedar Crest Hospital was "born on a golf course in Florida" as he talked with Dr. Tom Frist, the founder of the Hospital Corporation of America. Three weeks later the doctor was in town, looking for a location.

Along with his many "branches" and his political involvement Mr. Warmath has served on many civic organizations including one of the founders of the Lions Club and President of that organization, President of the Humboldt Golf and Country Club, President of the Chamber of Commerce and on the Chamber of Commerce Industrial Board. While Chairman of the Industrial Board of the Chamber of Commerce, he was instrumental in bringing many industries to Humboldt. Included in this group was Century Electric, now Copeland Electric, Wayne Gossard, Alton Box Co., General Metals Products and Southeastern Motor Truck Lines, now McLean Trucking.

There have not been many areas of social, civic, political or business life in which Mr. Warmath has not been involved and been successful. He attributes his involvement and success to those people whom he has met over his life time. "It is who you know," Mr. Warmath says.

Festival officials lauded Mr. Warmath's work saying, "The Strawberry Festival, Humboldt, the County and West Tennessee have all benefited greatly from his efforts through the years.●

COMMUNISM—NAZISM'S INSPIRATION

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Senator WILLIAM ARMSTRONG has performed a public service by writing an article describing the role the Soviet Union played in World War II and afterward. His detailed, historically accurate article shows that the Nazi-Communist alliance between 1939 and 1941 was one based on mutual respect and mutual need. He also shows that Communists, whenever they have taken power, have demonstrated the same ruthlessness as the Nazis. He quite correctly reminds us that communism was Nazism's inspiration.

At this point I want to place in the RECORD "How Soviets Mark V-E Day" by WILLIAM L. ARMSTRONG, Senator from Colorado, as published in the Washington Times, May 8, 1985.

HOW SOVIETS MARK V-E DAY—WHAT ISN'T BEING REMEMBERED THERE

(By William L. Armstrong)

For the Soviet Union, the rightful heir of National Socialism, today's anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany holds great significance. Victory in what the Soviets call the "Great Patriotic War" is perhaps the only real accomplishment in 67 years of misrule, and the regime is trying to make the most of it.

Props for the celebration were readied in advance. The once discredited Joseph Stalin has been largely rehabilitated to celebrate his wartime role as supreme commander. One of Stalin's favorite flunkies, former Commissar for Foreign Affairs Vyacheslav Molotov, now in his mid-90s, was last year readmitted to the Communist Party. He had been expelled by Nikita Khrushchev in his "de-Stalinization" campaign, and comedians had suggested Mr. Molotov was being groomed as a successor to former Communist Party boss Konstantin Chernenko. Even American veterans' groups have contributed to making the anniversary a success, participating in Soviet-sponsored celebrations of the link-up of U.S. and Soviet forces on the Elbe in 1945.

Soviet World War II commemorations are most notable, however, for what is not being remembered. For example, you do not hear that millions of Soviet citizens of all nationalities, far from rushing to "defend their gains under socialism," initially greeted the Germans as liberators from Communist oppression. Nor do the Soviets mention that hundreds of thousands of Soviet fighting men eagerly surrendered to the first Germans they met and volunteered to fight the Soviet Army. Nor do you hear about the several million Russians and Ukranians who sought asylum, only to be turned over to Stalin by the Western allies in the infamous "Operation Keelhaul" at the end of the war.

Finally, you certainly are not apt to hear about what touched off the war in the first place: the Non-Aggression Pact between Hitler and Stalin. It was concluded by Mr. Molotov and Nazi Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop on Aug. 23, 1939. The pact divided the countries of Central Europe between the two totalitarian powers, set the stage for the invasion of Poland, and lit the fuse to begin the new world war.

Nowadays, when forced to explain the pact, the Soviets claim it was only a measure designed to gain time against the inevitable Nazi onslaught. But this claim just does not hold up. British author Nikolai Tolstoy asserts that for Stalin "the pact was not a stern necessity but a highly congenial alliance." Indeed, notes Mr. Tolstoy, the only restraining force on the Soviets' pro-Nazi policy seems to have been that they did not want to make it too obvious, for fear of provoking Germany's western enemies.

Exiled Ukrainian Gen. Petro Grigorenko wrote that the Soviets felt confident enough about their new relationship to demolish a massive string of fortifications in the Western U.S.S.R.

Soviet intelligence officers were warned not to report any German war preparations against Russia, because this would undermine their new friendship. One high official, Gen. Grigorenko says, was shot only a week before Hitler's attack for giving Stalin proof of German intentions.

If the U.S.S.R. was only buying time, what were they buying it for? Why did they seem totally unprepared for the attack when it finally came? Moscow's famous spy in Tokyo, Richard Sorge, had told the Soviets the exact date of the attack. Still, the Blitzkrieg shocked its former ally and ripped through the Soviet-occupied portions of Poland in less than three days.

For almost two years, until June 1941, Hitler and Stalin were allied in all but name and worked hand-in-glove to erase the last vestiges of democratic government and civilized values from a continent still not recovered from the cataclysmic years of 1914-18. It is generally overlooked how much Hitler's conquests in Europe owed to this cooperation. Poland, Greece, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg, France—all fell to Nazi forces fed with Soviet grain and powered by Soviet petroleum.

Today we tend to forget how the pact shocked the world when it was concluded. Everywhere Communists, who only the day before had vilified the Nazis as the most vicious thugs of all time, praised them for standing up to the British and French bankers. In country after country threatened by the Blitzkrieg, Communists worked diligently to undermine defense efforts, spreading defeatist propaganda and sabotaging war production; only after the U.S.S.R. was under attack did the Communists of Nazi-occupied Europe flip-flop again, become "patriots," and join the resistance.

The conventional view was—and still is—that there was something unnatural about the Nazi-Communist alliance. But a closer examination shows that the affinity between the two movements was more than just a matter of convenience. As Adolf Hitler himself once observed:

"There is more that binds us to Bolshevism than separates us from it. There is, above all, genuine revolutionary feeling, which is alive everywhere in Russia except where there are Jewish Marxists. I have always made allowance for this circumstance, and have given orders that former Communists are to be admitted to the Party at once. The petit bourgeois Social Democrat and the trade union boss will never make a National Socialist, but the Communist always will."

Both movements, loathed everything that smacked of "conservatisim" or traditional social values: religion, property, the family, old-fashioned patriotism. Each vied with the other in its attacks on our system of "bourgeois democracy." One ecstatic Naxi hailed the pact as "the confluence of two streams which run toward the same sea, the sea of world revolution."

But these totalitarian twins had not entered the world together. Nazism (national socialism) clearly and deliberately imitated the example of Communism (international socialism), which preceded it by several years. Hitler consciously borrowed many features of his movement from the Communists, even taking the Communist color red for his party flag. In its early years, the Nazi movement recruited much of its personnel from the Communists, and Joseph Goebbels, Hitler's propaganda minister, had long been torn between the two camps. The Gestapo was a copy of the Soviet Cheka. The Storm Troopers were Red Guards in brown shirts. Nazi propagandists studied the masterful techniques of Soviet propagandists.

Hitler's concentration camps were patterned on those begun under Lenin, who in fact invented the term "concentration camp." The Communists were the teachers, the Nazis their pupils.

Both aim to reduce individuals to a uniform, collectivized mass, devoid of God or any higher spiritual aspiration, regimented in an all-encompassing totalitarian order. Nazism organizes society based on race, communism according to class: bad genetics and bad economics. But everything else—the use of lies and propaganda, the secret police, the concentration camps, the infallible leader, the party, the obsession with death and violence—is remarkably similar.

But for all the similarities and relationships between Nazism and communism, there is a striking difference in how the two are perceived. There is never a shortage of those individuals whom Lenin called "useful idiots" supplying every possible excuse for Soviet aggressiveness. The only real explanation for the behavior of the Soviet leaders—that they act like Communists because they really are Communists—is carefully avoided.

Nazism was laid in its grave 40 years ago; but communism, Nazism's inspiration and successor, still lives and thrives. During its brief and terrible life, Nazism killed 12 million people. But this number pales beside the more than 100 million victims (estimates run to 150 million) of international communism since it first seized power in Russia. More than 60 million have been killed in that country alone, according to Alexander Solzhenitsyn, and the toll in China is of similar magnitude. And every day, in prisons, camps, and "psychiatric hospitals" from Castro's Caribbean Gulag to Vietnam's "re-education centers," the staggering total grows.

The Soviet regime's eagerness to tout the superiority of its social system in light of its victory in World War II should give us pause to ask precisely what kind of system it is and with what kind of system it was allied. The fact that Hitler turned on his Communist allies and ended a marriage that the Soviets wanted to preserve is hardly something of which the Soviets should be proud. The ensuing struggle has been aptly described by noted Russian dissident Vladimir Bukovsky as "the great war to determine whether the concentration camps of the future would be Brown or Red."

Today, there are still concentration camps operating in the heart of Europe. And they are Red.●

IN HONOR OF SMALL BUSINESS WEEK, 1985

HON. CATHY (MRS. GILLIS) LONG

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mrs. LONG. Mr. Speaker, it is a particular pleasure for me to address the House today during our observance of National Small Business Week, as just last week I became a member of the Small Business Committee. I look forward to my work on small business issues through my service on the committee, and am eager to do my part to help nurture a strong economic climate in which our Nation's small businesses can grow.

Over the years, it has been America's small businesses which have continued to provide new jobs through technological innovation. Small businesses employ one-half of the private sector American work force. In my own District in Louisiana, there are countless small businesses providing essential products and services. With small businesses responsible for approximately 40 pecent of our gross national product, we simply cannot afford to idly stand by and watch this critical sector of our economy continue to suffer. Nor will I accept unemployment rates in some parishes in my district which are running at three times the national average.

As we praise the hardworking entreprenuers across the Nation this week, the Small Business Committee is concluding a long series of hearings on the legislation to reauthorize the Small Business Administration for another 3 years. I am in full support of continuing the fine work that the SBA has performed since its establishment in 1953. While the adjustment of some programs is certainly warranted, I believe that it would be a mistake to eliminate the SBA.

The critical issue is to make certain that the programs which the SBA does continue to operate, work as effectively as possible. At a time when so many people are still searching for work, particularly minorities, veterans, women, the handicapped, and others who have historically been less able to find work, we must continue to help worthy enterprises grow.

But the SBA cannot do the job alone. Budget deficits must be trimmed and taxes made more equitable so that the private sector will be able to provide the necessary capital for economic growth. There can be no question that we must make the tough choices which are necessary to help keep our small businesses in operation and allow new businesses to begin.

Mr. Speaker, I commend all the small businessmen and woman who have struggled to make their dreams of running a successful business to become a reality, and will do my part provide the incentive for another generation of American entrepreneurs.●

GRADY COLUMNS ON NICARAGUA

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, as the situation in Nicaragua continues to dominate the headlines, I would like to share with my colleagues further reflections of Sandy Grady, reporter for the Philadelphia Daily News. Sandy was part of the delegation I led to El Salvador and Nicaragua from April 8-15, 1985. Upon his return, Sandy published a series of five articles on our trip.

Yesterday, I submitted the first of these articles for my colleagues' review. Today, I would like to place the second and third in the series into the RECORD, as I believe they can be helpful in our understanding of the current situation in Nicaragua. These articles include a particularly insightful and descriptive picture of life in areas subject to Contra attacks; they also cover the views of a number of Nicaraguan leaders. I recommend Sandy Grady's words to my colleagues as we further consider our Central American policy.

SURVIVING IN CONTRA COUNTRY

ESTELI, NICARAGUA.—If you want to know how Ronald Reagan's rebels are doing, this is the place to come.

All it needs is a roadside billboard: "This is Contra Country—Your (U.S.) Tax Dollars At Work."

This farming area, with its green valleys and dry brown hills, is 35 miles south down the main highway chute from the Honduran border. Marauding bands of the 15,000 U.S.-funded guerrillas always have the area in their gunsights.

You don't move around these roads after sundown. It's like Indian territory in 19th-century Kentucky.

Hot, dusty teen-age boys trudge the roadside, coming home from patrol. Instead of fishing rods or ball bats, they carry Soviet-made AD-47 rifles.

"It's safe here because we've got guards out," says Juan Cruz Rodriguez, the sheriff of the mountain village of El Regardio. "But after dark . . ."

His shrug and toothless grin say: Forget it.

Our van has raced 80 miles up the highway from the capital of Managua, then groaned up a winding dirt road 10 miles deep into the hills. Not a house in sight. Suddenly, in an explosion of chickens and children, we're in the farming village of El Regardio.

Neat time-roofed huts, fat hogs in the streets, plenty of giggling kids. Looks like a happy hamlet. But there's a sour edge of fear here.

I've been in Nicaragua three days, bird-dogging a U.S. delegation that includes Rep. Bob Edgar, D-Pa., Rep. Ted Weiss, D-N.Y., and professors and ministers from the Philadelpha area. We've talked to the Sandinista leadership, including President Daniel Otega.

But they're politicians. Like their Wasington counterparts, wrangling over the week's votes on $14 million for the U.S.-backed counter-revolutionaries-Contras—they're full of rhetoric. But here in the Estell hills, the war isn't an abstract debate over who's a Marxist and who's a "freedom figher."

It's about 15-year-olds carrying rifles and others being kidnapped, and about teachers being shot and trucks full of campesinos being shot into flames.

"Go up that road two kilometers [slightly more than a mile] and they'd nail you," said Juan Cruz Rodriguez, popping his palm with his fist. "The contras move in small bands at night. But they're bold. One hot afternoon in that field you see, they cut up one of our farmers with machetes. We found him hung from a tree."

You don't believe everything you hear in Central America. But you believe Juan Rodriguez, who is a ramrod 6-foot-4, has a countryboy directness, and looks like Matt Dillon in a straw hat.

"I have a 100-man militia [for a village of 550], but when the contras are close by, I can call in 800 [Army] troops," said the sheriff through an interpreter. "We've had about 40 casualties here. "We're a nice target. The contras ambush vehicles. They kidnap young men and take them over the border. Tell me, will President REE-gan get more money for the contras?"

The village had no TV set and only a few radios. Yet there was intense interest in the U.S. Congress debate 1,500 miles north. I sensed that to the campesinos Reagan is a powerful but irrational figure, like an intoxicated man in a bar with a gun. What will he do next?

I was also struck by the high morale. There may be grumbling in Managua over shortages and the draft, but the rural areas seem solidly pro-Sandinista. Granted, this was a co-op farm, where life is vastly improved since the Somoza regime. But if the CIA imagined the contras could divide the country, they've flopped. My impression in the Esteli hills is of country folk knitted together by the U.S.-backed invaders.

Peer into the crudest, dirt-floored hut and you spot posters on the wall: "After 50 Years Sandino [the legendary Nicaraguan general] Still Lives!" and "Yanquis Will Never Defeat Our Homeland!" Paradoxically, there is no open hostility toward Americans—and it seems half the Nicaraguan men proudly wear caps of the Baltimore Orioles, for whom countryman Tippy Martinez pitches.

The suffering, though, is real. A dozen women in dark dresses give visitors to El Regardio the names of sons and husbands lost to contra attacks. There was a similar sad litany of victims at a Christian-based hamlet where we ate tortillas and rice in the village huts.

"The contras ambushed a pickup truck and took away my 16-year-old son at gunpoint," said Santos Centeno Hudiel, a farmer with a stoical, mestizo face. "Please tell President REE-gan I want my son back."

If the local lamentations about contra brutalities are overwrought, U.S. religious workers who have spent years in the Nicaraguan boondocks sound trustworthy.

"In my community about 30 miles east of Esteli we had 33 civilian deaths last year," said Sister Susan Deliee, a Maryknoll nun. "If the contras get more money, I fear we'll see stepped-up harassment and kidnappings after the rainy season ends. Do Americans really want that?"

A young American priest named Bob Starke, who spent a day interpreting for us in Esteli, knows the contras first-hand. He was kidnapped by them.

"They stuck a gun to my head. They were taking me away, probably to be executed," said Starke, a lean, hard-worn young priest with a Robert Redford profile. "The contras had surrounded a church during our services. They let me go only because I was an American.

"But the lay priest—a 'Delegate of the Word'—wasn't as lucky. When we found him, he'd had his arms broken and been shot seven times. He was the most popular guy in the village, a real leader.

"That's the sort of person the contras go after. Of the 33 schools in my district, 30 are closed. The Cuban teachers, who were really good, heard they were on a contra death list."

A controversial CIA manual, exposed in October 1984, advised the contras to "neutralize selected government officials," a phrase that means assassination.

On the other hand, the Nicaraguan army has also played rough in Contra Country. It has chased thousands of peasants from the countryside into refugee camps, sometimes burning homes and killing animals. "It's like the U.S. Army free-fire zones in Vietnam," Lino Hernadez, head of the Human Rights Commission, told us. "Now the Army can attack anything that moves."

What about Soviet military in Contra Country? We saw no Soviet personnel, but a Soviet T-28 helicopter, wearing camouflage paint and the red Nicaraguan ball on its fuselage, was making low observation runs over a valley near Esteli.

So far the Sandinistas haven't used their most potent weapons, six MI-24 "Hind" helicopters considered the best gunships in the world. "Our technicians in Managua are testing them now," said Commandante Guerrillo Salvatierra.

You want to know about fighting contras, Salvatierra's your man. He's 29, bespectacled, a former revolutionary fighter, a U.S. baseball buff, and the No. 2 in command of this mountainous area where the contras concentrate.

At his rather casually guarded headquarters, Salvatierra pulled out maps and graphs and body counts. He says he's facing 4,800 contras plus 1,800 logistical troops. Judged by his casualty lists, the war's a standoff. Why?

"The contras move through isolated areas, attacking co-op farms, peasant villages, road crews," said the Nicaraguan commandante. "They're mobile. Their U.S. equipment, especially mortars and grenade launchers, are light. They move faster than we do.

"They recruit by kidnapping and propaganda. They tell young peasant men that we're against religion, that we're Communists, that we'll take away their land. Now, though, we're seeing a lot of contra deserters.

"If the U.S. really cuts off aid, they can't continue. They don't have the will to fight without the U.S. Most of their leaders are old Somoza officers. But if the CIA gets money and equipment to them, they can hide up in the hills and kill us forever."

That's the Army line. In the villages where we wandered, you didn't hear much talk of body counts, logistics, geopolitics, or Karl Marx. "Tell Reagan," said a black-garbed woman who'd lost a son, "we need peace."

As the moon come up, we were barreling down the highway to Managua.

At the U.S.-built Hotel Intercontinental, a Mexican band tootled by the swimming pool. The bar, as usual, was full of drifters, adventurers, con men and journalists drinking $1.70 Tona beer and $11-a-shot—yep, $11—imported Scotch.

The dirty little war of Contra Country was far away.

AT TIMES, THE WAR IS WORDS

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA.—You're a long way from the Third World when you have dinner at the U.S. ambassador's house.

No tin-roofed huts, no dusty streets full of skinny kids, no patrols toting Soviet rifles here.

Instead, tropical stars glint down on the ambassador's pool.

About 50 guests, including four U.S. congressmen and several European diplomats, are dining on the ambassador's terrace. There is the scent of perfume, gin, cigars and bougainvillea. Red-and-purple jungle birds squawk in cages by the outdoor bar.

Do not envy Harry E. Bergold Jr. for all this splendor. It's not often a U.S. ambassador does business in a country his president is trying to overthrow. You can detect the strains at the dinner party. This is a few days before Congress votes on $14 million in aid to the Contras—the counter revolutionaries. Arguments burst out across the linen tablecloths like firefights.

Now it's after midnight in Harry Bergold's living room. The ambassador eases his ample girth into a chair, sips a whiskey and soda, and analyzes The Situation.

"I don't know much about Central America," Bergold, a career diplomat who's come here from Eastern Europe, says drily. "The economy's bad here, but I guess it will bump along. People can go outside and pick fruit off trees."

Maybe Bergold's making a cynical joke. He throws in a few kind words for the Sandinistas: They have some exciting young leaders, and they're trying to improve health and literacy. But he says the United States can't tolerate even a mildly Marxist government here.

"Why? Propinquity to the U.S.," say Bergold. "And the domino theory."

The Rev. William Sloane Coffin has been listening with building tension to his fellow Yalie—Coffin was Yale '48, Bergold '53. A prominent figure in the anti-Vietnam War movement the burly Coffin finally bursts.

"Mister Ambassador, your analysis leaves out one question," Says Coffin in Wurlitzer-like tones. "Why does United States policy always wind up f..... the poor people of the world?"

Bergold blinks. "Well," he says smoothly, "I certainly feel for poor people up on the Nicaraguan border. They're simple folks who only care for their animals and their land. And they're caught between two armies."

"But Mister Ambassador," Coffin leans forward, shouting, "one . . . of . . . those . . . armies . . . is . . . ours!"

Bergold sighs, puts down his whiskey and spreads his hands.

"Look, I'm paid to sell President Reagan's policies," he says. "I can give you other scenarios. I don't know how realistic they are. An all-out military solution would be tragic. Negotiations would be ideal. But you can't trust the Sandinistas and you can't trust the U.S. Congress [to be consistent].

"So things will probably continue the way they are. The $14 million [for the rebels] doesn't mean anything. In the bars and grills of Washington, a low-intensity conflict looks good. It's cheap. It keeps up pressure. And you play for time."

The ambassador stretches. It's 1 a.m. "Wander around Nicaragua," he says "People talk freely. Figuring out the truth is hard."

Guests leave, some baffled, some resentful. Bergold and Coffin shake hands coolly.

He's right. Ronald Reagan calls it a "totalitarian state," but Nicaraguans talk endlessly—pro- and anti-Sandinista. Here are some voices of Nicaragua:

THE ANGRY TEACHER

Fernando Cardenal looks like a small-town, U.S. school principal. He's ramrod tall, mid-50s, an ex-Jesuit priest who is the minister of education. He grew irate when I asked when Sandinistas would allow freedom of the press:

"We're proud of raising our literacy rate from 12 to 51 percent. We're proud of our brilliant elections. How long did it take your American Revolution to do such things?

"Freedom of the press? To allow it in a war would be weak and stupid. I hate press censorship. I think it hurts us. But we have to censor the enemy paper [La Prensa]. Even the U.S. censors its press in wartime.

"Look, you can go back to your safe home. But I may be on the front, fighting U.S. Marines. When Reagan ends the war, we end censorship."

THE DISSIDENT BUSINESSMAN

Dr. Jaime Benjoechea is head of the Chamber of Commerce. He's typical of a surprisingly feisty anti-Sandinista business community that openly rails against the government:

"We can recognize a dictatorship a mile away. And this is a dictatorship. We were part of the rebellion against the Somoza regime. Now, the Sandinistas have broken every gentleman's agreement.

"We want them to stop confiscating businesses and give freedom to the newspapers. Oh, they don't use firing squads or torture. But they isolate people, muzzle the opposition. Ration cards, shortages . . . I think they're running out of political capital."

THE HUMAN RIGHTS MAVERICK

Lino Hernandez, a stocky man in his 30s, runs the Permanent Commission on Human Rights out of a walk-up office in downtown Managua. He spoke intensely of Sandinista abuses, but I had no way to verify his charges:

"The Sandinistas try to intimidate us. They have occupied our offices, put some of us in jail. We continue to work, tracking their abuses. They have 3,000 or 3,500 political prisoners. We've counted 127 political killings. They put people in prison for a year without charges. They put them in dark isolation cells for months. It ruins a man's nerve. The most feared prison is El Chipote, near the hotel. Freedom of expression is this country is an illusion."

THE WOMAN COMMANDER

Dora Maria Tellez looks like a vibrant, brunette U.S. college student. But she wears a Sandinista Army uniform and packs a .38 on her thigh. She says she's the granddaughter of a rebel general who fought the U.S. Marines in 1933. She dropped out of medical school to fight the Somoza regime. Now 29, she's commandante of Managua:

"I cannot accept that we torture anyone in prison. We know too well under Somoza what torture is. But the war destroys normal living. We have over 7,000 dead. Our boys 17 to 20 who should be in college must fight the contras.

"We need negotiation with the U.S., not the contras. As [Daniel] Ortega says, we want to talk to the circus owners, not the monkeys. If Reagan gets his $14 million, the war goes on for years. Or Reagan invades our country.

"We think he [Reagan] is a serious man, not a joke. We are well aware of Grenada. We are aware of the 10,000 U.S. troops, the tanks and planes, on our border. If Reagan finds the right excuse, anything will happen."

THE INTELLECTUAL

Kabier Gorostiaga, a goateed, energetic man, is an economist and ex-Jesuit priest who runs the Nicaraguan Institute for Social and Economic Research. He talked about what might happen next:

"This country is in serious trouble. We're using 40 percent of the budget to fight the war. When you mobilize 100,000 people, you have a manpower problem. Coffee, cotton and sugar are all down. We have loans of $4.7 billion and no way to make payments.

"Yes we have terrific potential. This isn't the Sahara. It's a country rich in minerals, crops, perhaps oil. And the Sandinistas are trying something new in the Third World, a mix of Marxism, Christianity and nationalism. It's not a little Soviet. People don't read "Das Kapital." This is a country of poets, not philosophers.

"But Reagan is the best friend the Soviets have, because he's driving Nicaragua to the Marxist model. It could end two ways. We could have a Vietnam-type invasion and a new banana republic. Or we'll have a new relationship with the U.S. The future is quite scary."

The cynical ambassador was right. Everyone talks. The truth is hard to find—but the voices of Nicaragua are hard to ignore.●

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me this opportunity to recognize the millions of small business men and women of this country. They are responsible for creating new jobs and helping spur economic growth. Five out of seven new jobs in the last 2 years were generated in small firms. Truly, small businesses are the foundation of our Nation's economy.

This week, May 5 to 11, has been designated as National Small Business Week, It is appropriate that we salute our hard-working entreprenuers in this fashion. This week the 50 State small business persons of the year are here in Washington to celebrate their success and their awards. I am pleased to congratulate these winners.

As chairman of the Small Business Subcommittee on Tax, access to equity capital and business opportunities, I am quite concerend that these businesses be given a fair shot to grow and expand in our economy. The essence of the American economic system of private enterprise is free competition. It is appropriate that we consider the small business community as we examine the proposed tax reform and tax simpification packages in the near future.

I am particularly pleased to recognize the Ohio Small Business Person of the Year, Mrs. Janet Makrauer from my home district of Cincinnati. She has made an outstanding contribution to our local business community through her business, Amko Plastics, Inc.

Small business men and women have always been known for their spirit of independence. This entrepreneurial streak in their nature has made possible many of our Nation's important research and innovations. It is important that this Congress continue to protect the climate necessary for this innovative spirit to grow and expand.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman. For allowing me a chance to congratulate these winners and support our Nation's vital small business community.●

RHEUMATOID ARTHRITIS RESEARCH DESERVES CAREFUL REVIEW BY NIH

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday two very important people, Mrs. Barbara Matia of Arizona and Mr. Douglas Reddan of California, testified before the Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services and Education, on which I serve. They came to speak about arthritis research and the work of Dr. Thomas Brown of the Arthritis Institute of the National Hospital in Arlington, VA. They are not scientists nor arthritis specialists. They came all the way to Washington to speak on behalf of the work of Dr. Brown because they believe Dr. Brown has found a treatment for arthritis that works. Both can attest to personal experiences that support Dr. Brown's work. Their testimony was fascinating and I urge my colleagues to review it. The testimony follows:

STATEMENT OF E. DOUGLAS REDDAN, TRUSTEE OF THE ARTHRITIS INSTITUTE OF THE NATIONAL HOSPITAL, ARLINGTON, VA.

Mr. Chairman and Distinguished Members of this Committee:

I am E. Douglas Reddan of Santa Barbara, a Trustee of the Arthritis Institute of the National Hospital for Orthopedics & Rehabilitation, Arlington, VA. Because two members of my family are arthritics, and unhappy with all available approved treatment methods, I have commuted monthly to Washington over the past 6 years studying the arthritis problem. I would like to tell you what I have found and I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you again for this purpose.

A half billion dollars of Federal funds over the past 4 decades have failed to produce any safe approved therapy offering even remotely comparable results to those achieved by Dr. Thomas McPherson Brown's unapproved antibiotic therapy. The approved drug of first choice, gold, has a 5-year success rate of only 10%. It has been reported in the literature as having the highest mortality rate of all prescribed drugs. This compares with Dr. Brown's 80% success rate over the same 5 year period with no toxicity problem.

The obvious question is why no approval.

Fifteen years ago promising clinical research in Dr. Brown's antibiotic approach to the disease was cut off from further NIH funding when a highly questionable short-term treatment program on only 13 patients, at Boston University, was interpreted by the rheumatology profession as disproving the efficacy of the antibiotic approach.

From that point on Dr. Brown went it alone financed by patient support. Today he is treating arthritics from all over the country, from all age groups, and all walks of life—including Congress, the White House, the Cabinet, the Supreme Court and the Embassies. With very few exceptions all are referrals from other physicians.

By now Dr. Brown has in all probability treated more arthritics than any other physician in the history of rheumatology—over 10,000. His practice is so crowded it takes up to a year for new patients to get an appointment. And, Dr. Brown is not alone; other physicians, under his guidance, in various parts of the country, are having similar success with his antibiotic therapy.

After spending several thousand hours with Dr. Brown, his colleagues at his Arthritis Institute and his patients, I've learned a great deal about the plight of arthritics and the hopeless, pain-racked future facing most of them. I've come to know he's closer to the truth about arthritis than anyone in the field.

The purpose of my testimony today is to suggest to this committee that a government sponsored clinical trial of Dr. Brown's antibiotic therapy is long overdue and that a reasonable course of action for this committee, in light of the markedly unimpressive record of existing approved therapies, and Dr. Brown's record of success, now clearly recorded in both retrospective and prospective clinical trials, is to see that such a clinical trial is underwritten by NIH.

The present annual cost of arthritis to the U.S. economy is $40 billion. That is due to grow to $100 billion by the year 2000, if such action is not taken now.

It is my hope that this Committee will lend its full support to a grant application for a trial of Dr. Brown's antibiotic approach now currently under review by NIH. The cost is only 2 cents per patient!

The rewards can be tremendous for all of us.

NIADDK's present position is that they will proceed only on a research basis of looking for the causative agent in the joint fluid of arthritics. When they find it they will find the means of attacking it. Idealistically, this sounds great; practically it makes no sense. None of the existing approved therapies were approved on this basis. If they were accidentally found to have positive effects on the disease, they were approved for use. In all cases long term usage brought out their severe toxicity problems—often worse than the disease itself.

The research approach proposed by NIADDK will take years. That means the benefit to today's patients is a long way off. I'm here representing millions of those patients. They want relief and control of their disease now. Dr. Brown's antibiotic treatment provides that. There is no justifiable reason for depriving these millions of its benefits now, short of the proposed clinical trial which can be conducted for pennies per patient.

Available independent data on a large group of patients clearly shows its long time disease control superiority over other therapies. To hold it back for years more from today's arthritics is, in my personal view, criminal.

When the proposed clinical trial is completed I have no doubt but that the results will change the direction of emphasis of most of todays arthritis researchers greatly enhancing the likelihood of a cure in the near future.

I'm sure you have noticed that a great deal of the support money provided and to be provided for arthritis programs is for the purpose of improving surgical techniques for joint replacement, etc. and teaching patients how to live with their arthritis. This is all surely needed but it is also a clear admission that approved therapies are not working.

I'm not a zealot—I'm simply a person able to recognize the difference between programs that are not working and one that is. Fifteen years ago a wrong turn was taken. The time has come to admit it. I'll be happy to answer any questions you may have.

TESTIMONY OF BARBARA A. MATIA

Mr. Chairman, Members of Congress and Staff:

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you again.

It is hard for me to believe that the program that brought me from being bedridden as a result of rheumatoid arthritis to being fully functional in 6 years is still not widely available to the 36 million arthritics in our country today!

As you may remember from my testimony last year, the program I am talking about is a treatment program for arthritis developed by Dr. Thomas Brown of the Arthritis Institute of the National Hospital which uses antibiotics in conjunction with anti-inflammatories. As you may also remember, I told you that Dr. Brown told me the first time I met with him that I would be getting worse for a period of time and would then begin to improve each year thereafter as long as I remained on the program. It was because I worsened, as predicted, that I sensed this doctor was actually tinkering with the disease process that had made me feel so ill. The fact that this doctor had the confidence to tell me that I would be getting worse before I got better and the fact that that actually occurred showed that there was real significance to this program.

This is a program that arthritics travel from all over the United States and the world to receive; that patients are willing to wait more than 6 months to a year to receive for the first time; that the International Congress of Rheumatology selected for presentation at their annual meeting in Sydney, Australia later this month; that is safer and more effective over a long term, without toxicity, than any other treatment currently available; and that could lead us to a breakthrough to the cure for arthritis.

Three significant developments have occurred since I was here last year. First, Dr. John T. Hicks, a noted rheumatologist, has joined the Arthritis Institute because of the promise he feels Dr. Brown's work holds for relieving the suffering of arthritics. Immediately prior to joining the Arthritis Institute, Dr. Hicks served in the Rheumatology/Immunology Division of the Smith Kline Beckman Corporation where he was responsible for large-scale, controlled trials of oral gold therapy. Thus, he is experienced in developing, organizing and directing clinical trials of long acting drugs in double-blind studies.

The second significant event is the completion of an evaluation of the Arthritis Institute's patient records by an independent biostatistical firm of national reputation. Using 98 patients as the control group, this retrospective study indicated that after five years of treatment, over 70% of the control group were still benefitting from antibiotic therapy, a percentage far higher than with other treatment programs. The study concludes that in spite of the results noted in the 1971 Boston study, among others, a properly designed and managed clinical trial of the antibiotic treatment program is in order at this time.

The third significant development is that a grant application has been filed and is now pending at the National Institutes of Health requesting a clinical trial which will compare the antibiotic treatment program to gold therapy as a treatment for rheumatoid arthritis. Based upon my experience over the last three years discussing the antibiotic treatment program with the medical establishment, I believe that it will take the involvement of this subcommittee to make sure that the opportunity before us does not die in the peer review committees. The grant application calls for a political decision, not a medical decision. The political decision is whether this subcommittee thinks the 36 million arthritics are worth 2 cents per year over the next 3 years which could potentially lead to the availability of the best treatment program for arthritis yet known. It is the clinical trial which will provide the medical decision! If the peer review committees turn down the grant on the basis of earlier trials improperly conducted, or if this grant is not made for whatever reason, we may have missed one of those rare opportunities in the history of mankind to positively affect the human condition. When you consider that the amount being requested is only six cents per arthritic, can we afford not to permit the trial to be conducted?

To the arthritics in this country, this grant could mean the difference between just coping and a full life, pain and no pain, crippling and no crippling, and despair and hope.

Let us all stay involved in the processing of this application so we can put this program to the test! This could be the best 6 cents the Federal Government has or ever will spend on me!●

AN AMERICAN RESURGENCE IS UNDERWAY—HAVE YOU NOTICED?

HON. THOMAS E. PETRI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, recently Mr. Robert V. Krikorian, chairman and chief executive officer of Rexnord, Inc., gave a very interesting and valuable speech on the subject of America's resurgence. So that Mr. Krikorian's remarks may be available to a wider audience, I ask that this speech be inserted in the RECORD at this point:

AN AMERICAN RESURGENCE IS UNDERWAY—HAVE YOU NOTICED?

I want to address you today as a representative of the capital goods industry, which a couple of years ago was regarded as increasingly non-competitive, saddled with obsolete plants, without much hope for the future. Some of the more imaginative journalist called us the "rust belt."

Earlier this year, the Center for the Study of American Business at Washington University in St. Louis, issued a paper examining the problem. The study suggested that those predicting the "rust belt" phenomenon were drawing long-term pessimistic conclusions by merely extending short-term data over a longer period of time. This rather simplistic approach is being proven wrong.

Conventional wisdom in the early days of this decade was that the "post industrial" era was upon us and that manufacturing would decline, transferred to other parts of the world, most notably to the Far East. There is indeed a trend to the Far East for capital goods manufacturing, but if we in this nation stay ahead of competition—which we are doing with increasing success—we can retain our lead. I think our American economic system works best when challenged to be creative. That's the condition I see right now—through cooperative effort, we're meeting the challenge and are becoming stronger.

Management of American industrial companies have awakened to the fact that we are operating in a global market requiring a global outlook. We're still going to manufacture products that American and world industry needs, but our factories are becoming more flexible, efficient, smarter and better. The microchip is finding a place on the factory floor. What we're increasingly seeing is fewer people making more and more products for more and more people. And let me emphasize that we're accomplishing this without a national industrial policy and without central economic planning.

American industry is going with—and in many cases is leading—what I believe is a national resurgence. I can see it all around us. The economy is on the move, inflation is down, interest rates are falling, there's a new emphasis on product quality, plant utilization is up and there's a feeling of shared commitment between labor and management.

But I think it would be fair to ask an obvious question, how can there be a national resurgence when:

The national deficit is still sky-high

Our negative balance of payments is growing rapidly

Many of our cities still aren't safe

Unemployment is still at 7.2 percent

We still have the hard-core poor

Is this what resurgence looks like?

Yes, I think it probably is. That's the way our system works . . . in fits and starts. Nobody ever claimed that our free society is neat, well-ordered or predictable. While this is the system that offers each individual American the best chance for opportunity and personal growth, it takes time to change negative attitudes built up over recent years, attitudes such as:

No growth

Reduced personal expectations

Attacks on traditonal values

A national "malaise"

And an onslaught of national self-criticism—it seems that for a long time, some of the most spiteful criticsm of the United States came from our fellow Americans!

I would liken our current condition to an outstanding athlete starting to train and compete after a long layoff. Muscles are sore and some parts of the body aren't working too well yet, but our performance is getting better and with determination we can continue our world leadership position.

Four things strike me about our national resurgence and I want to discuss each briefly:

First, and possibly most important, is the awesome force inherent in our American economic system. This was almost totally unexpected by most pundits and economists here and abroad. We had apparently lost sight of the fact—or we forgot—that our system works best when left relatively unattended by the government. That's the very nature of our system. It's built in.

To put the thoughts of the late Harvard teacher and economist, Joseph Shumpeter, into a present day context, the American economic system, not by coincidence, Shumpeter would say, but by virtue of its merchanism, progressively raises the living standard and quality of life of the American people.

The second thing that strikes me is the natural optimism, the national pride, the buoyant outlook that is native to our people.

What some people call our "gross national spirit" seems to be on the rise. Five years ago, in 1979, Public Opinion magazine reported that the average American said that he was worse off than five years before, and that he would be even worse off five years later. Last year, the poll was taken again and our average American felt that he was better off than five years ago, and was confident that he would be even better off five years from now. Other polls show a similar spirit.

There are plenty of other optimistic signs that are clearly visible: Inflation is way down and I believe that it is going to stay down. Employment is up and unemployment has been coming down. The index of leading economic indicators over the last two years or so have been good, with recent months leveling off—which I think is healthy. Industry Week magazine recently released its annual CEO survey which showed that 78 percent of surveyed companies planned increased capital spending in 1985 and about 40 percent have plans to expand production capacity—and this last figure has been typically in the 20 percent range. This survey, however, was taken before the proposed changes in the treatment of depreciation for tax purposes were announced.

My perception is that today more Americans feel that we're in charge of our own future. We have a growing confidence in ourselves and in our country—we know that we can solve many of our own problems—that our problems are solvable if we let our system work.

Nonetheless, we do have problems that are serious. We still have hard-core unemployed and single-parent families that are second and sometimes third generation. We continue to live in an unsettled world and we are still struggling with opposing views of what role government should play in our lives.

But as we are solving our other problems by letting the American system work, we will make progress in solving some of these problems as well.

The third thing that strikes me about our national resurgence is that we're recapturing some strongly held feelings that have been traditional to the American people.

For example, the feeling of self reliance as individuals. This becomes very apparent when we look at how many Americans volunteered to work on worthwhile projects—usually in the neighborhoods and local communities. In 1983, 92 million people contributed time that was worth $70 billion—that's an increase of 8 million people over 1981.

Voluntary giving is up, too. In 1983, $65 billion was contributed, a ten and a half percent increase over the previous year.

On a more sobering note, many of us as individuals—especially more fortunate, affluent individuals—should be giving more. Beginning with the 1982 tax year, the maximum tax rate on personal income was lowered from 70 percent to 50 percent. But while one survey showed that personal giving by those in the $15-30,000 earnings range increased their giving by 6.8 percent, those making $50,000 and more decreased their giving. I know that much of this money which isn't contributed is being invested, which creates more jobs and makes for a better society. But I do believe that those of us who benefit most from our system must shoulder our share of the load.

I'm personally pleased to see a commitment to corporate giving spontaneously springing up throughout the nation. Five percent and two percent organizations started in the Twin Cities in Minnesota and have spread to such places as Seattle, San Francisco, Phoenix and other cities, most recently including Milwaukee. In just one year, 107 businesses in Milwaukee reported that they are contributing at least two percent of their domestic pre-tax earnings to worthwhile community and national organizations. Just think what could happen if such a movement was promoted by Rotary or other groups in this city!

And the fourth thing that strikes me about our national resurgence is the increasing awareness that there are values in our free society that we live by, that they are valid and important to a free society after all, and are worth passing along to our children. A free society is dependent on such values as honesty and ethical behavior, morality and religion, family values, the rule of law, the sovereignty of the individual and the simple virtue of helping our neighbors.

It seems to me that one of the striking features of this year's presidential election was the issue of religion.

The important thing about this issue is that it became an issue at all. And I think that was healthy. Because religion is so closely tied to societal values, the issue got people thinking about the place those values play in our lives—in our political and personal lives and in our schools and other institutions.

I hope that during the next few years we will see more dialogue and serious discussion. This is too important to conceal behind cliches or slogans. Religion has always had a major role in our national life and we short-change ourselves and especially our children if we deny or ignore it.

To try to teach American history without explaining the influence of religion on our founding fathers is an incomplete reading of the subject. To try to illuminate the teaching of the law while forced to ignore the great laws of religion—including the Ten Commandments—is to cripple the teacher's ability to teach. To reduce the teaching of values to what is called "values clarification"—where all values are equally valid—only produces confusion. I hope that the dialogue about religion will heed the words of historian Will Durant: he said, "There is no significant example in history, before our time, of a society successfully maintaining moral life without the aid of religion."

One of the prophets of our national resurgence has been Adam Smith. Critics of the ideas of Adam Smith complain that he extolled the benefits of self interest rather than a commitment to the common good. Yet Smith saw clearly that while self interest would lead to the common good, it would do so only if most people in society accepted shared ethical and moral values as a guide to their behavior. The United States is a nation with shared values and the success of the American system has certainly proved Adam Smith right.

I recently completed a three-year term as chairman of the board of the Ethics Resource Center, a national organization devoted to extending personal, political and economic freedom by strengthening the ethical values that make them possible. This experience gave me a sharpened sense that:

First, ethical values are what hold our diverse society together. From our earliest history, the United States has been a heterogeneous, pluralistic society. We are a nation of immigrants whose roots extend to every other nation and culture on earth. We've seen other nations torn apart because their cultural, ethnic or racial pluralism acted as a centrifugal force, hopelessly dividing their people. What was it that enabled our pluralistic society to so far avoid this calamity? Only one thing: a shared system of ethical values. Because we shared common values and a common hope, we could trust each other. However, it seems to me that we in America are also in danger of becoming caught in the centrifuge of pluralism. We seem to be loosening our hold on the nation's greatest dream—E pluribus unum, out of many, one. The metaphor of the "melting pot" may no longer be operative. We seem to perceive more readily our differences, our special interests, than we do our common interests and the deeply shared values that make freedom and pluralism possible. This is a trend that we must work to halt.

Second, I've found that people in and out of business are increasingly concerned with ethical conduct. I'm always distressed to hear fellow business people concede that we should operate honestly and ethically, even though this makes it harder to be successful. This is nonsense. Ethical conduct makes it easier to do business—in the short and the long run.

And third, I believe that each of us as individuals has an ethical responsibility for our families and neighbors. In the same way, each of us as a corporate citizen has a similar responsibility for our community, state and nation. So I see a direct link between ethical values and discharging our responsibilities through voluntary action.

I recently joined the Board of Directors of an organization called VOLUNTEER: The National Center for Citizen Involvement. VOLUNTEER is doing some exceptional work through its national network of Voluntary Action Centers. This organization is headed by former Michigan Governor George Romney, who is deeply committed to voluntary citizen involvement in our society. "Volunteerism," says Gov. Romney, "is the price of freedom."

Anthropologist Margaret Mead once observed, "If you look closely, you will see that almost anything that really matters to us, anything that embodies our deepest commitment to the way human life should be lived and cared for, depends on some form—often many forms—of volunteerism."

So we have a national resurgence. But what can American business people do to make sure it keeps going? Just one thing, it seems to me. And that is to recognize the inherent strength in our American system and help make it work. I would like to suggest five ways to make this happen:

First, don't panic when some part doesn't work as well as we would like. Let our system work, but even more important, preserve our system so we are able to pass it along to succeeding generations.

Second, resist the powerful impulse to run to the government when we think we need help—and here I would mention subsidies, tariffs, special legislation or other preferential treatment.

Third, give support to individuals, companies, public servants, educators and others in their efforts to strengthen our system.

Fourth, make a major effort to assure that ethical conduct is expected in all levels and functions of our companies and businesses.

And fifth, encourage and reward those people in our organizations who voluntarily engage in worthwhile outside activities. This not only makes for better communities, but it sharpens the leadership abilities of our people and makes them better employees.

I believe that the American system of laws and limited government is the best governmental system ever devised. If the ultimate test of a national system is how well it can and does serve people, then ours is superior to any other.

It's up to us to support it and to make it even stronger.●

CONSUMER MONEY SHOULD FUND CONSUMER REPRESENTATION

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, today, I introduce a bill with my colleagues Messrs. LELAND and WAXMAN that would guarantee consumer representation at future telephone rate proceedings at the State and Federal level.

The last decade of change in the telecommunications industry has been nothing short of epochal. During this momentous period, the consumer has seen many changes and proposals being discussed without a consumer representative sitting at the table. As frequently happens at such discussions, those who are represented look after their interests very well, and those who are not represented suffer. Consumers have suffered at rate proceedings throughout the country because they have not enjoyed adequate representation. This proposal will help us achieve that goal.

In November 1984, the Federal Communications Commission ruled that AT&T had overcharged consumers by approximately $101 million through 1978 overcharges on interstate and overseas phone rates. The rate of return set by the Commission was set at 10 percent, but in fact AT&T had earned 10.22 percent. With interest, the sum now due consumers is at least $178 million.

This bill would set aside $35 million of that total for consumer representation in State and Federal rate proceedings. A board consisting of representatives from consumer groups, small business, National Association of Regulated Utility Commissioners, National Association of State Utility Consumer Advocates, and the National Association of State Attorneys General would administer the trust fund. Proceedings from the trust fund would be distributed each year to groups seeking to represent residential and small business consumers in rate proceedings.

The rest of the refund money would be returned to consumers under the proposed FCC plan. Consequently, this proposal creates a solid funding for consumer interests and still gives some money back to consumers.

I urge my colleagues to support this proposal as a sound method of financing adequate consumer representation. This proposal would provide limited and controlled funds to groups representing constituents not adequately represented.●

A TRIBUTE TO JACK DAUM

HON. MANUEL LUJAN, JR.

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute today to Mr. Jack Daum, a long-time employee of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, who retired on April 1, 1985.

Jack was the very first Republican staff member of the Interior Committee, having been hired for that position when minority staff positions were authorized in 1974.

There are a lot of things I could say about Jack, who has distinguished himself in many ways, but I would like to include in the RECORD an article written by some of his friends and fellow staffers.

I think the following article captures the measure of the man in a unique and colorful way:

HOW DO WE REMEMBER JACK DAUM?

(By His Fellow Staffers)

Jack Daum officially retired from his congressional staff position on April 1, 1985; even though here it is mid-May and he hasn't yet cleaned out his desk and departed the premises.

Those of us who have been his friends, and worked with him professionally over the years, will not soon forget him.

You see, Jack was truly a remarkable individual. He was a man of strong personal convictions, fierce pride, and one who was a dedicated professional. When he believed in something, he could be strongly partisan, and he never backed off from a fight.

At the same time, he worked well with staff professionals from the other party, and tried to be accommodating in every way possible. He was one who did his homework and wanted to be fully informed on any issue or legislative matter in which he was personally involved.

If this made him opinionated in the eyes of some, and unwavering in the minds of others, it just may have been that he knew more about a given subject than many of those around him.

Jack was an incessant reader, on a wide range of subjects. That might help explain why he was a successful newspaper reporter and editor, political activist, public relations expert, and congressional staffer.

His newspaper experience included several years with the old Washington Times-Herald, where his investigative reporting received him a Pulitzer nomination; and service with the Daily News-Miner in Fairbanks, AK, and the Daily Alaska Empire in Juneau.

While in Alaska in the early 1950's, prior to statehood, Jack became somewhat of a legend, not only because of his skills as a reporter, but as a radio personality, and as one who didn't hesitate to make the news on several momentous occasions.

Two of his more notable activities included single handedly capturing a wild bear cub, for a local zoo, and helping engineer the removal of a whale carcass that had washed ashore. Media cameras were rolling on each of these occasions.

While working in Alaska, Jack met and married a young coed at the University of Alaska, the former Alice Plunkett. This union produced eight children, five daughters and three sons.

On leaving Alaska in 1956, Jack made his way to southern California, where he was an early activist in the conservative political movement that was later to produce several prominent political figures, including the President of the United States.

Jack remained active politically, after moving to Santa Fe, NM, in 1963, and his work on behalf of Congressman Manuel Lujan, Jr., landed him a congressional staff job in Washington in 1969.

During his 11 years on the staff of the Interior Committee, he was best known for his expertise on Indian issues and water legislation affecting Western States.

An avid fisherman, Jack found his way to Deale, MD, where he bought a home on the Chesapeake Bay; and always seemed to be the owner of one or more boats, even if they weren't all seaworthy. Widely known on the bay, as either "High Pockets" or "Capn' Jack," he was the man many people turned to for information on where the fish were biting.

His latest boat was appropriately dubbed "The Office," and when anyone inquired as to Jack's whereabouts, the obvious answer took on special meaning to those who knew him.

Besides his family and job, Jack had many other interests, including a leadership role in various American Legions posts, and work with underprivileged youth.

It always went without saying that Jack had an understanding wife, who never knew when he was coming home; and when he did, she many times would welcome one of his new friends, usually someone temporarily down on his luck, who would take up residence in the family guest room.

While not everyone who knew him recognized Jack as a man of impeccable character, without exception everyone knew him as a genuine "character." He was quite capable of perpetrating the "master con," if in his mind circumstances warranted it. And, quite often the circumstances did.

Jack never spent a lot of money on new suits. Had he done so, in his mind this would have smacked of pretentiousness, and, more importantly, would have been a downright waste of good money.

In early June, Jack will be departing his home on the Chesapeake Bay, and returning to his adopted State of New Mexico. He will be exchanging life on the bay, for the more tranquil, but equally enjoyable, trout fishing in New Mexico's northern mountains.

Those who knew and worked with Jack wish him well in retirement. His friends and acquaintances on the Hill include Members, who knew they could depend on Jack for that "quick in-depth speech"; fellow staffers who could turn to him for that needed information on almost any subject; and a multitude of others who Jack befriended at one time or another, or invited for a memorable day on the bay.

With his departure, will Jack soon become the forgotten man? Not on your life. To a lot of people on Capitol Hill, from all walks of life, Jack Daum is the man who won't soon be forgotten.●

THE 1984 CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR DRUG ABUSE CONTROL

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the worldwide epidemic of drug trafficking and drug abuse continues to intensify at an alarming rate, and the associated problems of crime, corruption, and terrorism have reached epidemic proportions. Reports released earlier this year by the International Narcotics Control Board [INCB], the Department of State, the House Foreign Affairs Committee, and the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, on which I serve as the ranking minority member, all attest to this situation. It is clear that the production and trafficking of drugs, financed by organized crime, is undermining the political, economic, and social institutions of the entire international community. Despite the efforts of this Nation to assist drug producing countries to reduce an eliminate the illicit production of drugs, we expected more drugs than ever before to be produced this year and to be available throughout every city, town, and school district in our Nation.

The international drug trafficking syndicates use their vast profits to develop sophisticated techniques to cultivate, process, and market illicit narcotics. These profits allow them to assemble the most modern boats, aircraft, radar, and other equipment to conduct their clandestine operations. Many nations are beginning to take positive steps against drug trafficking and drug producton within their own borders. For example, under the leadership of President Belesario Betancur of Colombia, since mid-1984, that government has begun an intensive campaign against drug traffickers. It has destroyed numerous cocaine processing laboratories and seized more than 37 tons of coca/cocaine and thousands of tons of marijuana. In addition, it has extradited several drug traffickers wanted in the United States, which to date has already resulted in one conviction.

Actions such as those taken in Colombia have led to increased frustration by the drug traffickers, including increased acts of terrorism. The Minister of Justice of Colombia has been murdered, coca eradication and crop substitution specialists in Peru have been gunned down, our embassies have been bombed, hit squads have been sent to our shores, and a price tag has been placed on the head of our drug law enforcement officials by the drug traffickers.

It is also significant that drug producing nations are beginning to feel the impact of drug abuse and the corruptive influence of the drug traffickers in their own countries. In Burma, Peru, Bolivia, Colombia, Mexico, Pakistan, and Thailand, drug abuse has become a serious problem, and this in abuse is leading drug producing nations to the unavoidable conclusion that drug production must be brought under control.

In order to overcome the global menace of drug abuse and narcotics trafficking, it is essential that all nations of the world join together in a coordinated and cooperative effort to combat illicit drug production and drug trafficking. A key element in any such worldwide effort is the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control [UNFDAC]. Since its establishment in 1971, UNFDAC has been instrumental in calling attention to the needs of the world community in fighting the deadly scourge of drug trafficking and drug abuse. Under the very capable leadership of executive Director, Dr. Guiseppe di Gennaro, the Fund is currently developing projects to control the illicit production of coca in the sub-Andean region of South America. These special projects are the direct result of a 5-year, $41 million pledge from the Government of Italy, which is to be commended for its most generous contribution to UNFDAC. Both the Government of Italy and Dr. di Gennaro are also to be commended for their dedicated efforts to combat drug trafficking and drug abuse.

Despite these worthy actions, contributions to UNFDAC by many nations are nominal, and in some cases nonexistant. In 1981, only 35 of the 157 member nations of the United Nations contributed a total of $4.9 billion to the Fund, which when combined with private contributions of $754,150, equaled a total of $5.6 million. In 1982, 42 nations contributed a meager $6.7 million to the Fund; private donations amounted to $581,929 for a grand total of only $7.3 million. In 1983, the number of nations contributing to the U.N. Drug Fund dropped to 28, and collectively they pledged a paltry $3.7 million. When combined with private contributions of $255,953, the total for 1983 amounted to a mere $3.9 million.

In 1984, the number of nations declined to a record low of 17 or less than 11 percent of the 159 member nations of the United Nations. Although the amount contributed increased to slightly more than $8 million—$8,028,926—when combined with private donations and interest of $561,654, the global "war" on drugs amounted to only $8,590,580. The bulk of the increase, however, can be attributed to two nations: Italy and the United States, which contributed $7.3 million or 91 percent.

At the November 1984 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities, the number of nations that pledged to contribute to UNFDAC increased to 25 or less than 16 percent of the United Nations membership, with contributions amounting to a meager $2,357,950—hardly enough to purchase a sophisticated high-speed coastal patrol boat.

At a time when international drug syndicates are reaping huge profits from their illicit activities and continue to undermine the social, economic, and political institutions of the international community, anything less than total support of UNFDAC by nations of the international community raises serious questions about our resolve in fighting this global drug menace. Annually scrapping together between $4 million and $8 million by the entire world community is not the way to effectively conduct a "global war" on drug trafficking and drug abuse. In this regard, nations of the world must intensify their commitment to waging "war" on drugs by developing a global drug strategy and by providing the funds, personnel, equipment, and resources to implement that strategy.

Finally, it is important that other U.N. agencies intensify their drug-related efforts and devote greater resources to the issues of drug abuse. The World Health Organization [WHO], the International Labor Organization [ILO], the Food and Agriculture Organization [FAO], and the United National Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization [UNESCO] must elevate drug-related activities to a top priority on their agency programs. In addition, we must change the current practice in which UNFDAC underwrites significant portions of the drug-related activities of the WHO, the ILO, the FAO, and UNESCO. It is time for these organizations to fund their drug-related activities out of their own regular budgets rather than relying on UNFDAC's scarce dollars derived by the voluntary contributions of member nations to support their activities.

Mr. Speaker, in an effort to inform my colleagues on the level of contributions to the U.N. Fund for Drug Abuse Control and to urge them to continue to support the vital work of this organization, I am inserting at this point in the RECORD four documents: A status report of cash contributions or pledges received during the years 1971–83; a status report of cash contributions pledged or received during 1984, as of October 31, 1984; a report on pledges announced for 1985 at the United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities, November 7–8, 1984; and a report of UNFDAC funding and expenditures for other U.N. drug-related agencies.

SBA OK'D LOANS TO COMPANIES LINKED TO ALLEGED MOB FIGURES

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I submitted for the RECORD part 1 of a five-part investigative series by Newsday on improper loan practices involving Long Island businesses which were financed by the Small Business Administration. Today, I would like to submit part 2 of that series, published in the May 6 issue of Newsday, while reiterating that I do not believe the questionable activities outlined in these articles are widespread. However, at a time when we can no longer afford to overlook wasteful Federal programs, it is important that we examine the deficiencies in the SBA to make certain that the agency's programs are serving a public need, rather than creating more inefficiency in the Federal bureaucracy.

[From Newsday, May 6, 1985]

SBA OK'D LOANS TO COMPANIES LINKED TO ALLEGED MOB FIGURES

(This is the second in a five-part series on publicly financed small business loans, the result of a 13-month investigation by reporters Brian Donovan and Bob Porterfield of the Newsday investigative team. More than 5,000 documents were examined and 120 persons interviewed. The series was written by Donovan.)

While various federal agencies fight organized-crime figures on Long Island, another one sometimes helps finance them: the Small Business Administration.

A Newsday investigation has found loans totaling $1,635,000 from the SBA to at least six Long Island companies that have been linked to reputed organized-crime figures and their business associates.

All of these loans have become problems for the SBA—and the taxpayers—and the agency's handling of the loans illustrates some of the shortcomings that congressional investigators have found in SBA procedures around the country.

For example:

The SBA loaned $500,000 to an East Islip car dealership without asking questions that might have disclosed the financial interest of Michael Franzese, named by federal prosecutors as one of Long Island's major organized-crime figures. After a few payments, the SBA loan went into default.

The SBA granted a series of loans on a Smithtown restaurant despite its well-publicized history of mob involvement and defaulting on debts. SBA officials say that a $350,000 loan on the restaurant is now delinquent, but the agency has negotiated away its first claim on the collateral.

The SBA loaned $150,000 to a Huntington car lot run by a Franzese associate, Donald Pumalo, without checking to see if he had the required state car-dealer's license, which he didn't. The loan helped keep Pumalo's corporation in business while he used the company to defraud a bank. He then defaulted on the SBA loan, leaving the agency no collateral.

The SBA loaned $150,000 to a St. James car lot, Auto Omni Inc., without discovering that its owner had a criminal record. When Auto Omni defaulted on the loan, another firm in which the owner was involved got a second $150,000 SBA loan for a car lot at the same address. That company defaulted as well, leaving the SBA with no collateral for either loan.

The SBA loaned $250,000 to a Dix Hills country club run by Salvatore Avellino, since accused of being a mob soldier. Half of the money was supposed to have been used to put up a building. But when Avellino defaulted, the SBA found it couldn't foreclose because its collateral didn't include the land under the building.

In some of these cases, deeper background checks could have established the criminal records or associations of the loan applicants. In other instances, closer attention to such basic procedures as verifying required business licenses and securing loan collateral could have prevented losses to applicants whose criminal activities or associations did not become apparent until long after the loans were granted.

Such cases, to be sure, represent only a small fraction of the hundreds of loans the SBA makes on Long Island, and SBA officials say they do not knowingly make loans to mob-connected businesses. Fraud against lending institutions is one of the specialties of organized crime, and SBA officials say it is not surprising that their agency sometimes gets stung.

But the extent of this sting on Long Island remains in question. SBA officals have refused to release key records on these loans and others suspected of similar links to the underworld. Walter Leavitt, who heads the SBA's Long Island office in Melville, repeatedly said he was under orders not to discuss details of how these loans and others were granted.

The SBA has denied Newsday access to its records on failed loans, despite a federal court ruling that such files are public. Some records were obtained by Newsday under the Freedom of Information Act. But key passages were censored. Information for this article has been assembled from public documents, interviews, and fragmentary SBA records obtained through other channels.

Leavitt said mob-related loans discovered by Newsday do not indicate that SBA operations here are more lax than elsewhere. Ever since the SBA went into business in 1953, periodic scandals have erupted around the country over loans to mobsters and their companies.

'I think it's happened all over the SBA, nationwide," Leavitt said. "Any organization that deals in money has problems, whether it's a bank, the SBA, a finance company, anybody. There are guys sitting up nights trying to figure out ways to get something for nothing. Things, do go through the cracks, and we make mistakes."

Nevertheless, practices leading to such mistakes have been documented repeatedly in reports by congressional committees and the SBA's own inspector general. They include granting loans not backed by adequate collateral, relying too heavily on investigations of applicants by banks granting SBA-guaranteed loans, and failing to monitor collateral so it doesn't disappear when loans go bad.

For instance, the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported in 1981 that "SBA routinely honors the guarantee agreement with participating banks without knowing the existence, condition and location of collateral pledged to secure the loan." Only 4.6 percent of the collateral's stated value was recovered in the loan sample cited by the GAO.

In 1983, the SBA inspector-general's office, which investigates mismanagement and corruption in the agency, criticized the New York district office, which includes Long Island: "The major causes attributable to the New York District Office of troubled loans were inadequate loan processing and, to a limited extent, closing and servicing practices, making possible loan actions based on incomplete and inadequate documentation and analysis, contrary to agency policies and procedures."

The inspector general's office, however, is not without its own problems. Until last year, when Newsday began looking into the SBA, the agency had only one investigator from the inspector general's office assigned to the New York metropolitan area. Now, the New York office has three investigators to monitor one of the nation's major centers of business—and organized crime.

SBA officials say they have no system of liaison with local or state law enforcement agencies. The agency's only method for screening loan applicants for criminal connections is to send principals' names to Washington for an FBI computer check. "It's not foolproof," Leavitt said. He also said that added checks with local law enforcement and regulatory agencies would strengthen the loan procedure. But, he added, such a policy would have to be implemented on a national basis.

A problem in the past, said Leavitt, has been pressure under previous administrations to make as many loans as possible. ". . . We had quotas. You didn't make your loans, you'd get calls from Washington saying: 'What are you guys doing up there?' "

When a mob-connected company defaults on its SBA financing and goes out of business, the damage often goes beyond the loss to the taxpayers. Typically, the company also fails to pay its suppliers, which may be other small businesses unable to survive the loss, and runs up delinquent balances with utilities, insurance, workers compensation and state and local taxes—all losses that ultimately are passed on to the public.

RUMPLIK CHEVROLET

As business associates, Walter Doner and Michael Franzese seemed a mismatch. A casting director might choose Doner to play an "Our Town" sort of character: the affable, folky, small-town car dealer, active in Rotary, Chamber of Commerce, Little League, a trustee of his church.

For Franzese, the role would likely be cast to type: the streetwise son of a prominent gangster, handsome, articulate, his manner alternately charming and steely, outspokenly bitter toward the government, veteran of several brushes with the law, target of an extensive federal investigation into his business dealings.

Franzese, identified by federal prosecutors as a soldier in the Colombo crime family, denies any connection with organized crime. He was recently acquitted on loan-sharking charges and says he is the victim of the federal government's enmity toward his father: John Franzese; known as Sonny, a reputed Colombo family captain.

Mismatched or not, Doner and Franzese were the main players in a chain of events that included a defaulted $500,000 SBA loan and the financial collapse of one of East Islip's older businesses, a 58-year old Chevrolet dealership, Rumplik Chevrolet, of which Doner was president. The collapse also cost about 25 people their jobs and left behind at least $300,000 in unpaid debts.

Now Doner, who already is under indictment for tax evasion, says prosecutors have told him that he and Franzese will be named in another indictment. "Part of it is SBA fraud," Donor said, adding he believed neither he or nor Franzese did anything wrong. Franzese invested $100,000 in the business, borrowing the money from a bank and never repaying the loan.

Walter Leavitt, who heads the SBA's Long Island office in Melville, said the agency had no idea of Franzese's involvement. His name is not on the 1982 loan application. "If I had seen that any place, it would have jumped off the page," Leavitt said. Federal sources said that Michael Franzese has been considered an organized-crime figure by the FBI for the past six years.

Although the SBA has refused to release the Rumplik file, records obtained by Newsday show that the agency did not ask a key question that could have revealed Franzese's interest. Part of the loan was to start a car-leasing business at the agency. For tax purposes, car dealers generally form separate corporations to handle leasing. Nowhere in the voluminous SBA paperwork was Doner asked whether he would actually own the leasing corporation. That corporation was owned by Franzese.

The Rumplik loan was a government-guaranteed loan made by the Money Store of New York, an SBA-certified lending institution then headed by Steven Gurian. Yesterday Newsday reported that Gurian, who also heads the Long Island Development Corp., has been involved in business dealings considered improper by senior SBA officials. But the SBA has refused to give Newsday a list of SBA-guaranteed loans made by the Money Store or any other SBA lending institution, calling the information proprietary.

Gurian told Newsday he had no direct role in recommending approval of the loan. "I can't tell you any of the details," he said. SBA records, however, show that Gurian attended a meeting to work out problems with the loan and wrote the SBA a letter urging approval.

Gurian also said that he had never heard of Michael Franzese. But Franzese told Newsday he had met Gurian socially at Raneri's Restaurant in Smithtown. When Franzese decided to get involved with Rumplik, he said, he arranged for Doner to meet with Gurian. "I worked out a deal with Wally where I would get all the leasing business out of Rumplik Chevrolet," Franzese said. He said he had Doner meet with the restaurant's proprietor, Peter Raneri, whom he knew was friendly with Gurian. At the time, Raneri was deeply involved with organized-crime figures who helped financed his restaurant. Gurian acknowledged that Raneri brought Doner to him.

As the Money Store and SBA processed the application, some irregularities emerged. Doner told officials his previous partner in the car agency, Thomas O'Donnell, had embezzled $165,000 from the business, then paid it back in return for an agreement he wouldn't be prosecuted. (O'Donnell is in prison on an unrelated conviction and could not be reached for comment.) The business had tax liens against it, and the first loan closing had to be cancelled when the tax debts turned out to be greater than the application stated.

Nevertheless, Leavitt said, the SBA approved the loan because officials considered the real estate to be excellent collateral and because of Rumplik's long reputation in the community. After only four payments, however, the loan went into default.

Franzese and Doner acknowledged in interviews that some money from Rumplik went to other corporations owned by Franzese. Both said they could not recall exact sums, although Doner said one such transfer was $40,000. But they described these transfers as repayments of loans from Franzese, and they blamed the business' collapse on corporate debts previously run up by O'Donnell. Doner said Franzese was not responsible for Rumplik's collapse. "I like Michael," he said. "He did nothing to hurt me."

The Town of Islip has bought the foreclosed Rumplik building for $615,000, more than enough to satisfy the SBA loan. Gurian and Leavitt cite this as evidence that the taxpayers' interests were adequately protected. But the SBA procedures that allowed Franzese's interest to go undetected remain unchanged.

RANERI'S RESTAURANT

SBA critics in Congress question the agency's practices of making repeated loans to the same financially shaky business. The new SBA loan is used, completely or in part, to pay off an older, delinquent SBA loan. That makes the SBA's lending record look better—clearing its portfolio, at least temporarily, of a bad loan. The practice, however, often puts the business into even worse straits, since the company assumes a bigger debt and, often, a higher interest rate.

The SBA's loans to Raneri's Restaurant and its successor corporation, Chateau Rose, offer an example. Although the SBA barred reporters from the loan files, Newsday found that the agency continued lending to the restaurant even after Peter Raneri's involvement with mob figures—and his debts to loan sharks—were extensively publicized. Then, when Raneri's delinquent SBA debt was assumed by new owners operating as Chateau Rose, the SBA relinquished its first claim on the best collateral: the land and restaurant building on a choice corner of busy Jericho Turnpike in Smithtown.

When Raneri got his first SBA loan in 1977 for a new restaurant building, he was a well-known, popular restaurateur. He had received considerable publicity for resisting threats and vandalism from mob figures. His tires were slashed, his windshield broken, and he told friends that he and his children had been threatened.

Raneri attributed the problems to his choice of a building contractor. The contractor was Ronald Parr, who had cooperated with Newsday and police to thwart mob infiltration of a horse racing track, now defunct, that Parr had built in Yaphank. Raneri got his first SBA loan for $350,000 through Gurian's Long Island Economic Development Corp., an SBA-certified development corporation.

Raneri later testified that he started borrowing from loansharks in 1976, a year before he got the SBA loan. The loansharks were Leopold Ladenhauf and Michael Crimi. Police, however, said the money came from Pasquale Macchiarole, a Genovese crime-family captain. Macchiarole installed his own manager at the restaurant. Later, Crimi was convicted of usury and sentenced to five years' probation for the Raneri loans. Raneri testified that the loans totaled $91,000 and that he had to repay $140,000 with weekly $2,200 payments.

The year 1978 brought a blizzard of fresh publicity for Raneri's Restaurant. Macchiarole and Ladenhauf were found murdered. With Ladenhauf's body, police found a document signed by Raneri in which he agreed to turn over the restaurant to Ladenhauf and Crimi if he failed to make his payments. Crimi was indicted for Ladenhauf's murder (he was eventually acquitted), and Newsday published stories detailing Raneri's involvement with loansharks.

Nevertheless, the SBA approved a second loan, for $85,000, to Raneri in May, 1979. Walter Leavitt, head of the SBA's Long Island office, said he did not know why the loan was granted despite the restaurant's known mob connections. By late 1981, according to an SBA memo, Raneri was bouncing checks, both on suppliers and the SBA. He was so far behind in payments on his 1977 SBA loan of $350,000 that he owed $152,413.81 in delinquent interest alone.

At this point, the SBA held a first mortgage on the property, valued at about $800,000, and could have foreclosed. But SBA documents obtained by Newsday show that the agency instead accepted a proposal by Raneri that new owners, Chateau Rose Inc., take over the restaurant with new SBA financing.

The SBA approved a new $350,000 loan. Leavitt refused to release records or answer questions on exactly how the money was disbursed, but Newsday learned that $52,432 went to repay Raneri's 1979 SBA loan and that the interest payments on his 1977 SBA loan were brought up to date.

The SBA's assistant branch manager, David Offenberg, wrote that by allowing the deal, "we will bring our loan current plus keep a business in existence, which is our purpose." But the SBA also relinquished its status as first-mortgage holder on the building and property to a Fort Lee, N.J., funding company that was loaning Chateau Rose an extra $350,000. Now, SBA officials say that the Chateau Rose loan is delinquent, and they are not certain how much the government will recover from its secondary lien on the collateral.

Chateau Rose's owner, Victor Prague, blamed his financial troubles partly on the 22 percent interest he said he had to pay the Fort Lee company.

CARS GALORE

When Donald Pumalo opened his used-car lot, Cars Galore, in Huntington, he didn't bother getting the required state license for used-car dealers. And when the SBA granted Cars Galore a $150,000 loan, the agency never bothered checking with the Department of Motor Vehicles.

Although the SBA regularly finances automobile-related businesses on Long Island, the agency has no system for checking their status with DMV, which licenses all dealers and repair shops and keeps records of disciplinary proceedings. "It never occurred to me," Leavitt said.

Pumalo, who law enforcement officials say is an associate of Michael Franzese, has worked in Franzese's various automobile businesses. But Franzese said he had no financial interest in Cars Galore and no involvement with the SBA loan. "You wouldn't want an interest in anything he does because you're going to wind up in trouble," Franzese said. "Not because he's a criminal, but because he's just a typical used-car salesman, and he's a schemer." Pumalo has moved to Florida and could not be located for comment.

While Pumalo was getting the SBA loan in 1978, he was using the corporation to defraud Chemical Bank of $53,000 through phony installment-loan contracts for nonexistent people and cars, according to a 25-count indictment filed against him in 1981. He pleaded guilty to third-degree grand larceny and was sentenced to a year in jail. The same year, the SBA wrote off its loan as uncollectable, with $148,988 still owed. The agency refuses to release records showing why the loss was not offset by collateral. When Pumalo got out of jail, he became the used-car manager for Rumplik Chevrolet.

THE AVENI BROTHERS

Joseph S. Aveni used to deal in stolen auto parts, but that was before he and his brother discovered the SBA.

In 1971, Suffolk police arrested Aveni as a partner in a Medford chop shop: a wrecking yard where stolen late-model cars were stripped for their parts. Although police estimated the sales at $10,000 a week, Aveni was fined $100 for possession of stolen property.

From 1975 to 1977, Joseph Aveni ran a Mazda dealership in Hempstead, then sold it to Michael Franzese and opened a car lot in St. James, Auto Omni Inc.

Auto Omni promptly got a $150,000 SBA loan. In 1978, a used-car business at the same address, ARJ Motors Inc., applied for another $150,000 SBA loan. This time the principal was listed on the SBA application as Ross Aveni, although DMV records show that Joseph Aveni was an authorized agent for the company. The second loan also was approved. Both went into default, with $277,524 still owed. A federal source said that no collateral was ever collected; Leavitt has refused to comment. Since then, the Avenis have been convicted and fined $1,000 each for altering odometers at Auto Omni. Ross Aveni also was arrested on charges of possessing gambling equipment when police raided what they said was a mob-connected casino, but the charges were dismissed.

Why would the SBA loan this kind of money to a man with a criminal record? The Avenis did not return calls, and Leavitt said he did not know. But a law enforcement source said that any screening system that relies solely on the FBI's Washington computer is bound to miss some local convictions.

HALF HOLLOW HILLS COUNTRY CLUB

It was also in 1981 that Salvatore Avellino Jr. defaulted on a $250,000 SBA loan, leaving $205,067 in principal and $116,431 in interest unpaid. Avellino, owner of Salem Sanitary Carting Corp., has long been prominent in carting-industry trade groups. According to law enforcement, he also is prominent in organized crime.

Avellino, identified by federal officials as a Luchese crime family soldier, is close to the family's current boss, Antonio Corallo, better known as Tony Ducks. A government bug in Avellino's Jaguar recorded conversations with Corallo that led to what authorities call the most significant mob case in years: the recent indictment of members of the Cosa Nostra "commission" that allegedly controls the New York area's five mob families.

The SBA loan was for the Half Hollow Hills Country Club in Dix Hills. Leavitt would not discuss the loan in detail but said $125,000 of the loan was for a new building and the rest "to acquire land and equipment to become a fully operational public golf course, nine hole, and tennis court facility." But investigators who have examined the building—an unheated storage shed about the size of a three-car garage—say it probably cost no more than $10,000 to build. And deed records show that Avellino never bought the land. He ran the club for a few years as a tenant, then went out of business. That left the SBA with the right to foreclose on the shed, but only by removing it from the property. The golf course in now being operated under different management.

Avellino, currently under a bribery indictment, has not replied to several requests for an interview. Leavitt said the SBA is still trying to negotiate a settlement. "Now, with his other problems, I don't know where we're going to come out," Leavitt said. "But I wouldn't hold my breath."●

A TRIBUTE TO THE CALIFORNIA VETERANS COALITION

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity now to commend the work of the California Veterans Coalition, a Statewide community based veterans services organization headquartered in San Francisco that is working on behalf of veterans of the Vietnam War. The coalition's efforts especially stand out for their work of providing educational and health services for those veterans who have been exposed to the chemically laced dioxin, agent orange.

The agent orange problem is one more sad story in the Vietnam affair. Today, 10 years after all U.S. troops have been pulled out of Saigon, there is still a legacy of hurt and pain. Many of our soldiers, marines, sailors, and airmen have been exposed to potentially life-threatening chemicals emitted from our own weapons—yet the U.S. Government still moves at a snail-like pace in acknowledging the wrong and responding properly to this public health crisis. Agent orange is a real health danger in San Francisco, the State of California, and the entire Nation for that matter. Finally, during the 98th congressional session, Congress did at last pass the "Veterans Dioxin and Radiation Exposure Compensation Standards Act." This piece of legislation was signed into law on October 24, 1984. Its purpose is to assure compensation to veterans and their survivors for disabilities on death related situations based on sound scientific and medical evidence.

The California Veterans Coalition has been very active here in San Francisco in helping to locate former military service personnel along with civilians who also served in Vietnam for the interest of the U.S. Government. The coalition is also working to establish prototype procedures for the Veteran's Administration to work cooperatively with local groups to help place appropriate veterans on the agent orange registry. If our former service personnel have been exposed to dioxin herbicide, they must be provided with proper health education and medical services to best offset any related health problems.

The California Veterans Coalition will be performing vital information and referral services in low- to moderate-income areas; six major ones located in the city and county of San Francisco. It is in such income areas that adequate health services are frequently unavailable or especially lacking. The group will advise veterans in the detection and prevention of agent orange associated with health problems. Ex-Vietnam soldiers, marines, sailors, and airmen will be informed by specialized tests and screenings conducted by both private and public agencies. This is part of the group's effort to put together a veterans health care network linked to the local city and county health care system.

More than 200,000 veterans nationwide have independently received physical examinations and filed with the Veteran's Administration. This number is a mere pittance in terms of the 2.5–3 million exposure level. In helping to monitor this sad story, the California Veterans Coalition is performing a vital service for some of the most recent generation of armed forces personnel to serve in or support U.S. combat involvement. Like other sad stories from the Vietnam affair, this one will not go away. But we need to recognize the problem, and provide the best possible services to those and their families who are suffering as a result of that conflict.●

EDUCATION AND HOUSING SAVINGS ACCOUNTS

HON. DAN COATS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, each stage of our life is marked by very distinct goals. In our youth, we anticipate furthering our education to develop necessary intellectual skills for future job employment. As young adults, we look forward to buying our first home. And in later years, we hope to enjoy a secure and comfortable retirement.

We have already seen the positive response of the country to individual retirement accounts [IRA's]. Unfortunately, ever-increasing education and housing costs, high interest rates, and a low rate of savings has made it increasingly difficult for potential college students and prospective first time homebuyers.

For this reason, I am introducing legislation which would create an education savings account and a housing saving account, based on the IRA principle. Under this legislation, tax deductible contributions to a trust account will accumulate interest tax free for a period of time and then must be used to finance education of the purchase of a first home.

The Education Savings Account would permit potential college students and their families to deposit up to $1,000 per year in a trust account to cover the educational expenses of higher education. Funds in the account would have to be spent on education before the student's 27th birthday, or the money would be returned to the contributors, placed in another education account, or donated to an educational institution.

The housing savings account would allow a prospective first time homebuyer, or parents and friends, to contribute up to $1,500 per year or $3,000 per year in the case of a married couple, over a 10-year period toward a tax-free account. Funds would be used as a downpayment on a first home by the 10th year. One-tenth of the amount would be added to the user's gross income for each of the following 10 years after purchase, thus providing tax repayment to the Treasury.

I urge my colleagues to assist prospective college students and first time homebuyers by cosponsoring my legislation. Help restore the American dream of a college education and homeownership.●

SOVIET PROPAGANDA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the Soviet Union is continuing its unjust and immoral war in Afghanistan to this day. Yet, instead of telling the Soviet people the truth about their overt campaign of military aggression against the people of that once peaceful land, Soviet propagandists tell them lies; they attempt, albeit unsuccessfully, to blame their cold-blooded and ruthless policies on the United States and its support for Afghan mujahiddeen "bandits." Recently in Izvestiya, in an article entitled "Aggressors and Hypocrites," one author wrote about "American imperialism's dirty war against Afghanistan* * ", and about "The cries being committed in Afghanistan by the guns of bandit rebels armed and trained by Pentagon and CIA 'instructors' * *."

Mr. Speaker, instead of putting out lies such as this—we all know the Afghan mujahiddeen, are fighting a just and moral war of national liberation— Soviet leaders and propagandists would better serve their citizens by giving them a dose of what is really going on in that country. This is easily accomplished; all they have to do is to reprint quotes from young Soviet soldiers who, after coming to Afghanistan to fight alleged CIA and Chinese mercenaries, found only Afghan nationals struggling for freedom, and decided to defect. Take, for example, the case of Vladislov Naumov, who defected in 1983:

People (in the Soviet Union) learn virtually nothing about the unjust war from newspapers and magazines* * * the war is only known to those people who have been directly affected by the Afghan problem—the soldiers themselves and the mothers who are the recipients of the white zinc coffins.

This young soldier also said:

Of course, the (Soviet) soldiers are unhappy with the war and with Afghanistan on the whole. I believe that if this continues much longer, the results will be very costly for those who have cooked up this mess* * * It is now time to pay attention to Afghanistan. What is needed is only a beginning and then, I think, the soldiers themselves will start joining the insurgents.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, contrary to the absurd claims in the Soviet press about U.S. responsibility for the Afghan tragedy, it is the Soviet Union's own policies of unjust and ruthless aggession which are responsible for the bloodletting in that South Asian land. As Aleksander Solzhenitsyn said, "Terror is inextricably linked to the lie."

FROM USIA: SOVIET PROPAGANDA ALERT NO. 25—APRIL 15, 1985

"America's Dirty War Against Afghanistan." Moscow sought to lay the blame for the continuing struggle in afghanistan squarely on U.S. support for Afghan "bandits." In an article entitled "Aggressors and Hypocrites" published in Izvestiya (March 1), for example, Melor Sturua wrote:

"American imperialism's dirty war against Afghanistan is already in its seventh year. It started immediately after the historic April Revolution, which opened a new chapter in the history of an ancient people. But that is the custom: As soon as the people of some country or other—it does not matter in what part of the world—become the masters of their own destiny, they rapidly become a target for Washington* * *.

"The Crimes being committed in Afghanistan by the guns of bandit rebels armed and trained by Pentagon and CIA 'instructors' are monstrous. But the label 'Made in USA' is not only attached to the instruments of death. It is printed on the whole Afghan tragedy, on the whole destabilizing U.S. policy in the region, on what is being done in Pakistan* * *."

The Soviet media repeatedly warned Pakistan of the dangers of abetting Afghan resistance forces and of serving U.S. interests.●

HISTORY IN THE HOUSE

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite everyone to visit the crypt area on the first floor of the Capitol to see the beautifully restored Indian and Hunter Clock. This marvelous piece graced this Chamber prior to the 1948 remodeling. It provides a bit of a feel for the former beauty of this room.

The April edition of "History in the House" contains an article on the clock as well as a very interesting article on the history of the House Chamber itself. "History in the House" is published by the Office for the Bicentennial which serves as a clearing house for historical information on the House of Representatives.

I would like to include the April edition at this point.

[From the History in the House, April 1985]

THE CHAMBER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The Chamber of the House of Representatives has been the scene of dramatic events in United States history, and the Chamber itself is an important symbol of this nation's heritage. many visitors are unaware of the rich and colorful history of the Chamber, so this issue of History in the House will feature the story of the room itself.

Kings, queens, presidents, prime ministers, astronauts, poets, military leaders, and historians have all addressed the Congress from this spot. U.S. Presidents since Woodrow Wilson have delivered their annual State of the Union addresses in the present House Chamber. Here, on April 17, 1917, President Woodrow Wilson asked Congress to declare war on Germany. Here President Franklin D. Roosevelt delivered his war message on December 8, 1941, the day after the attack on Pearl Harbor. Eleven days later Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, made the first of his two addresses before a Joint Meeting. Here in 1951 General Douglas MacArthur delivered his famous line, "Old soldiers never die, they just fade away." On December 6, 1973, Vice President Gerald R. Ford took the oath of office in the House Chamber in which he had served as a Member of Congress for twenty-four years.

The House of Representatives has been meeting in its present hall for 128 years, outgrowing its previous chamber, now known as the Old Hall of the House or Statuary Hall. As the nation grew, so did the size of the House. In the 50 years it had met in the original south wing, the House had increased from 142 Members in 1807 to 237 Members after the 1850 census.

On July 4, 1851—the 75th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence—President Millard Fillmore laid the cornerstone for a new House wing in a Masonic ceremony using the same gavel and apron that George Washington had used in 1793 to lay the original cornerstone of the Capitol. Secretary of State Daniel Webster delivered a two-hour oration in which he reflected on the growth of the new nation, evoked the spirit of George Washington, and quoted Cicero (in Latin) to the throng of thousands.

The plans for the extension of the Capitol and its new cast iron dome were drawn up by Thomas U. Walter, a Philadelphia architect. Most of the construction work was completed under the jurisdiction of the Department of War, supervised by Captain Montgomery C. Meigs, an army engineer and one of the ablest graduates of the United States Military Academy at West Point. Meigs modified the Walter design and relocated the House Chamber in the center of the wing to achieve better heating and ventilation.

The House of Representatives first convened in the present Chamber on December 16, 1857. The Chamber's appearance gradually changed with the times. Electricity was added to the Chamber in the 1890s and air conditioning followed in the 1930s. Members used to sit at individual desks in the Chamber. But with the completion of the House Office Building in 1909 (now called the Cannon Building), Members had their own offices for the first time. Desks took up too much space, so they were replaced with benches in 1913. Two of the original desks and a chair, designed by Thomas U. Walter, are now located in the Speaker's Lobby. Since 1901 the flag behind the Speaker's chair has been furnished by the Daughters of the American Revolution; the present flag was hung in 1979.

The bronze fasces (from the Latin "bundle") on the wall behind the Speaker's chair represent authority. In ancient Rome, the fasces consisted of bound rods with an axe projecting from the center. They were carried by attendants, called lictors, who accompanied the consuls of the Roman Republic. The fasces were used to restore order in the court and the rods and axe were used to carry out the sentences of the court. The Romans introduced the fasces to England, where they evolved into the mace of the House of Commons.

The mace in the House of Representatives Chamber is the symbol of House authority. The one in use today was made by silversmith William Adams of New York City in 1841 to replace the original mace which was destroyed when British soldiers burned the Capitol in 1814. The mace consists of 13 thin ebony rods, representing the 13 original States of the Union, bound together to and bottom with engraved silver rings. The uppermost ring supports a silver globe with a detailed engraving of all seven continents and showing the degrees of longitude and latitude. A silver eagle with outspread wings surmounts the globe.

Each day when the House is called to order the Sergeant at Arms places the mace on a cylindrical pedestal of polished green marble at the right of the Speaker's chair. When the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union the mace is moved to a lower pedestal by the desk of the Sergeant at Arms. Members coming on the floor can glance at the mace and tell by its position whether the House is in session or in committee.

Since 1789, there have been few recorded instances of the mace being used to restore order on the floor of the Chamber. If an individual Member becomes unruly and beyond the Speaker's control, the Sergeant at Arms, on order of the Speaker, lifts the mace from its pedestal and "presents" it before the offender. Order has always been promptly restored because of the respect for the mace as a symbol of legislative authority. The last time the mace was used to restore order in the Chamber was in the 65th Congress, during World War I.

The appearance of the Chamber today reflects extensive alterations that were made between 1949 and 1951. Newly added features include the seals of the states and territories that border the ceiling and the marble relief portraits of famous lawgivers above the gallery doors. The clock above the Speaker's rostrum was added in 1950. It was made by the sculptor Leo Friedlander, probably best known for the equestrian group Valor and Sacrifice on the Washington side of the Arlington Memorial Bridge.

Technological advances in the Chamber include electronic voting and television. In 1972 the House installed an electronic voting system, which was first used in the 93rd Congress beginning in 1973. Prior to that time Members voted with paper ballots, or by roll call; both were cumbersome and time consuming processes. In 1977 the House added a closed circuit television broadcast system that eventually made it possible for millions of Americans to view the proceedings on the House floor without coming to Washington to sit in the gallery.

The four oldest objects in the present Chamber that were moved from the Old House Chamber are the mace (which we have already mentioned), the inkwell on the Speaker's desk, and portraits of the Marquis de Lafayette and George Washington.

The coin silver inkwell, in use on the Speaker's desk whenever the House is in session, is a superb neo-classic piece. It was made by a silversmith named J. Leonard, possibly of Georgetown, about whom little is known. Exactly when it was made and when the House acquired it are also unknown, but the inkwell is depicted in a portrait of Speaker Henry Clay painted by Charles Bird King in 1821 and in the painting "The Old Hall of the House" by Samuel F. B. Morse. The tray holds three crystal inkwells whose original silver tops have been lost. It is adorned on either side by an eagle in a medallion. Its feet are fasces entwined by a snake, which is a classic symbol of wisdom surrounding authority.

The full length portrait of the Marquis de LaFayette by the French painter Ary Scheffer was presented by the artist to the House of Representatives at the time of LaFayette's visit in 1824. The House then commissioned the eminent American artist John Vanderlyn to paint a companion portrait of George Washington. The commission specified that the head should be copied from the famous portrait of Washington by Gilbert Stuart. Vanderlyn's Washington portrait was delivered to the House in 1834, and since then both portraits have hung in the same relative positions in the Old Chamber of the House and in the present Chamber.

In 1788 when New York was debating what role the House of Representatives would play under the new U.S. Constitution, Alexander Hamilton remarked, "Here, Sir, the people govern." It can also be said that here, in this Chamber, is where the American people make history through the actions of their elected Representatives.

RINEHART CLOCK RESTORED

The monumental Rinehart Clock, which kept time in the Chamber of the House of Representatives from 1858 until the Chamber was remodeled from 1949 to 1951, has been meticulously restored and is now on display in the crypt of the U.S. Capitol. It is sometimes called the "Indian and Hunter" clock because of the two bronze figures standing on either side of an elaborately carved clock case made of oak and covered with gold leaf. The clock face is encircled with a garland of fruit and leaves beneath a bronze eagle resting on the United States shield.

The clock was part of the original decorative plan of Architect Thomas U. Walter and Captain of Engineers Montgomery C. Meigs. Its case was made in 1858 by Bembe and Kimbel of New York; the works, replaced in the 1930's, were by E. Howard and Co. of Boston. The three feet high figures of the Indian and Hunter were executed by William Henry Rinehart (1825-1874), a highly regarded Maryland sculptor who worked primarily in Rome.

Originally the Indian and Hunter were to be used as decorative supports for the fireplace in the Members' Retiring Room, but after casting they were incorporated into the clock design.

For over thirty years the clock has been in storage. It has not been on public view since 1948 when it was loaned to an exhibit of Rinehart's work at the Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore.

William Henry Rinehart made another major contribution to the art of the Capitol when, after the death of the brilliant young sculptor Thomas Crawford in 1857, he completed the models for the bronze doors Crawford had designed for the east portico entrances to the House and Senate wings. Using Crawford's drawings, Rinehart completed the models for the House doors in 1867, but they were not cast in bronze for another 36 years, long after Rinehart himself had died.●

EVEN A SWEETER COLA

HON. JOSEPH D. EARLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. EARLY. Mr. Speaker, back in 1981, then Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker described the 1981 tax bill as a "river boat gamble." I thought that was an apt description then and with hindsight, it has been borne out by the current deficits facing this Nation. Mr. Reagan's 1981 tax bill, his enormous defense buildup, and the net interest payments on the national debt have brought this Nation to the brink of financial chaos and the status of a debtor nation. Mr. Reagan's Presidency has nearly doubled the national debt in his first term of office, now nearly $2 trillion.

The administration and some of its allies would have us believe that some 20 years of reckless spending has reduced the Nation to this desperate plight. Well, such thinking ignores the facts of life. You cannot continue to spend what you don't have. Where we have failed is in ordering our spending and revenue priorities. Defense cannot have a blank check; corporations must pay a fair share. If we do not act now, our children and their children will inherit this debt; this is not the type of legacy that any of us wish to leave to future generations.

Many plans have been offered that would reduce future deficits. In particular there is one plan that would attempt to balance the budget on the backs of those least able to fend for themselves—to use the President's words, the "truly needy."

The President's so-called deficit reduction plan would place most of the burden on lower- and middle-income households while doing very little to hold the defense budget in check. There is little mention by this administration that some of the wealthiest corporations in this Nation have paid few if any taxes in recent years. In fact, corporate taxes as a percent of all Treasury receipts has fallen to a mere 6 percent from an average of 24 percent in the 1950's and early 1960's.

So, rather than attempting to revamp the Nation's tax code so that everyone bears a fair share of the tax burden and rather than attempting to do something about the ever growing defense budget, we are offered another opportunity by the President to further impair the ability of the middle class to meet its current needs and its future expectations. We are asked by this administration to rip the "safety net" even more than it has been over the past 4 years.

Specifically, it has been proposed that we freeze the cost-of-living adjustment [COLA]. Yet, deleting the COLA will have no effect whatsoever on the deficit. The trust funds are now running a surplus and even under the most pessimistic assumptions, the Social Security Administration pro jects a solvent system well into the 21st century. This happy occurrence is the result of both the 1977 amendments and the 1983 Social Security amendments based on the bipartisan Commission's recommendations.

Suggestions that the COLA is a luxury that retirees can do without until the deficit is reduced and the budget balanced is ludicrous. A cost-of-living adjustment is not an increase in benefits, but an attempt to maintain an individual's purchasing power. If we act on the President's recommendation, we would probably push an additional 500,000 elderly below the official poverty level. We are not talking about making retirees rich by any means. The median monthly Social Security benefit for those 65 or older is $450. I do not know of many, if any at all, who could pay for shelter, food, and medical expenses on such a pittance. Yet, many of our aged are doing just that.

The COLA has done more than anything else to reduce the incidence of poverty among the Nation's elderly. Nine to 10 million people 65 or older are kept above the poverty level by and annual COLA. Fully two-thirds of beneficiaries 65 or older receive 50 percent of their income from their Social Security check. Forty-three percent of beneficiaries have annual incomes below $10,000. A full 74 percent have total incomes below $20,000 annually. These folks are hardly rich by any stretch of the imagination.

In his April 30 television address to the Nation, the President would have us believe that the past 20 years of spending and tax policies have brought us to our present dire straits. I won't go into that matter now except to say that in the 4 short years of Mr. Reagan's first term the national debt has been doubled—it took nearly 200 years and 39 Presidents to bring it to the $1 trillion mark and only 4 years under the Reagan administration to double it. Now the President would have us all share the burden equally so that we can continue the course of economic recovery. I hardly think his plans for altering the Social Security COLA is fair and certainly not something that will be shared equally by all of our citizens.

Under the President's plan—the so-called Rose Garden II agreement with Senate Republicans—the average Social Security beneficiary would lose $1,667 over the next 5 years. The losses would come from reductions in Social Security COLA's and increases in the monthly premiums charged to Medicare beneficiaries. The President's plan would reduce benefits by $12.1 billion in 1988. The Senate Budget Committee plan calls for reduced benefits of about 4 percent by canceling the 1986 COLA. The President's plan by contrast would cut benefits about 6 percent for 1988 and future years. This is what the President referred to in his speech as a guarantee that all beneficiaries would receive a 2-percent COLA in 1986, 1987, and 1988. It is a ploy to cut in half what retirees would ordinarily receive under current law. It is, in other words, a Consumer Price Index minus 2 type of formula. Our senior citizens are better provided for under current law.

The President said he would not touch Social Security in any way, shape, or form during the 1984 Presidential campaign. It seems that he has changed his mind. Thousands of my constituents have written me urging me to safeguard their Social Security benefits. I also know that these same voters want the deficits reduced and the budget at long last balanced. As such, I think all Americans need to reexamine our national priorities.

Congress will have to act now to meet the Nation's most urgent domestic needs without impoverishing future generations. Some programs will be curtailed, others possibly eliminated, and some adjusted for inflation. Defense spending will have to be cutback to reasonable amounts. And, some tax laws will have to be altered and a few "sacred cows" sacrificed so that we as a nation remain on the road to economic recovery and sustained, future economic prosperity.

Balancing the budget on the backs of our senior citizens, though, is unfair; it is shortsighted, petty minded and mean in spirit to presume that our elderly are an undue burden and drain on the Nation's economic well-being. It can be said that no one has gotten rich on their cost-of-living adjustment.

The ill-advised "river boat gamble" that Congress took in 1981 has finally come back to haunt us. This administration would have Congress balance the budget on the backs of the elderly, middle-income families, and the poor. It is time that the military also share comparably in deficit reduction efforts. It is also time to examine our tax code and consider steps to make the system more equitable, simpler, and spread the tax burden fairly on individuals and corporations alike.

The Nation won't simply grow out of our deficits. Budget cuts and new revenues will be needed. Hopefully, the Nation's elderly and middle-income groups will survive to see a more promising tomorrow.●

EDUCATION: AN INVESTMENT WE CAN COUNT ON

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to all the students who have been accepted to our Nation's colleges and universities this spring. They should be commended for this achievement. We must realize, however, that if we approve drastic cuts in Federal aid to higher education, these students may never be able to complete their collegiate studies. A high proportion of students hoping to matriculate in September are currently arranging financial aid packages in order to pay the rising costs of a postsecondary degree. If we pass legislation which includes drastic restrictions and cuts of Federal student assistance, we may force many of these students to drop out of school, and in so doing create a society in which middle class and poor Americans will be unable to attend our institutions of higher education.

In an increasingly competitive world our ability to assure future prosperity depends above all on education. We must invest in people. Long range studies indicate that every dollar that we invested in the GI bill brought us back $3–$4 in increased tax revenues alone. Recent data indicates that a dollar spent on Head Start $7 to the taxpayer.

Furthermore, in 1983, statistics showed that of all individuals who desired work, 87 percent of college educated folk were employed while only 74.5 percent of high school graduates held jobs. By cutting programs and threatening the education of so many young people, we are pushing untrained young people out into an already overburdened job market. What we should be doing is improving existing programs.

We have crossed the threshold into an era of confusing economic and technological change. In entering the era of high technology, we need people that are better-trained and better-educated, not less so. A rapidly changing economy creates a greater need for people who are adaptable to change. In the face of these new challenges we cannot back down on our historic commitment to education. At the core of American society is our ability to create and be innovative, and now more than ever this ability is a function of education and training. If we mortgage our future by gutting such programs as financial aid, we will simply create a deficit of a different sort.

Federal aid to postsecondary students is a proven investment in the future. It is a proven investment in jobs for the American people. Education is an investment we can count on.●

TRIBUTE TO HECTOR HOLGUIN

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to honor Mr. Hector Holguin of El Paso, TX, who is the recipient this year of the Small Business Administration's Small Business Innovator of the Year Award for his pioneering efforts in the field of computer-aided design for engineering and architectural projects.

In the fast-moving world of computers, the growth of technology has often outpaced the ability of manufacturers to meet the users' training and service needs. Hector Holguin is among those in the world of high technology who have forged a blend, matching a high-quality, innovative product with a commitment to user training and superior service.

Computer-aided design and drafting [CADD] systems are becoming the right arm of the American engineer and architect, but it was not always so. The early CADD systems developed and used in the mid-1960's by the automotive and space industries were large, expensive mainframe computers inaccessible to most engineers, designers, and drafters, especially in small firms. Hector Holguin recognized the problem while working as an engineer at an aerospace company and decided engineers needed more direct control over the tools of their profession.

In 1971, he founded Holguin & Associates with the goal of making people more productive through advanced computer technology. The company became a pioneer in CADD technology, installing its first system in 1972.

Holguin believes that the success of a CADD system only begins with a quality product. Most of the investment has to do with how the users are prepared for the system, how it is implemented, and how it is managed. Installation begins with an analysis of the user's needs, which are then matched with the appropriate hardware and carefully designed software.

In surveys of Holguin users, the CADD systems have consistently earned high ratings for increasing a company's productivity in solving real-world problems. One user said installing the system was like tripling his staff. CADD systems are also used to upgrade existing personnel. Junior draftsmen can learn quickly how to do much more than follow someone else's numbers or push lines on paper. A Houston engineer said that the system cut mapping errors by 90 percent and reduced mapmaking drafting subdivision time from 2.5 man-years to 1 man-week.

Holguin's approach of listening and responding to the needs of CADD users works. Thousands of CADD operators are using Holguin systems in at least 22 countries, and Holguin has become the second-largest installer of CADD systems in the United States and fifth in the world.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that Hector Holguin of El Paso has received the Small Business Innovator of the Year Award for these efforts, and on behalf of the people of the 16th Congressional District of Texas, I would like to commend him to my colleagues and to this House.●

WE ARE GUARDIANS, NOT GUARDS OF MICRONESIA

HON. BEN GARRIDO BLAZ

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BLAZ. Mr. Speaker, 40 years ago our Nation assumed a sacred trust for a war-ravaged people in the middle of the Pacific Ocean. We pledged to the world to be the guardians of Micronesia. We vowed to protect, nurture, and guide the 50,000 people of those far-flung islands into the community of nations.

Today there are 150,000 Micronesians. Their islands have been rebuilt, their lives replenished and their constitutional governments established. They are ready and eager to assume their place in the world.

Their declaration of self-government lies before the U.S. Congress. Yet, there it waits as a chorus of voices assail it as a flawed document that gives the islands too much. I hear disgruntled cries that Micronesia is but a prize of war—a captured territory that is ours by right of conquest; and we are its guard and master.

As our Nation marks Asian-Pacific American Heritage Week this May, celebrating the contributions of our region to the United States, it is an appropriate time to ask: Is America ready to fulfill the commitment it made to our Pacific wards? Is Congress prepared in 1985 to end its trusteeship and make good its pledge to the international community?

I can recall 40 years ago when America assumed its responsibility for Micronesia. I remember as I sat amid the rubble of war-torn Guam with Micronesian friends, how we wondered and pondered what the future and the United States held in store for us. Fortunately for me, Guam became a U.S. territory and I became a U.S. citizen in 1950.

As an American, the future held much for me. I had the opportunity to become an officer in the Armed Forces, a college professor, and now a Member of Congress. For my Micronesian friends, the opportunities were limited and their future was clouded with uncertainty.

The reunions I have had in the past few years with these same Micronesian friends have been increasingly difficult as they still ponder what the future will be for their communities and themselves. Many have had to learn German and Japanese over the years and now, in the twilight of their lives, are struggling with English.

After years of waiting, the Micronesians feel that they have come of age. They now have four constitutional governments: The Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas, the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshalls, and the Republic of Palau. All of these groups have written and adopted their constitutions and set up their governments in anticipation of taking their rightful place on the world scene.

Over the past 16 years, Micronesian leaders have negotiated the terms of their new relationship with America. Though the forms of their relationships differ, all have chosen close political, economic, and social ties with us. They have all chosen to remain securely under the U.S. defense umbrella.

In recent congressional hearings on the Compact of Free Association I have heard the agreement described by both conservative Republicans and liberal Democrats as a flawed document that commits a multitude of sins. Some say it gives the Micronesians too much money, others say it doesn't provide enough. Some say that by approving the Compact, the Federal Government would be selling the farm on local autonomy issues for overreaching military rights. Others say the military rights under the agreement are not clearly defined or adequately assured. I sometimes wonder if we are talking about the same document.

I am becoming increasingly suspicious that there must be something very right about the Compact for it to be the target of linkage with so many other issues and for it to be viewed by individuals of such diverse political persuasions as an effective vehicle for gaining leverage on other issues. I have heard no concern expressed by anyone which would justify undue delay in approving and implementing the Compact. This is not to say that some of the valid concerns that have been raised cannot be addressed in the legislation approving the Compact.

But I will not support any effort to link Compact approval to matters that are not directly related to the agreement. Because of the numerous complex issues in the agreement—from nuclear claims and international trade to immigration—it is absolutely necessary for Congress to scrutinize the pact. But it would be a violation of our Nation's commitment to Micronesian self-determination to use the agreement as a vehicle for addressing other partisan issues.

I do not believe that the Compact will adversely affect the U.S. flag territories. I believe the Compact's incentives for development in Micronesia will produce regional political and economic development which will directly benefit the United States and its Pacific territories.

The Compact presents the United States with a historic opportunity to show the Pacific community that we will enter the next century in a strong strategic posture, but also as a nation able to build good will in the region through creative and democratic arrangements oriented toward economic development through private enterprise.

Those who argue that Micronesia is a prize of war are ignoring the fact that the keystone of American foreign policy in the 20th century has been that we seek no expansion of territory through war and will not seek to claim conquered territory as our own. This policy began with President Woodrow Wilson's emphasis on self-determination and nonannexation at the Versailles Conference following World War I. That principle was reaffirmed by U.S. leaders in the Atlantic Charter in 1941, and the United Nations Charter. It has been a major theme of American policy as leader of the Free World in the post-war era.

If my opinions sound biased on this subject, it is because they are. I am a Micronesian. I am from Micronesia. One of the major reasons I ran for Congress was to add a new and different dimension to that august body in light of the generally recognized view that the Pacific Basin offers enormous potential for the United States and the world.

The Micronesians have come of age and are ready to fulfill their own destiny. We have an obligation to facilitate their desire to do so. Forty years after we assumed trusteeship of their islands, we must remind ourselves that we are the guardians, not the guards of Micronesia.●

A PARTISAN FOREIGN LEGION

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a longstanding U.S. diplomatic tradition keeps our Ambassadors, noncareer and career alike, out of partisan domestic politics. But that sound policy and practice went up in smoke last year.

The 1984 congressional elections sparked some firey campaigns—perhaps none more heated than the contest for the U.S. Senate in North Carolina.

During the campaign, the incumbent Senator from North Carolina enlisted the support of 22 U.S. Ambassadors, whose normal role is representing our Nation overseas. But in this case, they bent their energy toward representing one senatorial candidate at home. I find such a break with established policy to be a meddlesome, maddening, and misguided precedent.

The issue here is not which political party may have reaped partisan benefits from the endorsements. The action would have been out-of-bounds no matter which party or candidate was involved.

Neither is the issue simply whether the Ambassadors in question serve as political appointees or as career Foreign Service officers. As 36 former Ambassadors pointed out in a protest of the partisan endorsement:

> This action violates a well-established tradition followed by administrations of both political parties which has barred American Ambassadors, noncareer as well as career, from active participation in partisan politics while on active duty as official representatives of their country.

The list of former Envoys who objected to this break with tradition is a distinguished roster of diplomats who served both Republican and Democratic administrations. They include Jacob Beam (Soviet Union, 1969–73), Gardner Ackley (Italy, 1968–69), Harlan Cleveland (NATO, 1965–69), W. Averell Harriman (Soviet Union, 1943–46), and David H. Popper (Cyprus and Chile, 1969–77).

Nor, finally, does the question turn on the narrow grounds of whether the Ambassadors broke any laws or regulations. Since they were all noncareer officials they did neither. What they broke was a wise and well-established policy of our Government which has been observed since our Nation's founding. That policy is that partisan political activity ends at the waters edge.

More than ever before, U.S. Ambassadors must serve as full-time employees of the U.S. Government. They have a full and complex duty to advance the foreign policy goals of our Nation, to represent U.S. citizens abroad, to promote our economic interests, and to safeguard our own diplomatic staff and missions.

Encumbered with such critical issues as nuclear arms control, U.S. trade deficits, and international terrorism I submit that our diplomats have their hands full without meddling in partisan domestic politics. They have neither the time nor the reason to do so.

They have, on the contrary, every reason to steer clear of partisan activity. For example, the Senator in question has done precious little to build bridges to Third World nations in his role on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. How then will these nations respond to Ambassadors who also want to carry his political water?

What made matters worse in this case is that the State Department took scant attention to this grave departure from sensible policy. Secretary Shultz issued through a spokesman an anonymous wrist slap. The candidates even boasted that Secretary of State Shultz would "not make the same statement made by the underbelly of the State Department."

Before this precedent becomes standard practice, Congress needs to put diplomacy back on course, since the State Department seems unwilling to do so. I want to urge the Foreign Affairs Committee to hold early hearings on this matter and to send a strong message to the President and Secretary of State that our Ambassadors should be serving the American people—not a Senate Campaign Committee.

Understanding that hearings will soon take place, I withhold any amendments to the State Department authorization bill. But I want to state forcefully today that the State Department has no room for a partisan foreign legion.●

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to ask my colleagues in the House to join with me in saying thanks to David K. Boggini, who this month is retiring from 28 years of dedicated service to the city of San Jose, CA.

Dave's service to the city of San Jose has included a number of jobs and assignments in many of San Jose's essential administrative areas, including occupations such as city property manager, director of private development, assistant director of redevelopment, and his latest position—deputy city manager for community development.

As a former mayor of San Jose, I know very well that Dave's solid performance and administrative talents contributed greatly to the well-being of the citizens of San Jose. He has worked on a variety of issues including hazardous wastes, housing, health, and the physically handicapped. Throughout his tenure, he has shown tremendous competence and a true compassion in his work.

Dave's long service to the city of San Jose is exceeded only by his time as a lifelong resident of the city. He has attended its schools and lived in its neighborhoods. He knows this city well.

Mr. Speaker, he has also served this city well. I know that Dave has remarked more than once that he always wanted to give something back to the city that has been so good to him for so long. I can assure him he has indeed given back much to the city of San Jose.

Finally, let me say this. In the city of San Jose there is a park named after Dave's father, Peter J. Boggini, another honorable public servant of our city. I am sure that Dave and his wife, Sally, have brought their four children to that park. I want to assure Pamela, Peter, Paul, and Patrick as well as anyone else who uses Peter J. Boggini Park, that they can be equally proud of David K. Boggini. He has been a trusted public servant to the city of San Jose, and I ask my fellow Members of Congress to join me in expressing our thanks to him.●

BAY AREA WELCOMES BISHOP TUTU

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the 40th anniversary of an end to infamy in Europe—a war begun by a racist, totalitarian regime—a war unparalleled in its savagery and inhuman brutality—a war that spawned the Holocaust and the murder of equal numbers of non-Jews in the infamous concentration camps.

Last Sunday, at the U.S. Air Force base in Bitburg, West Germany, the President persisted in his wrong-headed decision to visit the German military cemetery at Bitburg that contains the graves of at least 49 Waffen SS members, the epitome of evil in the criminal madness that was the Third Reich. The President compounded this moral lapse in attempting to draw a historical analogy with evil in the contemporary world when he said:

Today, freedom-loving people around the world must say: I am a Berliner, I am a Jew in a world still threatened by antisemitism, I am an Afghan, and I am a prisoner of the Gulag, I am a refugee in a crowded boat foundering off the coast of Vietnam, I am a Laotian, a Cambodian, a Cuban, and a Miskito Indian in Nicaragua. I, too, am a potential victim of totalitarianism.

That litany of lament contained a conspicuous and morally indefensible omission—all the more obscene because apartheid is the lineal descendant of the perverse racism that was a hallmark of the Nazi regime. World War II, as proclaimed in the Atlantic charter, was a struggle to destroy fascism, to terminate the remnants of colonialism, and to establish human dignity and social justice for all people throughout the world. The President's conscious decision to exclude any mention of the ongoing obscenity of apartheid on that day of commemoration and renewal to freedom is a deliberate affront to the world community of conscience, and further evidence of the moral bankruptcy of his policy of "constructive engagement" in dealing with the racist regime in South Africa.

This weekend the citizens of the Bay Area in California will have an opportunity to challenge that moral dereliction when we honor a person who fully comprehends the historical lessons and failures of the Second World War in denying human dignity and social justice to everyone, especially people of color in the Third World. This weekend we will have the privilege of welcoming into our midst the Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg, South Africa.

Desmond Tutu is much more than a black South African. Desmond Tutu is much more than the winner of the 1984 Nobel Peace Prize. Desmond Tutu—as committed cleric, ardent advocate of racial equality and social justice, and passionate patriot for peace and freedom for all in South Africa is the living embodiment of John F. Kennedy's inaugural challenge that "here on Earth God's work must truly be our own."

In January of this year at a White House meeting Bishop Desmond Tutu, a native-born South African and Nobel peace laureate, had to confess to our President, the proclaimer and perpetrator of "constructive engagement" that, at age 53, he doesn't have a South African passport: "only a document that describes my nationality as undeterminable at present." But at the same time Desmond Tutu had the moral courage to denounce the hypocrisy of "constructive engagement" for what it truly is: "evil, immoral, and un-Christian".

In his Nobel Peace Prize acceptance speech at Oslo, Norway, last December, Bishop Desmond Tutu proclaimed his love for the land of his birth, and the pain and sorrow inflicted on its black inhabitants by the cruel, cancerous curse of apartheid, saying:

I come from a beautiful land, richly endowed by God with wonderful natural resources, wide expanses, rolling mountains, singing birds, bright shining stars, with radiant sunshine, golden sunshine. There is enough of the good things that come from God's bounty, there is enough for everyone, but apartheid has confirmed some in their selfishness, causing them to grasp greedily a disproportionate share, the lion's share, because of their power. They have taken 87 percent of the land, though being only about 20 percent of our population. The rest have had to make do with the remaining 13 percent. Apartheid has decreed the politics of exclusion. 73 percent of the population is excluded from any meaningful participation in the political decision-making processes of the land of their birth.

He went on to say:

We see before us a land bereft of much justice, and therefore without peace and security. Unrest is endemic, and will remain an unchanging feature of the South African scene until apartheid, the root cause of it all, is finally dismantled. . . . There is no peace because there is no justice. There can be no real peace and security until there be first justice enjoyed by all the inhabitants of that beautiful land.

. . . When will we learn that human beings are of infinite value because they have been created in the image of God, and that it is a plasphemy to treat them as if they were less than this and to do so ultimately recoils on those who do this? In dehumanizing others, they are themselves dehumanized. . . .

His peroration was both plea and summons:

Let us work to be peacemakers, those given a wonderful share in Our Lord's ministry of reconciliation. If we want peace, so we have been told, let us work for justice. Let us beat our swords into plowshares.

In his installation address as the Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg in February, he also reached out to whites in a very special way, saying:

There are very many splendid white people. That is a trite truism. I have said that if I was white I would have needed accesses of grace to oppose a system providing me with such substantial benefits and privileges. And consequently, those white South Africans who oppose apartheid should be saluted more vociferously than their Black counterparts.

But he also pleaded with those same whites, saying:

Please dear white fellow South Africans hear the cri de coeur we utter. It is that we too are just ordinary human beings. We too love to be with our wives every day, we too want our children to rush out to meet us as we come back from work, we too would like to live where we can afford it. We too want to be able to move freely everywhere in the land of our birth, we too want to have security of tenure. We too want to participate in the decisions that affect our lives. These are not extravagant demands. They are the expectation of any human being. We want to have a new kind of South Africa where we all, Black and White, can walk tall together, Black and White, into the glorious future which God is opening up before us—Black and White together.

"Black and White together," the words are also those of the civil rights anthem in our own country. So in the spirit of what Martin Luther King, Jr. lived for, struggled for, and ultimately, died for, people of all colors will welcome Bishop Desmond Tutu to our Bay Area community. There we will reaffirm our common commitment to live out the reality, that "We shall overcome, someday"—in America and in South Africa—because we know that none can be free unless all are free.●

POPULATION POLICIES SHOULD RESPECT HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in the very near future we are expected to begin consideration of H.R. 1555, the foreign aid authorization bill for fiscal year 1986. At that time, I anticipate that we will debate some very important issues relating to U.S. supported foreign population control programs.

Earlier this week, Representatives ALAN MOLLOHAN, HENRY HYDE, HAROLD VOLKMER, BARBARA VUCANOVICH, and TOM BLILEY joined me in sending a "Dear Colleague" letter detailing our concerns about major human rights abuses that have occurred in the implementation of some of these programs—particularly those carried out in a coercive manner in the People's Republic of China. I hope that my colleagues will take a few moments to review this information before we begin consideration of this important legislation. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enclose a copy of the text of this letter for my colleagues' review.

The letter follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, May 6, 1985.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Despite the overwhelming evidence which is now in the public domain about the brutal and coercive nature of the People's Republic of China's (PRC) population control program, some Members of Congress insist that the United States should continue to provide substantial indirect support for this brutal program by contributing over $50 million in FY '86 to the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA).

The U.S. Agency for International Development (AID) provides over 30% of the total budget of the UNFPA. Over the past four years, UNFPA has contributed $50 million to the PRC's "one-child" campaign and another $50 million grant has just begun. This UNFPA funding has played a substantial role in establishing the infrastructure of the Chinese population control program. UNFPA documents note that they currently provide "assistance to strengthen the State [Family] Planning Commission," the central headquarters which issues the rigid "birth quotas" that are enforced in a draconian fashion nationwide.

In his February 26, 1985 testimony before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, AID Administrator, M. Peter McPherson, acknowledged that UNFPA monies are "fungible". Therefore, it is disingeneous to suggest that the United States—which provides more than 30% of UNFPA's budget—is not supporting the brutal Chinese population control program. Would members who make this argument, accept 30% of U.S. funding of an organization that in turn was supporting a program that sanctioned and enforced racism or sex discrimination? Wouldn't they insist that the U.S. government use its leverage as a major donor to insist that the organization we were supporting disengage itself from the offensive program? Forced abortion was declared to be a "crime against humanity" at the Nuremberg Tribunal. Do we in any way want our government to be associated with such atrocities?

It is of virtually no consequence that language in H.R. 1555, the Foreign Aid Authorization bill calls for the U.S. representative to the UNFPA to oppose UNFPA funding of the Chinese population program. Despite the fact that we provide more than 30% of UNFPA's funding, we only have one vote on the 48 member Governing Council. Since the UNFPA has just recently initiated a new five year, $50 million grant to the Chinese population control program, we would not get to cast our one vote until 1989.

The May/June 1983 issue of Intercom, the newsletter of the Population Reference Bureau, reported that a Chinese "central-government circular" issued in February, 1983 said:

"Permanent birth control measures [i.e.,—sterilization] are to be carried out among those who already have two children. Remedial measures [i.e., abortion] are to be taken as quickly a possible among those who are pregnant without quota [permission]."

The Population Reference Bureau's newsletter then went on to report the following information which is very relevant to the current debate in Congress:

"UN officials contacted about the policy expressed grave misgivings about any forced sterilization policy to a Washington Post reporter, adding that the international organization could not assist a family planning program with an official coercive policy (emphasis added)."

The UNFPA's policy position, therefore, is quite clear. If the Chinese population control program is coercive, the UNFPA—according to their own established policy—cannot fund the Chinese program. The United States, as the largest donor to UNFPA, should seek to ensure that the UNFPA abides by its established policies.

The U.S. Census Bureau's China division has provided transcripts of Chinese radio broadcasts and press accounts which coincide with the Population Reference Bureau's report of a "central government circular." In a May 14, 1983 radio interview recorded by the Foreign Broadcast Information Service, Guangdong Province Vice-Governor Wang Pingshan explained the State Family Planning Commission's decree in these terms: "The basic purpose of this measure is to absolutely prohibit married couples from bearing a second child."

Anyone who missed the Vice-Governor's May 14 radio interview, had an opportunity to read his explanation of the policy in the May 15, 1983 edition of Nanfany ribao (Southern Daily): "The technical policy of birth control is formulated by the State Family Planning Commission with the approval of the leadership of the Party Central." That policy, he explained, is that "women with unplanned pregnancies must adopt remedial measures as soon as possible.

Nick Eberstadt, a visiting fellow at Harvard University's Center for Population Studies, described the Chinese population program in the April 22, 1984 edition of The New York Times:

"So, increasingly, the population program turned to coercion . . . In some areas, women with 'unauthorized' pregnancies were rounded up and ordered to submit to injections of abortifacients. Official edicts warned that those 'who attempt to defeat the fertility plan' would be considered "enemies of the people"—a threat that any adult who lived through the Cultural Revolution understood only too well. Families that defied the "one child norm" were faced with monthly fines that often meant semi-starvation."

The Washington Post, in their January 10, 1985 editorial follow-up to Michael Weisskopf's three-part series on China's population control program, clearly describes the Chinese system as coercive. In the Post's analysis, the Weisskopf series "illuminates the scope and type of measures the authorities there employ to limit their country's population . . . while some of the means are what you could call extremely rigorous—education, propaganda, economic leverage, social pressure—other methods fall into the realm of the openly coercive and brutal: mandatory abortion, inducted stillbirth, the strangling of the newborn." The Post goes on to point out that "the state actively sanctions and sponsors these means".

On March 29, 1985, the Agency for International Development (AID), released a memorandum on the UNFPA Funding Issue. AID's Assistant Administrator, Richard Derham, the author of the memo, reported on a study by Judith Banister, Chief of the China Branch, Center for International Research, at the U.S. Bureau of the Census "She recounts the evidence on coercion, demonstrates that it is not an isolated activity, nor limited to remote provinces. In fact, it is an intrinsic part of the enforcement mechanism of the policy." Derham further reported on the Banister study by saying: "Referring to the 1981 UN Symposium on Population and Human Rights conclusion that compulsory abortion is a violation of human rights and other UN declarations in favor of voluntarism, she concludes "China's family planning program is in violation of these oft-stated principles."

Derham, himself, went on to say: "I believe the China program debases human values by its emphasis on physical and psychological coercion and violates internationally recognized standards of the human right to determine the family size . . . I further conclude that the UNFPA program cannot be disentangled from the pervasive coercion of the [Chinese] system . . ."

Pranay Gupte, a former foreign correspondent for The New York Times in Africa, wrote "The Crowded Earth" under a grant from UNFPA. He described the application of the one-child program in this way:

"So minutely is Chinese socialist society organized that no aspect of an individual's life goes unobserved, especially in rural brigades and communes. Pressure is applied on couples to restrict themselves to only one child not only through family planning cadres in neighborhoods but also through the work units of both husband and wife. . . If Chiang [a thirty-year old woman in Shandong Province] were to get pregnant, peer pressures on her to get an abortion would be instant, enormous, and irresistible. . . In the final analysis, it does not matter how many children Chinese like Chiang and Chien [her husband] want—they will be allowed no more than one child."

Clearly, the evidence is overwhelming that the Chinese population control program is rooted in state-sanctioned coercion. The UNFPA's failure to disengage from the Chinese program contradicts their own stated policy. Unfortunately, there is strong evidence that the UNFPA has actually encouraged the Chinese in their application of the brutal one child policy.

In 1983 the Chinese population control minister, Qian Xinzhong, received a special U.N. award for "the most outstanding contribution to the awareness of population questions." The award, which was strongly defended by UNFPA director Rafael Salas, was "denounced as a travesty by a United States economist whom the agency [UNFPA] enlisted as an advisor. The economist, Theodore W. Shultz of Chicago [a recipient of the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Science], said that the United Nations Fund for Population Activities had ignored the recommendations of private consultants and rewarded two nations [China and India] that have used brutal methods to curb population growth." (The New York Times, July 24, 1983)

In "The Crowded Earth", Pranay Gupte recounts the following experience: "I met Minister Qian in his office in Beijing [Peking], and he immediately launched into an appreciation of what the United Nations meant to him and the Chinese. The award had, Qian said, put the imprimatur of the world body on China's family planning efforts . . ."

If Rafael Salas and his colleagues at the UNFPA are willing to let the Chinese government suggest that their barbaric program has the approval of a world body—a position that is in direct conflict with the UNFPA's own stated policy—we should let them know in no uncertain terms that we will not let the good name of the United States be associated with a brutally coercive program that refuses to comply with "internationally recognized standards of the human right to determine the family size."

During consideration of H.R. 1555, the Foreign Aid Authorization bill, Representative Christopher Smith intends to offer an amendment to curtail U.S. population assistance to "any organization which provides funds, directly or indirectly, for population planning programs or abortions" in "any country which permits, officially or in practice, infanticide or coerced abortion." The Smith amendment will not affect the overall level of population funding. It's intent is to persuade the Chinese government to respect the dignity of it's own people. If the Chinese are unwilling to recognize a fundamental human right—the internationally recognized right to determine the family size—the UNFPA should redirect their resources to those countries that are willing to comply with the UNFPA's officially stated policies.

We urge your support for the Smith amendment described above and for another amendment which is designed to preserve the current U.S. policy of denying funds to organizations which "perform or actively promote abortion as a method of family planning."

Current U.S. policy is consistent with the U.N. World Plan of Action agreed upon in Mexico City last August. Participants in Mexico City resolved to "forge ahead with effective implementation of the World Population Plan of Action aimed at improving standards of living and quality of life for all people of this planet in promotion of their common destiny in peace and security."

However, the conferees were also very clear in precluding certain means to the mutually desired end. Specifically, they stated that all population programs and policies must be voluntary and non-coercive, and abortion was rejected as a method of family planning. Recommendation #18 of the U.N. World Population Plan of Action emphatically states that abortion "in no case should be promoted as a method of family planning."

It is not surprising that the Mexico City Conference so firmly rejected abortion as a method of family planning. According to a 1984 U.N. report, only 8 of 126 less developed nations authorize abortion for socioeconomic reasons.

In January of this year, the Agency for International Development (AID)—in keeping with the policy agreed to in Mexico City—began asking family planning providers to sign an amendment that they would not "perform or actively promote abortion as a method of family planning." So far, only one of AID's family planning providers—the London-based International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF)—has refused to even negotiate with AID about specific terms of the agreement.

IPPF's staunch advocacy of legalized abortion has been well documented. Professor Donald P. Warwick of the Harvard Institute for International Development, writing in the April 1980 Hastings Center Report, stated: "The International Planned Parenthood Federation of London (IPPF) has been the most outspoken advocate of legal abortion services in the developing countries . . . " The extent to which they encourage local affiliates to go in seeking changes in national laws was revealed quite starkly in a document entitled Report of the Working Group on the Promotion of Family Planning As A Basic Human Right. This report, which was disseminated to IPPF affiliates in November, 1983 states in Section 106:

"Family Planning Associations [IPPF affiliates] and other non-governmental organizations should not use the absence of law or the existence of an unfavorable law as an excuse for inaction. Action outside the law, and even in violation of it, is part of the process of stimulating change."

Lest anyone suggest that this report is not an "official" IPPF document, one need only cite a statement in the Introduction of the report which says: "We hope that both the Federation and individual FPAs will accept these recommendations and promote them as widely as possible." It goes on to say: "The Chairman and members of the Working Group wish to acknowledge the support of the IPPF in facilitating their work, in particular, the participation of the Secretary-General, Carl Wahren, his special adviser, Fred T. Sai, and the Secretary and Rapporteur, Nuray Fincancioglu . . ."

IPPF does not need any help from Congress to get their AID funding restored. All they have to do is sign the same agreement that every one of AID's other family planning providers will be asked to sign. If, as they claim, abortion is a very small part of their overall program, they should be willing to make a minor adjustment in order to bring their policies into compliance with U.S. law and the U.N. World Plan of Action. If, on the other hand, IPPF is determined to promote abortion as a method of family planning and engage in pro-abortion political campaigns, AID will be free to channel its funds to other family planning providers.

In summary, we urge your support for an international family planning policy that respects the values and laws of foreign countries. The U.N. World Population Plan of Action agreed upon in Mexico City last August states that all population programs must be voluntary and that abortion "in no case should be promoted as a method of family planning." We believe such a policy deserves our support and that the Smith amendments will help ensure that it becomes a reality.

COORDINATION IN NUTRITION RESEARCH AND MONITORING IS LONG OVERDUE.

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act of 1985, today introduced by Congressman MACKAY for himself and others. This bill establishes a coordinated National Nutrition and Related Research Program, providing for the creation and implementation of a comprehensive plan to assess, and work to improve, both the nutritional quality of our country's food supply and the nutritional and dietary status of the population of the United States.

This legislation in not new. A similar bill was introduced in the second session of the 98th Congress, reported favorably by the Committee on Science and Technology and brought to the floor of the House last October under suspension of the rules. It received 265 votes in favor, but fell 17 votes short of the two-thirds majority needed for passage.

Mr. Speaker, the issue the National Nutrition Monitoring and Related Research Act of 1985 addresses is not a new one either. For years, our country has lacked timely, objective national data on the dietary and nutritional status of Americans, as well as related information that could alert policymakers to a "hunger crisis" in our Nation. In the absence of accurate, comprehensive nutrition-related knowledge, concerned groups and individuals have repeatedly sounded the alarm about the existence of a hunger crisis, but have lacked the hard facts needed to document the extent and severity of the problem.

Past responses by Congress and the executive branch to this need have generally been to initiate urgent studies and surveys. These efforts have largely been short term and piecemeal. Often, they have been anecdotal recounts of testimony and clinical evidence, or one-time efforts to assess the nutritional and dietary status or high-risk groups or limited geographical areas. Less frequently, surveys have been undertaken to periodically obtain information on a representative sample of the population. In 1935, the USDA began food consumption surveys, repeated at 10-year intervals and currently known as the Nationwide Food Consumption Survey. In 1967, a congressional mandate led to the 10-State Nutrition Survey. In 1971, a Presidential directive transformed the National Nutrition Surveillance Survey into a periodic study now known as the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey [NHANES]. These studies have provided a series of valuable snapshots of nutritional and dietary status, but they have lacked timeliness, continuity, and comparability across studies.

Complex survey designs or this type require considerable time for planning and implementation. Their findings, unfortunately, usually become available long after the urgency that provoked the questions has passed; inevitably, as a result, perceived immediate public needs have been addressed by policies dictated by expediency and a sense of crisis, measures put into place before the information has been made available that would permit understanding of the extent and severity of the problem and thus of the best way to solve it.

To address this problem, in 1977, Congress passed the Food and Agriculture Act, which mandated a comprehensive National Nutrition Monitoring System; and later passed the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981, which provided a mandate for a human nutrition research and information management system. One would think that, since these laws are in place and we have been assured that operational plans are being carried out, there is no need for further legislative effort.

Mr. Speaker, this is unfortunately not the case. The infrastructure and commitment of resources to carry out research and provide the results to policymakers in a timely fashion have so far been inadequate. Problems of conceptualization, sampling design and standardization have been insufficiently addressed; reductions in funding levels requested by executive agencies have been accompanied by decreases in levels of effort proposed, so that it is now clear that current plans to collect information in 1987 will not be responsive to the original goals proposed for the program. In summary, despite repeated congressional efforts to date, the executive branch has remained unwilling to commit sufficient resources and effort to put a national nutrition monitoring and research program in place. Congress must provide more direction.

As a former chairman of the Subcommittee on Science, Research and Technology, and as former chairman of the Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research and Foreign Agriculture, I have studied this problem for many years. During the past 7 years, these two subcommittees have conducted oversight hearings on nutrition research and monitoring as well as hearings on the original version of this bill. The testimony during these hearings by specialists in the field prompted me and my colleagues Congressmen WALGREN and MACKAY to conclude last year that we needed to authorize a comprehensive, coordinated program for nutrition monitoring and related research.

The bill introduced today calls for a comprehensive plan; it includes the continuous collection of information, as well as a system for organizing and standardizing methods across the many individual studies and surveys of nutritional and dietary status and nutritional quality in our country. The proposed solution will benefit all sectors of society that seek to use these vital data—public and private sectors, the scientific community and policymakers at local, State and national levels.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the midst of a revolution in science and information technology. It is past time that we focus our resources and newly developed skills on nutrition monitoring and nutrition research. Our deficiency of information in this area must be faced now, before the next round of urgent calls regarding hunger in America surface and are insufficiently addressed—because, once again, our country lacks the timely information it needs. I invite my colleagues to join with us once again and finally pass this much needed legislation.●

WELCOME TO BILL LUCAS

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, It is a pleasure with my Republican colleagues from Michigan to welcome Wayne County Executive William Lucas as the newest member of the Republican Party.

Bill Lucas has said that it is time for his philosophy to be voiced and told a gathering of over 500 in Detroit this morning about the American Dream and how he is making it come true.

Elected on the Democratic ticket as Wayne County's first chief executive 30 months ago after 14 years as Sheriff, Lucas told those gathered, that while he is changing parties, he will not change his style of leadership.

In 2 short years, the administration of Wayne County Executive Bill Lucas has made great progress in fulfilling the will of the people. Through aggressive management, consolidation of services, and more realistic labor contracts, the Lucas administration has reduced Wayne County's outstanding deficit by $82 million.

Bill Lucas will be a tremendous gain to the Republican Party. Our gain is the Democrats' loss.●

NATIONAL SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

HON. ALBERT G. BUSTAMANTE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 7, 1985

● Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Speaker, this is National Small Business Week. I wish to make a few observation on the importance of small firms and independent entrepreneurs to my district and to the Nation's economy.

The 13 million small businesses in this country are the seedbeds of innovation and the sources of future employment for those just entering the work force. Small entrepeneurs are risk takers by definition. They do not enjoy recourse to bond issues or stock offerings when considering the introduction of new product lines or the expansion of production. Their boldness in going to the public with a new product line is not generally a reflection of sophisticated market research. It reflects a keen appreciation of what people want and what they're going to be willing to pay for it.

I realize that the Congress is far from deciding how, through whom, and even if the Federal Government should be offering large-scale assistance to small businesses. That debate may be joined at a later date. In the meantime, I only wish to salute the thousands in my district and the million across the Nation whose daily receipts are the determining factor in figuring inventory size and payroll lists. For every economist with detailed studies on marginal labor productivity or vertical integration, there is a shopkeeper or a mechanic trying to save his employee's jobs. For every firm listed in the Fortune 500, there are dozens which can't even be found in the yellow pages. For every Anhauser-Busch, there is a Shiner Brewery—for every Motorola a Barrera Television Service.

I do not mean to imply only that small is beautiful or that the giant firms of today have forgotten their public responsibilities. In general, the marketplace will not forgive corporate arrogance. I do wish to suggest that executives in boardrooms—and we in Congress—would do well to remember the value of trying and failing, and then trying again, as small businessmen and women do time after time. It is not just an idyllic memory of the kindness we encountered at a mom and pop store which makes small business so vital to our communities and to our position in the world economy. It is the prospect for growth inherent in small firms—and the chances they offer to disadvantaged workers—which make them so indispensable and so often overlooked.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE CROCKER ART MUSEUM CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, the Crocker Art Museum, the oldest public art museum west of the Mississippi, is celebrating its 100th birthday this year, and Congressman VIC FAZIO and I would like you and our colleagues to join all of us in Sacramento in commemorating this historic occasion.

The Crocker Art Museum holds a special place in the hearts of a great many people. A beautiful museum with splendid artwork, the Crocker is quite simply one of the finest institutions in Sacramento and the State of California.

It is also renowned for its rich history. Mrs. Margaret Rhodes Crocker gave the museum to the city 100 years ago in honor of her husband, Edwin Bryant Crocker, former associate justice of the State supreme court and brother of railroad tycoon, Charles Crocker. Much of the museum's original collection was purchased by Judge Crocker and his wife on a special trip to Europe with their four daughters. In appreciation of Margaret Crocker's tremendous generosity, the "Festival of Flowers" was held on May 6, 1885. This event was one of the most colorful social events and gala celebrations in the history of Sacramento and captivated the entire city.

Mr. Speaker, a centennial celebration will be held May 18-25, 1985, in Sacramento that features a reenactment of the original "Festival of Flowers." Numerous schools, civic and cultural organizations, and groups will participate in the week-long celebration, which include a grand parade, art contests, cultural performances, and other activities.

Congressman FAZIO and I want to express our sincere appreciation to all of those involved with the Crocker Art Museum for the cultural enrichment they have provided through a long and fulfilling relationship with the Sacramento community. We are confident that centennial celebration will help sustain and enhance that relationship.●

MERCHANTVILLE SCHOOL'S STATUE OF LIBERTY CAMPAIGN

HON. H. JAMES SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, this Friday I will have the honor of seeing off a busload of fourth and fifth grade students from Merchantville, NJ, who will be bound for the Statue of Liberty in New York City.

But this is not simply a sightseeing tour, Mr. Speaker. These young ladies and gentleman are planning to deliver a check in the amount of $2,000, which will go toward the restoration of the Statue of Liberty.

I am truly proud of the fundraising efforts of these students from Merchantville School. Their work on behalf of the Lady of Liberty began back in January, and they put their ingenuity to work to attract attention to the campaign.

To drum up local interest in their fundraising, they sponsored a T-shirt logo contest which centered on the statue restoration, and then sold T-shirts to raise contributions for the project.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the work of the fourth and fifth grade students from Merchantville School illustrates further the important independent role that young people can play in projects important to our society, and our heritage.

Awesome responsibilities and challenges face our next generation of Americans. The students from Merchantville School show that they have the drive and determination to meet those challenges. And I appreciate the opportunity to share their success today with my fellow colleagues in the House. ●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO REV. PAUL EDWIN SPIECKER OF NEW JERSEY: DISTINGUISHED THEOLOGIAN, ESTEEMED PASTOR AND OUTSTANDING COMMUNITY LEADER

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 8, 1985

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, May 13 the residents of the city of Clifton, my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join the congregation of the Belle Vista-Simpson United Methodist Church at a testimonial dinner honoring their pastor, Rev. Paul E. Spiecker, who has announced his retirement from his ministry of the United Methodist Church on June 15, 1985. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our warmest greetings and felicitations to Pastor Spiecker and share great pride with his good wife, Ruth Monica Spiecker; their sons, Paul Sheldon Spiecker and wife Carolyn, Ray Glenn Spiecker and wife Dianne; grandsons Matthew and Christopher; and granddaughters, Karen and Robyn on this milestone of achievement in their family endeavors.

Mr. Speaker, Rev. Paul E. Spiecker graduated from Ocean City, NJ, High School in 1926 with commercial training. Upon his graduation from high school he worked as a carpenter and real estate salesman before he decided that the Christian ministry was his calling. To complete scholarship requirements for college admission, he enrolled in Pennington School, Pennington, NJ, and in June 1929 graduated as valedictorian of his class.

He received his bachelor of science degree from Boston University, College of Liberal Arts in 1933. During his college years, which were the depression years, he worked as an elevator operator, a theater usher, and a bus boy in a restaurant on successive years in the evenings.

Paul Spiecker entered Union Theological Seminary, New York City in September 1933 and as a part of his course of study worked in the Church of All Nations as advisor to the Philippino Club of New York for 1 year and as a student assistant at Christ Methodist Church, NY, under Rev. Dr. Ralph Sockman, pastor. He transferred to the Theological Seminary School of Drew University, Madison, NJ, in September 1935 and graduated with a master of divinity degree—"Cum Laude" on June 9, 1936.

Reverend Spiecker has served as spiritual advisor and revered pastor dedicated to the well being and happiness of each and every member of the many congregations he has served. On October 1, 1936, he was appointed supply pastor of the Carleton Hill Methodist Church, East Rutherford, NJ. He was ordained deacon on April 11, 1937, and elder—corresponds to priest—on April 23, 1939. Upon his ordination as deacon he was appointed pastor of Trinity Methodist Church, Stony Point, NY, where he served as pastor for 3 years. He was appointed pastor of Hawthorne Methodist Church, Hawthorne, NJ, on April 31, 1940, where he served as pastor for 39 years. He retired as a full time pastor on June 30, 1979, and was appointed to his current ministry—part time—as pastor of the Belle Vista-Simpson United Methodist Church on July 1, 1979.

Mr. Speaker, the quality of his leadership, the richness of his wisdom and the abundance of his caring and dedication to our young people and adults alike have been warmly captured in his outstanding service as a pastor of the Methodist Church for 49 consecutive years.

Reverend Spiecker has been a staunch supporter and active participant in many civic and community improvement programs. His standards of excellence throughout his lifetime have earned him the most highly coveted honor of being chosen the 1984 "Paul Harris Fellow" of the Rotary Club of Hawthorne. He was a member of the Hawthorne Rotary Club for 42 years—serving as president of the club 1959–60 and editor of the club bulletin for 25 years.

He has attained the greatest respect and deepest appreciation from a grateful community for his compassion, dedication and untiring efforts in service to his fellowman. He was a member of the Hawthorne Masonic Lodge, F & AM 212 for 40 years. While his sons were in high school, he served as president of the Elementary and High School Parents-Teachers Group and was responsible for the establishment of the American Field Service Program during his tenure.

Among some of his affiliations, he was member and president for 3 years, Greater Paterson Council of Churches; member and president, Paterson Ministerial Associations; member, board of trustees, Clinic for Mental Health Services, Passaic County; member and president for 3 years, board of trustees, Greater Paterson Mental Health Center; civil defense sector warden during World War II; volunteer night ambulance driver, Paterson General Hospital on Wednesday nights during World War II for 3 years. He was appointed chaplain of the police and fire departments of Hawthorne, NJ, and chaplain of the Passaic County Chiefs of Police Association for almost 20 years. Served as counsellor and staff member, Summer Youth Conferences. Served on the Local Protestant Committee for "God and Country" award of the Boy Scouts of America. Served and serving as merit badge adviser, local Boy Scout Council. He is a member, Northern New Jersey Annual Conference of the United Methodist Church. Served on board of education, Social Action Committee, Nominating Committee and Commission on Archives and History during these years. Member, Historical Society for 40 years and president for 15 years; member, New Jersey Council of Churches. In his Christian ministry he has been cited by many for his outstanding service to our people and was entered in the prestigious publication, "Who's Who in the Methodist Church."

Reverend Spiecker's greatest source of pride is the satisfaction of being able to help people with problems when they become depressed, lonesome or terminally ill. In reflection he states that this opportunity of helping and giving is the most rewarding part of a pastor's ministry.

Mr. Speaker, all of us who have the good fortune to know Reverend Spiecker are especially proud of his many accomplishments. As we reflect upon the history of our great country and the good deeds of our people who have made our representative democracy second to none among all nations throughout the world, I appreciate the opportunity to call your attention to this distinguished gentleman and seek this national recognition of all of his good deeds. We want to share with him, his wife and his children the great pride we have in his distinguished and dedicated lifetime of outstanding service and contribution to the religious, cultural and spiritual enrichment of our community, State and Nation. We do indeed salute a distinguished theologian, esteemed pastor, outstanding community leader and good friend—Rev. Paul Edwin Spiecker of New Jersey.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, May 9, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
